

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

January, 1829.

(Absent COALTER, J.)

Mills*—Application for Right to Build—Trial of Title to Land.—L. owning lands on both sides of a stream, asked leave of court to build a mill upon and dam across it; it was found by inquest, on an ad quod damnum, that lands in the possession of A. of the value of 35 dollars, would be overflowed; the court, on a hearing, being of opinion, that these lands belonged not to A. but to L. himself, granted L. leave to build his dam without paying any damages to A. HOLD, error; for the right in the lands could not be thus collaterally tried.

Same—Same—Procedure When Title Doubtful.—In such case, leave should be granted, only on condition, that L. pay A. the damages assessed by the jury; and L. might build his dam, at his peril, without paying them, and then defend A.'s action against him, on the ground that the lands overflowed are his own, and thus put the title directly in issue.

Continuances.†—Under what circumstances, it is error to refuse a continuance.

Lawhorne made application to the county court of Bedford, for leave to erect a water grist mill on Back-Creek in that county, he owning the land on both sides of the stream. The county court awarded him a writ of ad quod damnum. The jury, in their inquest, found, that about three acres of land, in the possession of Anthony and Lancaster, which they purchased jointly of the representatives of William *Leftwich, would be overflowed by raising the dam proposed by Lawhorne nineteen feet high; and assessed the value thereof to 35 dollars. The writ and inquest being returned, the county court summoned Anthony and Lancaster to the next court, to shew cause, if any they had, against Lawhorne's application. The record did not state, that the summons was served on those parties, or, in express terms, that they appeared. At the next term, the court made the following order: "On the motion of Isham Lawhorne, for leave to erect a water grist mill on Back-Creek, on hearing, it is the opinion of the court, that the said mill be established, the dam to be nineteen feet in height, without the payment of any damages by the applicant: it appearing to the satisfaction of the court, that the said Anthony and Lancaster in the report of the jury mentioned, or either of them, have no manner of title to the land, or any part thereof, which will be overflowed by the erection of the said dam, but that the said land belongs to the applicant." From this order, Anthony and Lancaster appealed to the circuit court of Bedford.

The parties appeared at the first term of the circuit court, and on the first day of the term; and the appellants asked a continuance, upon an affidavit, stating that they had summoned two witnesses whom they deemed material, and who they believed were then in attendance, but that another material witness, one Lee, whom they had not summoned, but who had promised to attend, was absent. The court postponed the hearing till the third day of the term, to give the appellants an opportunity to take Lee's deposition. It was taken accordingly. On the third day, the motion for a continuance was renewed, on the ground of the absence of one of the first mentioned witnesses, named Graves, who had been regularly summoned, and who was material; and it was stated on oath, that, when the motion was made on the first day, Graves was one of the witnesses then alluded to and supposed to be in attendance, but that it was afterwards ascertained that he had been prevented from attending by the *illness of his wife.

3 The circuit court denied the continuance, because on the first motion, Lee's affidavit was agreed to be taken by consent, as removing all objections to a trial during the term, and it was not disclosed by the appellants that they might not be ready after they should obtain the same. To this opinion the appellants filed exceptions, setting forth the facts as above stated.

The circuit court then affirmed the order of the county court; and the appellants appealed to this court.

The cause was argued by Johnson for the appellants, and Leigh for the appellees, upon two points: 1. Whether the motion for a continuance was rightly overruled by the circuit court, or not? 2. Whether it was competent to the county court, in a summary proceeding like this, to try the title of the appellants, to the three acres of land, which the jury in their inquest had found to be in their possession?

GREEN, J., delivered the opinion of the court. The only question upon the merits, is, Whether it was competent to the court, in this collateral way, to decide upon the question of title between the parties, and, in consequence of deciding that the land in question belonged to the applicant, to give him leave to build the mill without paying the damages assessed by the jury?

This, I think, is decided clearly by the terms of the statute (2 Rev. Code, c. 235), which provides, that when one owning the lands on both sides of a stream, wishes to build a mill, he shall, without any previous notice to the owners of the land above or below, apply for a writ of ad quod damnum; upon the execution of which the jury shall be charged, amongst other things, to examine the lands above and below of the property of others, which may be probably overflowed, and say to what damages it will be to the several proprietors; and that, upon the return of such inquest, the proprietors or tenants of the lands so found liable to damage, shall be summoned, &c. And

4 thereupon the court, if certain *specified consequences will not follow the erection of the dam, shall consider, whether, all circumstances weighed, it be reasonable, that the leave to build the mill should be given or not, and shall give or not give it accordingly; and if given, shall lay the party applying under such conditions for preventing the obstruction of fish of passage, and ordinary navigation, or for preventing any impediment to the convenient crossing of the water course, as to them shall seem right. And, thereupon, the applicant, upon paying to the several parties entitled, the damages which the jurors find will be done by the overflowing of the lands above or below, shall be authorised to proceed to erect such mill and dam.

From this summary of the provision of the statute, it appears, that, in cases in which leave is given to build a mill, the court is only authorised to impose conditions to preserve the passage of fish and ordinary navigation, and to prevent obstructions to the passage of the stream; and here its discretion ends. It has no power to vary, by enlarging or abating, the amount of the damages assessed by the jurors, nor to determine whether they are to be paid or not, nor to whom they are payable. The statute, notwithstanding the leave given by the court, imposes upon the applicant, the duty of paying, to the persons entitled, the damages so assessed, as a condition upon which such leave is to be effectual for protecting him against the action of the person actually injured. Coleman v. Moody, 4 Hen. & Munf. 1.

If the court had given leave to build the mill, omitting to say any thing as to the damages, the applicant would have had his election to pay them, and thus avoid any question as to his right to erect the dam, or to build it without paying them, in which case, if sued by the appellants, he might have defended himself effectually, by shewing that they were not entitled to the damages assessed, because the freehold was in him. And thus the question of title would have been fairly tried, in a regular way, without any embarrassment. But the court having pronounced a judgment affirm-

5 ing *the title to be in the applicant, and therefore authorising him to build the dam without paying any damages, this judgment might be relied on by him, as a defence to an action by the other parties, either as establishing his right to the land, or as entitling him to build the dam without paying the damages. Whether he or the other parties were entitled, and whether this defence would or would not be available (and I incline to think it would not), it was improper in the court to give this judgment upon a point not within the scope of their authority, and thus to interpose an obstacle to the assertion of the appellant's rights against the appellee, in an action for the nuisance done to the lands in their possession, and to which they claim title.

Upon this ground, I think, that the judgments both of the circuit and county courts should be reversed. And if there were nothing more in the case, this court now giving such judgment as the circuit court ought to have given, would give judgment that the appellee should have leave to build this mill, with a dam nineteen feet high, leaving him to pay the assessed damages or not, as he shall be advised. But we have not the evidence upon the merits, which the appellants alleged they had in their power, and which they were prevented from offering to the circuit court, in consequence of the refusal to continue the cause: in which, I think, the circuit court erred, the affidavit being sufficient to entitle the appellants to a continuance.

Both orders should therefore be reversed, and the cause remanded to the circuit court, to be there heard upon such evidence as the parties may adduce, and to be disposed of as may thereupon appear proper.

February, 1829.

Wills—Attestation—Presence of Testator*—Case at Bar.—An attestation of a will of lands made in the same room with testator, is prima facie an attestation in his presence, according to the statute of wills: an attestation not made in the same room, is prima facie not an attestation in his presence; but as, in the one case, the attestation is good, if shewn to have been made within the scope of testator's view from his actual position; so, in the other, it is not good, if it appear, that, in the actual relative situation of testator and witnesses, he could not possibly have seen the act of attestation, nor have so changed situation as to have enabled him to see it, without aid from others, which was at hand, but was neither asked nor given.

The appellants, claiming as heirs of Thomas Neil deceased, exhibited their bill in the superior court of chancery of Winchester, against the appellees, who claimed as his devisees, contesting the validity of an instrument purporting to be the will of that decedent, whereby real estate was devised, which had been proved and recorded in the county court of Frederick, upon the ground, that the instrument had not been duly published, declared and attested, according to the statute of wills. The chancellor directed an issue of devisavit vel non, to be tried before the circuit court of Frederick. At the trial of this issue, the appellants filed a bill of exceptions to an instruction given by the court to the jury, stating:

That upon the trial of the issue, it was proved, that the testator, who was very weak and not able to rise from his bed or turn

Wills—Attestation—Presence of Testator.—On the question as to what is or what is not an attestation in the presence of the testator within the meaning of the statute, see full discussion in foot-note to Sturdivant v. Birchett, 10 Gratt. 69. The principal case is also cited on this question in Moore v. Moore, 8 Gratt. 314, 328, 331; Nock v. Nock, 10 Gratt. 118, 123, 126, 133, 134, 135; *Green v. himself in it without assistance, was raised up and placed upon the side of his bed, and a small table set by, and the paper before the jury (the will in question) placed on it; and that the testator, supported there, signed his name to it; after which the table was removed, and he placed in his bed. Some of the witnesses said, that he was laid with his back to the table on which the said paper was laid, when two of the attesting witnesses subscribed their names, and that he could not see said witnesses attest the same, or the paper itself, being unable to turn his face towards them. One witness said, he

7 thought his face was *turned toward the table; other witnesses did not remember how that matter was. It was also proved, that, by reason of his weakness, the testator's sight was very dim, and that the transaction was after night; and there was not more light than one candle in the room, and a good fire. The third witness came into the room some time after this, and put his signature, as he said, in a situation where the testator could have seen him: other witnesses said they thought differently. It was also proved, that before any of the witnesses subscribed their names, the testator was asked if he acknowledged the said paper to be his last will and testament, and if he desired that the witnesses should respectively attest it; to which questions he answered in the affirmative. Upon this testimony, it was contended for the plaintiffs, that this was not an attestation in the presence of the testator. And the court, being called upon by the counsel on both sides, instructed the jury, that signing in the presence of the testator, was intended to enable him to see that the persons he confided in were those who attested the paper, and to prevent a false paper being imposed upon them; and that, if from the evidence they believed, that the testator's mind was sufficiently sound to know the necessity of these precautions, and he could have had himself turned in his bed, so as to see the paper and witnesses at the time of the attestation, or have had them placed in such situation, that he could have seen them, and did not do either, still it was in law an attestation in the presence of the testator.

The jury found a verdict in favor of the will; which being certified to the court of chancery, the plaintiffs moved that court to set it aside, and direct a new trial, on the ground, that the instruction given by the circuit court to the jury, was a misdirection; but the chancellor overruled this motion, and on the hearing dismissed the bill. The plaintiffs appealed to this court.

Johnson and Leigh, for the appellants, admitted it to be well settled, that it is not necessary the testator should actually

8 *see the witnesses attest, and that it suffices if he and they be so situated that he may see them if he will: but the direction given by the circuit court to the jury, in this case, amounted in effect to this, That it is a sufficient compliance with the requisition of the statute of wills, in this particular, if the testator be in such a situation in relation to the attesting witnesses, that though in his actual situation, he cannot, if he will, by his own power without the aid of others, see them attest the will, yet he may, if he will, have himself or the witnesses placed in another situation, in which, if such change of place were made, he might see them attest. This, they said, was going a great deal too far: it was always in the power of a testator in his perfect senses, so to place himself or have himself placed, as to be present at the act of attestation, or to command the witnesses into his presence; but this power surely was not presence. They examined the reason, policy and object of the statute, in requiring the attestation to be made in the testator's presence, and the adjudications upon it: and they contended, that the attestation in the presence of the testator, intended and required by the statute, was an attestation within his view; an attestation, which the testator, in the actual situation of himself and the witnesses, has the capacity of seeing, if he will; an attestation, which it requires not the agency or the aid of others, so to change his position in respect to the witnesses, or theirs in respect to him, as to enable him to see them in the act of attestation. Thus, an attestation by the witnesses, though in a different room from that in which the testator is, if made where he has the capacity to see it, if he will, is a good attestation in his presence: but an attestation, though in the same room with the testator, if made when he and the witnesses are so situated with respect to each other, that he cannot see them attest, without change of place and the agency of others so to change it, is not an attestation in his presence, within the meaning of the statute. The execution of a will by a blind man, must of necessity be an exception to the general rule, resting on reasons peculiar to the case.

9 *Stanard and Wickham, for the appellees, insisted, that an attestation of a will by the witnesses, at the testator's request, in the same room with him, not made clandestinely, and exempt from all imputation or suspicion of fraud or imposition, is necessarily an attestation in the testator's presence within the true meaning of the statute. Under such circumstances, the testator and the witnesses are mutually present to each other: and he has all the power of supervision and control over the act of attestation, which the statute intended to provide, in order to secure him from imposition; all the faculty of supervision, indeed, which it is possible to give him. Under such circumstances, too, the witnesses must feel a consciousness, in the act of attestation, that the exercise of the testator's faculty of supervision depends on his own will. He cannot be compelled to exercise it. Accordingly, they said, no case had ever occurred, in which (nothing clandestine or fraudulent being imputable) an attestation in the same room with the testator, was contested as not being an attestation in his presence. They urged the inconvenience and ill consequences of a contrary doctrine: the extreme nicety it would require in every probat; the doubts and danger in which it would involve the fairest wills; the frequent and troublesome litigation it would engender. They denied, that attestation in the testator's presence, was synonymous with attestation within his view, or within the range of his vision. And they argued, that the cases, in which attestations by the witnesses, in a different room from that where the testator was, but still within his view, have been upheld as good attestations in the testator's presence, all proceed upon the admission, that attestation in the same room with the testator, is unquestionably an attestation in his presence; and that those adjudications, in effect, only enlarge the sense of the statute beyond the common import of its words, by holding attestation in another place, if within the testator's view or range of vision, equivalent to attestation in his presence, or in other words, in the same place with him. If the propositions

The following authorities were cited and examined, in the argument: Shires v. Glasscock, 2 Salk. 688, Carth. 81; Davy v. Smith, 3 Salk. 395; Casson v. Dade, 1 Bro. C. C. 99; Broderick v. Broderick, 1 P. Wms. 239; Longford v. Eyre, Id. 740; Doe v. Manifold, 1 Mau. & Selw. 294; Tod v. Winchelsea, 2 Car. & Payne, 488, 12 Com. Law Rep. 227; Right v. Price, Doug. 241; Pow. on Dev. 90-97; Rob. on Wills, 163-7; Longchamp v. Fish, 5 Bos. & Pul. 415.

CARR, J. To understand correctly the instruction given by the circuit court to the jury which tried the issue of devisavit vel non, we must not take it as an abstract proposition, but (as it was given) in connection with and as applicable to the case proved in evidence. Thus it was proved, (as is clear to me from the bill of exceptions), that the whole transaction of signing and attesting the will, took place in the testator's bed-room; and that the testator, before the witnesses subscribed, being asked if he acknowledged the will, and wished them to attest it, answered affirmatively. These facts enter into the instruction of the court: as if it had been said to the jury, in such a case as this, where the whole transaction took place in one room, and the testator acknowledged the will, and desired the witnesses to attest it, if you believe that his mind was sufficiently sound to know the necessity of the precautions prescribed by the act, and he could have had himself turned in bed so as to see the witnesses, or have had them move so that he could have seen them, and he did neither, still it was an attestation in his presence. And this instruction, I strongly incline to think was correct.

Our statute (taken from 29 Car. 2. c. 3) requires, that the attestation of the witnesses shall be in the presence of the testator. The object of this law, (as the cases shew, and the counsel admitted), was correctly expounded by the judge, when he told the jury, that "signing in the presence of 11 the *testator, was to enable him to see that the persons he confided in, were those who attested, and to prevent a false paper being imposed upon them." The phrase employed is one in common use: in presence of the testator. What is presence? The opposite of absence. It may be said (I suppose) of every attestation, that it was either in the presence, or the absence of the testator. Presence seems to mean, in company with—within the view of—in the same room with. Thus, if you ask a man, were you present when such a thing happened? He will answer, "Yes; I was in the same room." If a man be in one room, and a transaction take place in another room, of the house, it would certainly, prima facie, be considered as out of his presence. In all the cases, therefore, where an attestation out of the room of the testator has been supported, the court has extended the construction, to take in cases within the meaning, though not the strict words, of the statute. This, courts are always inclined to do; and on no subject have they gone farther than in support of the last wills of the dead, where the objection is technical, and the meaning of the statute has been substantially complied with. Thus, in Right v. Price, Doug. 243, lord Mansfield says, "the court would lean in support of a fair will, and not defeat it for a slip in form, where the meaning of the statute had been complied with: it was upon that principle (he adds) that Shires v. Glasscock, and other cases of that sort, were decided." These are the cases where the attestation was out of the room. Again, in Longchamp v. Fish, 5 Bos. & Pull. 420, the question was, whether a will executed by a blind man should have been read over to him in the presence of the witnesses; Rooke, J., says, "there is not the least imputation of fraud in this case, but the application made to us to set aside the will, is founded on mere technical reasoning. Now, unless compelled so to do by the provisions of the statute, I never would set aside a will on mere technical reasoning."

Let us now examine, more particularly, the cases which have been decided on this subject.

12 *The first is the case of Shires v. Glasscock, 2 Salk. 688, Carth. 81, 1 Eq. Ca. Abr. 403. Sir George Shires, being sick in bed, made his will, and signed it, in the presence of three witnesses; but he being very ill, the witnesses withdrew into a gallery, seven yards distant, between which and the chamber where the testator lay, there was a lobby with glass doors, and the glass broken in some places. Here the witnesses subscribed the will. It was proved that the testator, from the bed where he lay, might have seen the table in the gallery, on which the witnesses subscribed, through the lobby and the broken glass window. Per Curiam, "the statute required attesting in his presence, to prevent obtruding another will in place of the true one: it is enough if the testator might see; it is not necessary that he should actually see them signing: for, at that rate, if a man should but turn his back, or look off, it would vitiate the will. Here the signing was in the view of the testator; he might have seen it, and that was enough. So if the testator being sick should be in bed, and the curtain drawn." This case was decided in 3 Jac. 2, about eleven years after the making of the statute; and it is the first we have on the subject. It has ever since been considered a leading case, and is constantly referred to. In Right v. Price, Buller, J., says, "Shires v. Glasscock was decided soon after the statute passed, when the reason and meaning of the clause in question, were exactly known."

Let us then, for a moment, examine this case, and compare it with the one before us. The statute requires attestation in the presence of the testator: yet it must strike every one, that the witnesses, (in another room, seven yards distant from that of the testator, and separated by a lobby) were not, strictly speaking, in his presence. If then the court had inclined to construe the statute literally, this will could not have been supported: but they say, the meaning of the statute was to prevent obtruding another will in place of the true one; and it is enough if the testator might see them signing: thus substituting the possibility of seeing the subscription in the separate room, 13 *for the presence required by the statute. It is upon this ground, that lord Mansfield, in the passage before cited, quotes this case as decided upon the principle, that courts lean in favour of fair wills, and will not defeat them for a slip in form, where the meaning of the statute has been complied with. In the case before us, the subscribing was in the bed-room of the testator, perhaps within a few feet of the bed, and at his request; and the judge told the jury, that if they believed he could have had himself turned in bed, so as to see the witnesses, or have had them moved into his sight, the meaning of the law was complied with. Now, to my understanding, a subscribing in the same room with the testator, and at his request, is a literal compliance with the statute; a signing in his presence. But, suppose we admit, that it was not a compliance with the very letter, as the testator's back was to the table, and he could not turn without help; yet, surely, it was a situation far better calculated to prevent or detect imposition, than that of Sir George Shires. At any moment during the transaction, he might have said to the witnesses, stop; and to his attendants, turn me over: and, in an instant, the witnesses and the will would have been in full view, and so near as to give him some chance to distinguish a false will if such had been actually substituted: and the knowledge that he could do this, united with the fear which guilt always feels, would give to any party meditating such fraud, a consciousness so strong of the presence and power of detection, of the testator, as to furnish substantially those guards intended by the statute. But how was it with Sir George Shires? He lay in his bed, as we may suppose, in a position nearly horizontal; the witnesses went with the will, out of his room, through a lobby, and into another room seven yards distant: where was the difficulty of changing the will, while taking it to this room? and if changed, where was his chance of detecting the imposition? Can it be supposed, that from his reclining position, looking through the broken pane of the glass door, he could, at the distance of seven yards, distinguish a false will *from the true one?

14 He must be lynx-eyed indeed, if he could. Yet this is a leading case, never since questioned or departed from.

The next case is Davy v. Smith, 3 Salk. 395. Upon a trial at bar, the question was, whether the witnesses to a will had pursued the statute of frauds, in subscribing their names; and it was resolved, that where the testator lay in a bed in one room, and the witnesses went through a small passage into another room, and there set their names, at a table in the middle of the room, and opposite to the door, and both that and the door of the room where the testator lay, were open, so that he might see them subscribe their names if he would, though there was no positive proof, that he did see them subscribe, yet that was a sufficient subscribing within the meaning of the statute; because it was possible, that the testator might see them subscribe; and, therefore, per curiam, if the witnesses subscribe their names in the same room where the testator lies, though the curtains of the bed are drawn close, 'tis a good subscribing within this statute; because, if 'tis in his power to see them and what is done, it shall be construed to be in his presence. This case is liable to all the remarks made on the last; the attestation was in another room, separated from the testator's by a passage; the circumstances furnished the same facility of substituting a false will; and the situation and distance of the testator, the same difficulty of detection. Yet, because he might by possibility have seen the witnesses, the will was supported. Of the court's remark, with respect to a subscription in the same room with the curtains drawn close, I shall speak more particularly when I come to that class of cases.

In Casson v. Dade, 1 Bro. C. C. 99, the court decides, that it is not necessary for the testator to be even in the same house with the witnesses; for there, a lady sat in her carriage in the street, and signed her will, and the witnesses took it into an attorney's office and subscribed; and the will 15 was supported, because it was proved, by a person in the *carriage, that through the window of the office, the testatrix might see what passed within. Now, it can hardly be said, that because a person in the street may see what is passing in the room, those in the room are therefore in her presence. Yet the court leaning strongly in support of the will, substituted sight for presence, though that sight did not furnish half the means to avoid or detect imposition, which our case affords.

The next attempt was to prevail on the courts to support wills attested out of the room of the testator, and also out of his sight; but this attempt failed; and it was decided, in many cases, that though the signing was in a room contiguous, yet the devise would be void, unless the testator were in a position, from which he might, if he chose, see the witnesses subscribe, without changing his situation. Of this class, were the cases of Ecclleston v. Speke, Carth. 79, Broderick v. Broderick, 1 P. Wms. 239, Machell v. Temple, 2 Show. 288, and Doe v. Manifold, 1 Mau. & Selw. 294. This last case was much relied on by the counsel for the appellants; and lord Ellenborough was considered as having pronounced the law to be, that no matter how near the parties might be together, in the same room, yet if the testator could not from his situation see the attestation, it was not in his presence. If I understood lord Ellenborough thus, I should be compelled to say, that it was an obiter dictum, not only unsupported, but contradicted, by the whole current of authority:

an obiter dictum, because the case before him was not of a subscription in the same, but in a different room: unsupported, because there is no case, or even dictum, that I have met with, which takes the position, that where the signing is in the same room, it must also be in the sight of the testator, to constitute presence. But I do not understand lord Ellenborough as the counsel did. The case before him was one in which the testator executed the will in his bed, and there being no table in that room, the witnesses went into another, divided from it by a passage, into which the doors of both rooms opened, and they subscribed the will at a table before the fire-place of that other room, and both doors were open. The jury found, ad nisi prius, 1. that the testator did not see the witnesses attest the will; 2. that a person in the bed room might, by inclining his body and advancing his head into the passage, have seen the witnesses attest the will; 3. that the testator was not in such a situation in the room, that he might, by so inclining his body and advancing his head into the passage, have seen the witnesses attest the will. Upon this, the judge who tried the cause, told the jury, that he was of opinion, that the will was not duly attested; and the jury found accordingly. There was a motion to set aside the verdict, on the ground of misdirection. Lord Ellenborough's remarks must be taken with reference to the case before him; a case, in which the attestation was out of the room, was not seen by the testator, nor was he in a situation from which he could see it. After speaking of the case of Casson v. Dade, which, he says, he was old enough to remember, and had gone to see the office through the window of which the lady who sat in her carriage could (as was proved) see what passed within; lord Ellenborough says, "in favour of attestation, it is presumed that if the testator might see, he did see. But I am afraid, that if we get beyond the rule which requires that the witnesses should be actually within the reach of the organs of sight, we shall be giving effect to an attestation out of the devisor's presence; as to which the rule is, that where the devisor cannot by possibility see the act doing, that is out of his presence." Now, all this is entirely correct, as applied to the case before the court, a subscribing in another room; and to this case alone, the chief justice meant to apply it. The case he cites, and the language he uses, shew, that a signing in the same room was not in his mind at all.

Let us now see, what the judges have said of the effect of a subscription, where the testator and the witnesses are together in the same room. And here it is worthy of remark, that in the lapse of one hundred and fifty years, since the making of the statute, I can find (in all the books I have searched) but two cases, in which a dispute has arisen about the due attestation of a will, where the signing was in the same room: indeed, I may say but one case, for in Tod v. The Earl of Winchelsea, (which I shall presently cite more particularly), the weight of evidence was, that the attestation was in another room. I apprehend, that, in the making of wills, it happens, in nine cases out of ten, that the witnesses attest in the same room with the testator: how shall we account, then, for the fact, that we find upon record, so few cases in which it has been questioned whether such attestation was sufficient? I answer, upon the ground of the general opinion, that a signing in the same room was a signing in the presence of the testator; and cut off all inquiry about vision, or the relative position of the parties.

In Longford v. Eyre, 1 P. Wms. 740, the lady Clutterbuck having a power to devise certain lands during coverture, made her will, to which there were four witnesses: one was beyond sea; two swore, that they saw the will executed, and subscribed the same in the presence of the testatrix; the third swore, that he subscribed the will, as a witness, in the same room with, and at the request of the testatrix. Lord Cowper doubted as to the execution of the will, but would declare no opinion till farther application. It came on again before lord Macclesfield; and it was pressed upon him, that this third witness signing in the same room, was necessarily a signing in the presence of the testatrix. To this argument he replied, "that the bare subscribing the will by the witnesses in the same room, did not necessarily imply it to be in the testator's presence: for it might be in a corner of the room, in a clandestine, fraudulent way; and then it would not be a subscribing by the witness, in the testator's presence, merely because in the same room; but (he adds) here, it being sworn by the witness, that he subscribed the will at the request of the testatrix, and in the same room, this could not be fraudulent, and was therefore well enough."

*From this opinion, I think we may fairly draw two conclusions. The first is, that a signing in the same room, is (as a general proposition) a signing in the presence, but ceases to be so, if it be clandestinely and fraudulently done. Powell in his treatise on Devises (p. 168,) shews, that he so understands the case: Speaking of the conclusions to be drawn from it, he says, "And a devise, even if it be executed in the room where the testator is, and may see it if he please, will, if the subscribing be done in a clandestine and secret manner, be void notwithstanding." Roberts also in his treatise on Wills, (p. 129) from this same case, and the case of Right v. Price, where the testator was insensible, draws this conclusion: "the mere corporal presence, however, of the testator, unless his mind and faculties also are present, will not satisfy the statute on this point; for there must be a mental knowledge of the fact; so that, as a subscription clandestinely made in a corner of the same room with the testator, was not, on this account, a sufficient attestation, so neither would such subscription in the same room suffice, if the percipience and intelligence of the testator were gone, so as to constitute it an act done without his knowledge." The second conclusion from the opinion of lord Macclesfield, is, that where the signing is at "the request of the testator, and in the same room, it could not be fraudulent, and therefore is good." Now, in our case, the witnesses signed at the request of the testator, and in the same room; and the instruction of the judge is predicated upon these facts.

In the cases of Shires v. Glasscock, and Davy v. Smith, (the two earliest) the court laid it down, that if the witnesses subscribe their names in the same room where the testator is in bed, though the curtains of the bed be drawn close, it is a good subscribing; because, if it is in his power to see them and what is done, it shall be construed to be in his presence. The point to be sure, was not directly before the court; but yet it shews their opinion, and has been constantly quoted since as law. The proposition is laid down broadly, *that 19 a signing in the room, is a signing in the presence, though the testator be in bed and the curtains closely drawn. Why? because it is taken for granted, that it is in his power to see what passes in the room. We are not told, whether the testator had the strength to raise himself in the bed, or to put by the curtain with his own hand: this makes no term in the proposition. Whether he could raise the curtain, without aid, or with the aid of others, it was equally in his power to get it out of the way, and see what was doing; and if, having this power, he lay still, the signing was in his presence. So, in our case, the witnesses being with the will in the testator's bed-room, and there at his request signing, signed in his presence; because he had the power of seeing them, either by being turned over, or removing them into his sight; and if, having this power, he did not choose to exercise it, the signing was not the less in his presence.

The last case I shall cite, is Tod v. The Earl of Winchelsea, Car. & Payne, 488, decided in 1826. The question was, whether the will of the duke of Roxburgh was duly attested under the statute of frauds. One of the subscribing witnesses was dead. Another stated, that after the duke had signed the will, as far as he recollected, he took leave of him, and himself with the other witnesses, and the writer, went into an adjoining room called the writing-room, the door between the rooms remaining open; and that the witnesses signed their names on a table; but what sort of a table, or where it stood, he did not remember, nor could he say whether the duke could see them when they signed. The deposition of the other subscribing witness stated, that he believed the will was attested in the room where the duke was, but that he was not positive. It, however, appeared, that when the witness had given a former deposition on this subject, he then thought the will was attested in the adjoining room. It was proved, that as the duke lay in bed, he could only see one end of the writing-room; and that there were three tables in it, one in the middle of the room which as he lay in bed he could not see, another which he could 20 *see, and a third which was moveable, running on castors, and which might be wheeled into a part of the room, from whence he might see it in bed. Chief justice Abbot told the jury, "By the statute of King Charles II. it is required, that the witnesses who attest a will of lands, shall do so in the presence of the testator; and you have to consider, whether they did so in this case. As to what shall be held to be in the presence of the party; it cannot be necessary, that it should be in his sight, as the testator might have lost his sight, and in such cases other circumstances have been held to be sufficient. The rule to be drawn from all the decisions, which I mean to leave to you as the law, is this: was or was not the will attested by the witnesses in such a place, that the duke of Roxburgh might have seen what they were doing? I don't say, that it is necessary that you should be satisfied, that he did see them. If it were attested in the room in which he was, it is clear, upon the cases, that that is sufficient; if a table was brought to the door, he might have seen; but if it was done on the table in the middle of the room, he could not. As to the supposition that he got out of bed, I think there is no foundation for that, because he was assisted to rise in his bed, and was exhausted by the writing his name the first time. One witness says the will was attested in the room; but Sir Coutts Trotter thinks otherwise; and the former, on another examination, said he thought the will was attested in the next room. But it does not follow that the duke could not see the attestation, because it was in the adjoining room. If it was executed at the pier table, he might have seen it; or, if the moveable table was placed in one part of the room, he might also have seen it. You will, therefore, have to say, whether the will was attested in the bed-room; if so, there is no doubt; but if you think it was attested in the other room, whether it was attested in such part of that room, that the testator might have seen the witnesses attest it: in either of those cases, the plaintiffs are entitled to a verdict. But if you think otherwise, I am of opinion that in point of law, you ought to find for the defendants."

21 *If this case be authority it completely settles the question. The case brought directly before the court, the distinction between an attestation, in the same room, and in an adjoining room: and the judge treats it clearly, telling the jury that if they found the signing in the same room, it was clear upon the cases, that that was sufficient; and again, if the will was attested in the bed-chamber, there could be no doubt; but if not, then you must enquire, whether the testator could see the attestation. By this case, the instruction of the judge, in the case before us, is amply justified. And this, I think, is the true rule, both upon reason and authority. When no fraud is imputed, a signing in the room gives all the safety which the statute intended; and the question of fraud is wholly for the jury; where that intervenes it will vitiate, even though the will be executed, under the very eye of the testator. In the case before us, the objection is technical merely; and the courts have always leaned against such, in favour of fair wills. If we, departing from this course, require a strict and literal compliance with the statute, and say that every attestation not in the range of vision as the testator lay, shall be out of his presence, we shall give rise to a thousand perplexing questions, and much oftener disappoint fair wills, than we shall guard the testator from imposition. I think the decree should be affirmed.

GREEN, J. The proposition involved in the instruction given by the circuit court in this case, is, that if a testator, lying sick in bed, and so feeble as not to be able to turn his body or head without assistance, be raised up, and sitting on his bed-side, signs his will upon a table at the side of the bed; and, after requesting the attesting witnesses to subscribe it as witnesses, be laid down in the bed, with his back to the table, so that, without turning his body or head he cannot see the witnesses at, or the will upon, the table; and the witnesses, under these circumstances subscribe the will on the table; the will is duly attested and subscribed by the witnesses in the presence of the testator, provided he was in 22 *a state of mind to know the necessity of the precautions required by the statute in the attestation of wills, and could have had himself turned in his bed, or had the witnesses brought within his view, so as to have seen the act of subscribing.

Courts of justice have always, and very properly, leaned strongly in favour of the validity of wills fairly made, and when there is no imputation of fraud. But there is a limit prescribed by positive law, beyond which we cannot go. The witnesses must subscribe in the presence of the testator, in some sense.

The cases upon this subject (most of which have been noticed by judge Carr) have, accordingly, gone to this extent, that where the testator and the witnesses are together, for the purpose, as they usually are, of transacting the business of attesting the will, and so their attention specially called to that object; if they be in such a situation, that the testator may, if he pleases, by the exertion of his own volition and physical powers, without materially changing his position with respect to place, and without the assistance of others, see the witnesses subscribe; that is a subscribing in his presence. And, perhaps, the cases justify us in saying, that this is, under such circumstances, a presumption or conclusion of law, against which no evidence will be received. When they are in the same room, the prima facie presumption is, that the testator might see the attestation and subscription, without extraneous assistance; and, without evidence to the contrary, this would be taken for granted. But this is not necessarily so. In the case of Tod v. Winchelsea, in which chief justice Abbott instructed the jury, that if the will was subscribed by the witnesses in the room, where the testator was, there was no doubt of its due execution, there was no evidence to repel the presumption. In that case, too, the testator might have had the moveable table in the room adjoining that in which he was, the door being open, moved with the witnesses within his view, and the will there subscribed by them. And in the case

23 of Doe v. Manifold, *the testator might have caused himself to be removed to the door of the room in which he was, and then bending forward his body, and advancing his head into the passage, he could have seen the witnesses subscribing in the adjoining room. Yet this capacity (like the capacity of the testator relied on in our case) to have the table and witnesses removed into the view of the testator, and the testator himself brought into such a situation, without leaving the room in which he was, as that he might see the witnesses subscribing in another room, were not held to bring these cases within the statute. Nor is there any case which intimates, that, where the testator is in such a situation, that he cannot see the subscription by the witnesses, by means of his own power and volition, as above mentioned, it is sufficient to satisfy the requisition of the statute, that he might cause himself, or the witnesses, to be placed in such a situation as that he might see their attestation.

As to the case of a blind man: whilst vision and a reasonable degree of proximity constitute presence, in the case of one who has the faculty of vision, some other criterion must be adopted in the case of a blind man, one circumstance of which must be proximity; but what other circumstances must concur with that, is not settled by authority, and must be left to be decided when the case occurred.

I think the decree should be reversed, and the cause remanded, to have a new trial of the issue of deviasit vel non, upon which no such instruction is to be again given.

COALTER, J. The object of the law, in requiring a will to be attested in the presence of the testator, is to prevent a surreptitious will being substituted and imposed on him for the will he intends to publish. To effect this object, the witnesses and the will must both be in the presence of the testator; he ought to see, or at least be able to see, both. He may, it is true, turn away his eyes, so as not to see what is doing, or he may look on, the whole time. It will rarely happen, that

24 the witnesses engaged in the attestation, are at *the same time watching the testator, to see whether he is looking at them, so as to establish the fact that he saw them attest; and therefore the most that they can be required to prove, is, that he was so present to them, and they to him, as that he might, and therefore probably did, see the attestation. Nothing less than this, it seems to me, can satisfy the words and intention of the statute.

Suppose the witnesses retire to a table standing behind a desk in the testator's chamber, where he lying sick in his bed, makes his will; and over which desk he can even see the heads of the witnesses, but neither the table, the will, nor the act of attestation; is this a good will within the act? and will it be considered as duly attested, unless it can be shewn, that they retired there for fraudulent purposes? Is the power to require the witnesses to come from behind the desk and expose their acts to view, though no such requisition be made, equivalent to the power of actually seeing them if he chose to cast his eyes on the scene of action?

Suppose there is a folding screen, impervious to the sight, round the foot or side of the bed, and the witnesses retire behind that out of his view; is the power to direct it to be folded or shut up, so as to expose the table and witnesses to view, to be substituted for that power to supervise the transaction, which the simple act of casting his eyes on the spot affords? must it be proved, that they retired behind the screen, in order to be out of view and for fraudulent purposes?

Suppose the table at which the witnesses subscribe, be just within the door of an adjoining room, a few feet from the testator's bed, who has his face to it, and when open, can as plainly see the table, as if it were in his chamber, or more so, there being more light there than is agreeable or proper in the bed-room of the sick; but in order to exclude this disagreeable light from the sick bed, the door is usually kept shut; and, without any real or apparent intention of fraud, it is actually shut at the time of attestation: is the power to require it to be opened, to be substituted for the power to see if the party had chosen to cast his eye that way?

25 *Could it be said of either of these cases, that as he might have seen, it is fairly to be presumed that he did see, and that consequently no imposition was practised?

The object of the law being to prevent frauds, it prescribes the forms which are to be pursued, and which prima facie are sufficient to guard against fraud. All attestations not coming up to these requisites, may be fraudulent, and are in fact so considered in law, without proof of actual fraud; and no proof of actual fairness can avail or supply the requisites of the law. The most credible witnesses who ever lived may prove that they saw the will subscribed, heard it read to the testator and approved of by him; that he requested them to attest; that they all took hold of the will, carried it into another room, having received it from the hands of the testator; that they all continued to hold it, until each attested it; and all returned with it and delivered it to the testator again: yet it is no will of lands unless he could see them attest. Say, that they attested it in the door-way, where their acts could have been seen, had not the door been closed to shut out offensive light from the sick bed; it is no will. According to all the cases, to make it an attestation in the presence, the door must be open: no case goes so far as to affirm, that if the testator had had his suspicions awakened, and could have commanded the door to be opened, it is the same thing as if it had been opened.

It is not to be supposed, that testators, especially in their last illness, are suspicious of those around them, or that they are in a frame of mind, if they are of body, to guard, by any unusual effort, against frauds. The law undertakes to guard them. They may still be defrauded. But, if the attestation be according to law, the fraud must be proved; if not, the law avoids the will, as though actual fraud were proved, and no proof of fairness can make it good.

The opinion of the judge below, in this case, makes this a good will, although the jury might believe, not only that the testator did not actually see the attestation, but that

26 he could not see it, any more than if it had been in another *room with the door shut. Had his suspicions been aroused, and had he been turned, it is true he might have seen; and so he might, on being turned over, had the attestation been in an adjoining room, and in a part of it which would have been visible to him when he was so turned over. If the attestation had been in an adjoining room, at a table visible from the bed, had the testator been turned over, but not visible to him as he lay unable to turn; this (as, I think, all the cases shew) would not have been a good attestation. The power to have himself turned, and the power to see, if turned, is the same in both cases. Yet, in the one case, it is said to be a will, in the other, not so. A testator, not too ill to get up, acknowledges his will, lying on his bed: he continues to lie there, and his will is attested in an adjoining room: he can, by getting up, and sitting on his bed side, and leaning forward, see what is done and is fully able to do so, without assistance, or much bodily pain: but he omits to do it, and the law protects him against any will made in such a situation. But the man who is laid with his back to the table, when his will is attested, and can no more see it, or what is doing, than if he was held there by superior force, unless he calls for assistance, is not protected by the law!

It is true the cases say, that proof of actual seeing is not necessary, the presence being such that he can see if he will; but where is the case which says, that it is a good attestation notwithstanding proof on the other side, that he not only did not see, but could not without assistance, any more than he could see through a panel door what was doing behind it, and which he was unable to open without assistance?

If the doctrine contended for be tenable, why shall not a will, executed in an adjoining room, be good, where the testator could direct the table to be set out within his view whereat to attest it? Why not, if attested in an obscure corner in the same room, because he might have ordered it to be done in a part of the room where he could see what was doing?

27 The law is not that it shall be attested in his *presence, if he thinks it proper to superintend the act himself, otherwise he may trust to the honesty of his friends and the witnesses, to see for him that no fraud is done: No; the law requires him to be present himself, body and mind. If he can, by turning his eye, see what is doing, he will be presumed to have seen it, and no farther proof that he did see is necessary; but if interposing walls or other obstructions, render it doubtful whether he could see or not, the power to see must be proved and made apparent; as, that a door or window was open, (not that it might have been opened, if requested,) and that his position in bed was such, (not might have been such had he desired to be raised or turned,) as that he had it in his power, by simply looking on, to see. This is enough, and you need not prove that he actually did see.

I can see no magic in the four walls of the testator's bed chamber, which shall make him more present at an act of attestation, which in reality he cannot see without calling for assistance, than he is at a similar act performed a few feet from him, which he can see, even without assistance, by a slight change in his position. Neither the law nor the decisions under it, it seems to me, contemplate any such fictitious presence. If the act be done in the same room, prima facie he is really present; that is, he can really see; and, nothing further being shewn, he is presumed to have supervised the act. But if it is in a remote corner, though within the four walls, it must be shewn that he was so situated, in point of position and light, as that he could see, or it is deemed in law fraudulent and void, without proof of actual intended fraud. This, I think, is the sum and substance of the law, and all the decisions; and that to go beyond it, is dangerous.

I think the instruction given to the jury was wrong.

CABELL, J. The statute makes it essential to the validity of a will of lands, that it shall be attested by two or more witnesses, in the presence of the testator. The object of this requisition, is to enable the testator to see, that those *who attest the will are the persons in whom he confides, and to prevent a false paper from being surreptitiously imposed on the witnesses. Presence is not defined in the statute; but a due attention to the object of the law in requiring it, will lead us to its true meaning. It cannot be synonymous with being in the same room with the testator: for a man may be so situated, as to see what is passing in another room as accurately as if it were in the same room; and he may be so situated, as to be as incapable of seeing what is transacting in the same room, as if it were in a different room. The object of the law will be completely effected, and can only be effected, by the testator's being in such a situation in relation to the will and the witnesses, that he may, if he will, see, from that situation, both the will and the witnesses in the act of attestation. This capacity in the testator is, unquestionably, the test of presence, in all cases of attestation out of the room in which the testator may be: for all the cases shew, that an attestation out of the room of the testator, is held to be in his presence, if he might see it, and not in his presence, if he could not see it. Now, as the reason of the law in requiring an attestation to be in the presence of the testator, is precisely the same, whether that attestation be in the same room, or in a different room, the law will apply the same test of presence to both cases. An attestation, therefore, in the same room with the testator, will, as in the case of an attestation in a different room, be held to be in his presence or not in his presence, according to the capacity or want of capacity in the testator to supervise the transaction. There is, however, one important difference between an attestation in the same room, and one not in the same room with the testator: in the absence of all proof, a man is presumed to be able to see what is done in the same room with him, and to be unable to see what is done in a different room. An attestation, therefore, in the same room, is prima facie good; an attestation in a different room, is prima facie bad. But this presumption must yield to positive proof. An attestation, therefore, out of the room

29 of the *testator, but proved to be within the scope of his vision, becomes good, as being in his presence; and an attestation in the same room, but proved to be out of the scope of his vision, becomes bad, as not being in his presence. And this is, as I take it, the substance of all the authorities.

I am, therefore, of opinion, that the instruction of the circuit court to the jury, was improper; for, according to the case, as stated, the testator is supposed to have been in such a situation, that he could not see the attestation, since he lay in his bed, with his face turned from the witnesses, and was so weak as to be unable to turn his face towards them. The fact, that the testator might have caused himself to be turned over in his bed by his attendants, or that he might have caused the witnesses to take a position in the room where he might have seen them, (without, however, doing either,) is not entitled to any weight. A power of that sort exists in every case: in every case, the testator may cause his own situation, or that of the witnesses, to be so changed as that he may see the attestation. Such a power was expressly held to be insufficient in the cases cited at the bar, of Doe v. Manifold, and Tod v. The Earl of Winchelsea. A contrary decision would have the effect of substituting the confidence of the testator in his attendants and the witnesses, for that presence of the testator which the law requires. It is going far enough to say, that the law may be satisfied, by the testator being in such a situation, that he may, from that situation, and without the aid of others, supervise the attestation.

BROOKE, President. To arrive at a correct decision in this case, the first object is to ascertain the true construction of our statute, taken from the british statute of 29 Car. 2, and to have a correct understanding of the cases decided on that statute by the english judges. The terms of both statutes require, that the attestation should be in the presence of the testator. What constitutes presence, I think, is correctly settled by the adjudicated cases. Where the witnesses

30 *are called upon by the testator to witness his will, and are in the same room with him for that purpose, they are mutually in the presence of each other, according to the terms of the statute. In such case, he has all the control over the attestation, intended by the statute; and to invalidate the will, fraud or a clandestine attestation of it, must be proved; as, (in one of the cases,) a secret attestation in another corner of the room. The statute protects both the testator and the witnesses from imposition: he generally selects those that he most confides in, to witness his will: and if the terms of the statute be complied with, fraud, on the one or the other, must be proved, to invalidate it. Under such circumstances, in the absence of any charge of fraud, a blind man's will may be well attested. And hence it is said, that it is not necessary to prove, that the testator did actually see the attestation of his will, if he might see it. How might he see it? not by his own individual powers, (for that is not said, either in the statute, or in the cases where the attestation is in the actual presence of the testator,) but by the aid of others, if necessary. The witnesses being in his actual presence, he possesses all the other powers of controlling the attestation; and if his confidence in them be such, he may turn his back upon them, and dispense with the controlling power of sight, if he choose. The terms of the statute being complied with, the witnesses being actually in his presence, that circumstance is a sufficient control over them, or the statute in words would have required more. It might, in terms, have required, that he should actually see them, or of himself have the power to see them; but this would have rendered it impossible for a blind man to make a will.

It is admitted, that it need not be proved, that the testator actually saw the attestation of the will, if he had the power to see it; and that he may dispense with this portion of his controlling influence, and turn his back upon the witnesses when they attest the will. This admission must be on the principle, that his actual presence and confidence in the witnesses supply the place of actual vision, in a case in which *the terms of the statute are complied with; it cannot depend on his own physical power to see the witnesses attest the will. Such a position would open a field of controversy, in which there would be no sure means of ascertaining the fact. If his vision were defective, as in age or extreme sickness is often the case, and he obliged to resort to artificial means to aid his sight, it could not be said, that he had the power within himself to see the attestation. Such a requirement would lead to endless controversy: it would be necessary to ascertain, with precision, the distance to which his vision extended, and the degree of light requisite; and, if he might have used glasses, and did not use them, it might be said, that he had not the power to see without the aid of others. In the case before us, if the testator had lost his confidence in the witnesses, and was not satisfied with the control of his presence, he might have been turned over by the aid of others, though without it he could not turn himself; as, in the case in which a testator could not see without glasses, he might with the aid of others get them, though physically unable himself to obtain them.

All the cases in which the attestation is in the same room, in the presence of the testator, and in which no fraud is charged, proceed, if I understand them, on this course of reasoning. The terms of the statute being complied with, in every particular, to invalidate the will, fraud must be charged and proved. In the last case that I have seen, Tod v. The Earl of Winchelsea, chief justice Abbott said, in charging the jury, "as to what shall be held to be in the presence of the party, it cannot be necessary that it should be in his sight, as the testator might have lost his sight, and in such cases other circumstances have been held to be sufficient." The circumstances, that the blind man had dictated the will, and when it was read to him, directed attestation to be made; it being attested in the same room, in his presence, and the terms of the statute being complied with, though he had lost the controlling power of sight; and no fraud being alleged; have been held sufficient.

Nor is there any thing, *in the cases in which the attestation of the witnesses was in another room: in those cases, the controlling power of actual vision of the attestation by the testator, is considered as equivalent to the influence of his actual presence in the other cases. In the cases, in which the attestation is in another room, not in the actual presence of the testator, he is considered as constructively present, because he exercises a control equivalent to that of actual presence, by actually seeing the attestation, as far as that can be presumed, or having the power within himself to see it without the aid of others. And a blind man, in such case, cannot make a will, whatever may be done to inform him of what is going on.

In the first cases, the presence of the witnesses for the purpose of attesting the will, in the same room, and their actual attestation there, is sufficient, unless fraud be charged. In the second, where the attestation is in another room, the testator must have actual vision, or the power to have it, without the aid of others, or the spirit of the statute is not complied with. In such case, it is important, that he should have the power to see within himself, because otherwise his control over the attestation would be wanted; to go farther, and to admit, that the power to see the attestation of the witnesses made in another room by the aid of others, would be sufficient, (as in the case of actual presence in the same room,) would open as wide a field for controversy, as the requisition of a power in the testator himself without aid from others, to see the attestation, where it is made in his actual presence in the same room; which has been before remarked on. If, in the case of attestation in another room, the power of the testator by the aid of others, to see it, was admitted; the witnesses not being in his actual presence, could not know, that he could have aid; nor could others, in another room, intending to palm a false will upon him, know that such aid was within his power. His control over the attestation would be gone, and the statute defeated in its letter and spirit. The letter of the statute is complied with, by the control, which actual presence and the power to see by the aid *of others known to the witnesses, gives to the testator; its spirit is complied with, when the testator, though in another room, and not in the presence of the witnesses, is known to have the power within himself to overlook the attestation, without the aid of others, the extent of which the witnesses and others, in another room, cannot be accurately apprised of.

But it may be said, that, in the case before us, the fraud comes out in the fact, that the testator, though he could not turn himself in his bed, so as to see the attestation of the will, neither required or was assisted by others to turn him. Unless he was incompetent, from mental infirmity, to ask for aid, if he wished it, (which is not pretended,) it is nothing more than the case in which the testator turned his back upon the attestation, which was said to be of no importance. If he had asked to be turned over, or that the witnesses should change their position, that he might see the attestation, and either had been refused, and the will attested behind his back, it would have been a clandestine attestation, and the will invalid. But nothing of the sort is pretended. He possessed a mind competent to make a will, in all respects, and exercised every control over the attestation of it, except the controlling power of actual sight of it, which is not required by the statute, either in its terms or in its spirit.

For authority for the distinction I take, between the cases in which the attestation is in the actual presence of the testator, and those in which the attestation is by construction in his presence, I refer to the cases already cited by judge Carr. Nor will I repeat the instruction of the circuit court to the jury: it must be taken in relation to the facts stated in the bill of exceptions; and if so, it was wrong on the principle contended for; it ought to have gone further; it ought to have informed the jury, that though they might find upon the evidence, that the testator had the power of himself to turn him towards the witnesses, yet as his sight was dim, and the light bad, it ought to be proved, 34 of his own accord, have seen *the attestation: which would not have been more, than what seems to be required by a majority of the court. Upon a sound construction of the statute, and also upon the adjudged cases, I think the instruction of the circuit court was correct, and that the decree ought to be affirmed.

By the majority of the court, Decree reversed.

Graves v. Graves.

February, 1829.

Appeals*—Interlocutory Decree—Suspension—Statute.
—Appeal from an interlocutory decree in chancery denied, because the party asking it might and more properly ought to apply to the chancellor, to suspend the effect of the decree, under the act of 1827-8, c. 25, § 4.

Maria L. Graves exhibited her bill, in the superiour court of chancery of Fredericksburg, against Simeon Graves, her husband; charging the husband with adultery, and other grievous misconduct towards and ill treatment of her; and praying a divorce a mensa et thoro, that all the property he had acquired in her right by the marriage might be restored to her, that the care and education of the children of the marriage should be confided to her, and that alimony, and a suitable allowance for the children, should be decreed to her. The husband, in his answer, controverted the facts of misconduct imputed to him by the bill. And many depositions touching the facts in issue, were taken and filed by both parties.

The cause, coming on for hearing in May, 1828, the chancellor pronounced an interlocutory decree. That the plaintiff should be divorced from the bed and board of the defendant, her husband; perpetually separated from him; and intirely discharged from his authority and control: that her person and property, as well that which should be allotted to her by the court, as that she might afterwards acquire, should be protected from the dominion or interference

35 *of her husband: that the defendant should deliver to the plaintiff, all the slaves and their increase, which he had acquired by his marriage with her, and which were then in his possession, or under his control: that a commissioner of the court should take an account of the value of all the other estate, real and personal, possessed or owned by the defendant, and the annual value thereof, and of all the debts due and owing to or from him: that the defendant should submit to be examined by the commissioner, on oath, touching the said account: and that the commissioner should also inquire and report, what sum would be necessary for the maintenance and education of the children of the marriage, and whether any of them were of a proper age to be bound apprentice. And the court also appointed Layton Yancey guardian of the children; and ordered, that the parties, or such of them as had the custody of the children, should surrender them to the said guardian. But the effect of so much of the decree as directed the slaves aforesaid to be delivered up to the plaintiff, was suspended, until some responsible person should enter into bond with sufficient surety, in the penalty of six thousand dollars, payable to the defendant, with condition to comply with the future order of the court in relation to the slaves.

This bond was accordingly executed and filed.

Patton presented a petition on behalf the defendant, praying an appeal from the decree, and complaining of errors, in the proceedings and decree, in fact and in law.

BROOKE, President. Without giving any opinion on the merits, the court denies the appeal, on the ground, that the case more aptly comes under the 4th section of the act of 1827-8, c. 25, (Sess. Acts, p. 20,) amending the laws in relation to the jurisdiction of the court of appeals: whereby it is provided, that no appeal shall be granted from any interlocutory decree of a superiour court of chancery, except by the court of 36 appeals; but that the courts of chancery, or *the judges thereof in vacation, may suspend the execution of any interlocutory decree, requiring the payment of money, or changing the possession and title of property, provided the party, desirous of appealing, shall enter into bond with sufficient surety, in the manner now prescribed by law, with condition reciting the interlocutory decree and the intention of the party to take an appeal so soon as a final decree shall be made, and binding such party to pay all costs and damages, and the profits of the property recovered, in case the decree be affirmed, or the party fail to take or prosecute the appeal.

Appeal denied.

Darlington v. M'Coole.

(Absent CARR, J.)*

Specific Performance—Parol Agreement That Father Will Give Son-in-Law Tract of Land.—A parol agreement between father-in-law and son-in-law, that the former will give the latter a piece of land,

*He did not sit in the cause, because he had decided it in the court of chancery.

†Specific Performance—Verbal Promise to Convey Land—Consideration.—The principal case holds that a parol agreement between a father-in-law and his son-in-law, that he will give his son-in-law a tract of land, supported by no substantial value or meritorious consideration will not be specifically executed, at the suit of the son-in-law, after the death of his wife, against the father's devisee of the land. Neither would such an agreement be specifically executed, under such circumstances, even if it had been in writing; nor would equity have aided a defective conveyance had such a one been made.

Upon the authority of the principal case it was supported by no substantially valuable or meritorious consideration, will not be specifically executed, at the suit of the son-in-law, after the death of his wife, against the father's devisee of the land; neither would such an agreement be specifically executed, under such circumstances, even if it had been in writing; nor would equity have aided a defective conveyance had such a one been made.

Darlington exhibited his bill against John M'Coole the younger, in the superior court of chancery of Winchester, setting forth, that in May 1802, he married Catharine a daughter of John M'Coole the elder, of Frederick county. That, before the marriage, and in contemplation thereof, M'Coole the father wrote him a letter, wherein he promised him a place called The Falling Waters, being a piece of land parcel of the tract on which M'Coole lived, and though 37 *this letter was lost, its contents could be proved; and that, upon his mentioning, at breakfast, the second morning after the marriage, in the presence of his father-in-law and of the family and of the defendant among the rest, that he had to go to Front Royal (in another part of the same county), held in Reed v. Vannorsdale, 2 Leigh 570, that where a wealthy brother verbally agrees with his brother, who is poor, that if he will forego his intention to move to the West, and move and settle on a tract of land near the residence of such wealthy brother, he will convey the land to him in fee; the agreement was executed on the part of the poor brother but without incurring any expense or loss in so doing: there being neither meritorious nor a valuable consideration to support the agreement equity will not decree specific execution against the heirs of the wealthy brother.

In Jones v. Obenchain, 10 Gratt. 266, it is said, the case of Darlington v. M'Coole is no authority on the question involved in the one now under consideration; but it serves to show the impression on the minds of the judges of this court, that where there was a meritorious consideration, meaning thereby a provision for the wife or child, equity will enforce a defective conveyance. To the same effect see the principal case cited in Sayers v. Wall, 26 Gratt. 579.

In Burkholder v. Ludlam, 30 Gratt. 262, it is said, in Darlington v. M'Coole, 1 Leigh 36, Reed v. Vannorsdale, 2 Leigh 569, Pigg v. Corder, 12 Leigh 69, Cox v. Cox, 26 Gratt. 306, specific execution was denied; but there is nothing to be found in any of these cases in conflict or at all inconsistent with the decision in Shobe v. Carr, 3 Munf. 10. On the contrary the reasoning of the judges in some of these cases would rather seem to confirm the principles of that case. And in the case of Shobe v. Carr, 3 Munf. 10, it is held that where a testator having put his son-in-law into possession of a leasehold tract of land and delivered to him the lease, and permanent improvements having been made by his son-in-law with the assistance of the family, and parol declarations by the testator that he had given him the land in consideration of his having married his daughter and to prevent his moving to Kentucky; the son-in-law had an equitable title to the land for the time the lease had to run, and to a release of the legal title upon the heirs or executors, according as the interest conveyed by lease might be greater or less.

Also in Fram v. Frame, 32 W. Va. 476, 9 S. E. Rep. 906, it is said: "It may be regarded as settled law in this state and in Virginia that a verbal donee of land—a child—who, under the verbal gift, has taken possession of the land and improved it—has a right to demand in a court of equity a specific performance of the contract by the execution of a deed by the father, thereby consummating his verbal gift. This was so held in Shobe's Exrs v. Carr, 3 Munf. 10, decided as long ago as 1811, and this case has been repeatedly followed or recognized as law by numerous Virginia decisions ever since. See Darlington v. M'Coole, 1 Leigh 36; Reed's Heirs v. Vannorsdale, 2 Leigh 569; Pigg v. Corder, 12 Leigh 69; Cox v. Cox, 26 Gratt. 306." To the same effect, see, citing the principal case, Marling v. Marling, 9 W. Va. 79; Miller v. Lorentz, 39 W. Va. 172, 19 S. E. Rep. 395; Goodwin v. Bartlett, 43 W. Va. 534, 27 S. E. Rep. 326. See the principal case cited in foot-note to Farrill v. McKinley, 9 Gratt. 1; Griffin v. Cunningham, 19 Gratt. 571. See generally, monographic note on "Specific Performance" appended to Hanna v. Wilson, 3 Gratt. 243.

to confirm a contract he had begun with one Vanmeter for a tannery, in which business he intended to engage with prospect of great advantage, the father-in-law said, he need not do that, for he would give him the piece of land called The Falling Waters, to be his property (describing the boundaries), and moreover, that he and his son John would help him to improve it. That M'Coole's declared motive was, to prevent his daughter from removing to a distant residence. That, in consequence of these promises, Darlington relinquished his beneficial contract with Vanmeter, for the Front Royal tannery; was shortly afterwards put by his father-in-law in possession of The Falling Waters, being a piece of land, designated by metes and bounds, containing about thirty-five acres; built dwelling houses on it, sunk vats for a tannery, and improved, held and enjoyed it as his own, until M'Coole, his father-in-law, died in 1815, having by his will devised it to his son, the defendant. And that, though M'Coole, the father-in-law, had never made him any conveyance of the land according to his promise and agreement; yet he had laid off the boundary lines, in the presence of the defendant, his son and now his devisee; and had often declared his willingness to make such conveyance. The bill prayed a specific execution of the alleged promise and agreement of M'Coole, the father, to give and convey the land to Darlington; and that M'Coole, the son and devisee, might be compelled to convey it accordingly.

The defendant, in his answer, denied all the allegations of the bill, both as to the promise of M'Coole, the father, before Darlington's marriage, and the agreement after the marriage, to give him The Falling Waters. He said, that his father, shortly after Darlington's marriage, told him he might have the land in question, as a temporary accommodation *for his family, assisted him in building on and improving it, and suffered him to enjoy it, during his own life; but neither made him any gift of it, nor ever intended to do so.

It was also alleged in the answer, and proved, that, upon Darlington's marriage with M'Coole's daughter, his father-in-law gave him such personal property as he advanced to his other daughters on their marriage: that he afterwards contributed the greater part of the labour and expense of the buildings (which were log-houses) and the other improvements, put on The Falling Waters: that Darlington's first wife, the daughter of M'Coole, died in 1805, leaving one daughter, who was immediately taken into her grandfather's family, and treated and brought up as one of his own children, and was provided for by her grandfather's will, equally with his own daughters: and that Darlington had married a second wife, by whom he had several children.

Of the letter, alleged in the bill to have been written, before Darlington's marriage, by M'Coole, the father, to him, promising to give him The Falling Waters, there was no proof whatever. Neither was there any positive proof of the agreement alleged in the bill, to have been made, at breakfast, the second morning after the marriage; and the members of the family, being examined as witnesses, declared they had heard nothing of the kind. But several witnesses deposed, that M'Coole, the father, had pointed out the boundaries of the land, and frequently said he had given it to Darlington; and that Darlington had held and enjoyed it as his own, during M'Coole's life. Vanmeter deposed, that, having a valuable tannery at Front Royal, with a large stock on hand, he had entered into a contract with Darlington, before his marriage, to carry on the business in partnership, each to contribute equal stock, and to carry on the business at joint expense and for joint and equal benefit; that he thought, at the time, it would be a very profitable business; that Darlington had a tract of land, by the sale of which he could have 39 contributed his *share of in-put stock, by the time it would have been wanted, because of the large stock Vanmeter had on hand; but before Darlington's marriage, he (Vanneter) received a letter, purporting to be written by John M'Coole the elder, though he did not know that it was in fact written by him, being unacquainted with his handwriting, in which he stated, that he had himself made Darlington an advantageous offer, and urged Vanmeter, to release him from the contract concerning the Front Royal tannery; which Vanmeter, in consequence of that letter, agreed to do, though very reluctantly. And Lewis M'Coole, a son of the elder M'Coole, deposed, that Darlington, shortly after his marriage went to Front Royal; and the witness was told by his father, that Darlington had made a contract with Vanmeter, provided he could furnish a sufficient sum of money to pay for half the stock of the tannery on hand; his father said, he had not the money to furnish him; he hated to part with his child to go that distance; and he thought it would be better to give them a piece of land on The Falling Waters. His father, after the death of Darlington's wife, said he had never made him a deed, and never intended it; but he would probably give the land, or the value of it, to his child.

The chancellor dismissed the bill: and Darlington appealed to this court.

Johnson, for the appellant, insisted, That the agreement between the elder M'Coole and Darlington, that the former would give him the land in question, if he would relinquish his contract with Vanmeter, was proved, by the fact, that Darlington had made a beneficial contract with Vanmeter, and gave it up; by M'Coole's declaration to his son Lewis, that it would be best to give him this land; by his frequent declarations to others, that he had given it to him; and by the fact, that, even after his daughter's death, and after Darlington's second marriage, he had permitted him to enjoy the property without the least disturbance. And,

40 he said, the relinquishment by Darlington, of his beneficial contract *with Vanmeter, was a valuable consideration performed on his part, which made the agreement obligatory on M'Coole; and this performance of the agreement by Darlington on his part, and the possession of the land, given him by M'Coole immediately, and enjoyed for so many years, took the case out of the statute of frauds.

Nicholas and Leigh, for the appellees, submitted, that there was no agreement proved; that, taking the plaintiff's own evidence, waving all criticisms to which it was obnoxious, and disregarding the evidence adduced on the other side, the most that could be pretended, was that M'Coole had promised, or rather had intended, to give the land, as an advancement to his daughter, with the view of having her settled in his neighbourhood. But, if there was an agreement, there was no consideration, no such act performed by Darlington, no such loss incurred by him, as made it obligatory on M'Coole, in law or in equity, to fulfil the promise, under any circumstances; much more, to convey to Darlington, after his wife's death, property, which he could only have intended to give, if at all, as an advancement and provision for her. According to his own shewing in the bill, he had made no contract with Vanmeter: he was only engaged in a treaty with him: and the evidence, narrowly examined, proves there was nothing more.

BROOKE, President, delivered the opinion of the court. The appellant, in his bill, without noticing the death of his first wife, or the existence of his daughter by her, or his second marriage and his issue by that marriage, claims for himself, a conveyance in fee of the land on which he had settled, on two distinct grounds; first, a promise made him by his father-in-law, by letter before the marriage; and, secondly, an agreement after the marriage, to give the land to him, in consideration of his relinquishing a valuable contract he had made with Vanmeter.

Of the letter before the marriage, there is no proof.

41 *As to the agreement after the marriage, the evidence, taking it most favourably for the appellant, is, that M'Coole gave him the property in question, as far as he could give it to him by parol, and by putting him in possession of it; but there was no consideration for this gift, beyond the parental motive to advance his daughter, and to have her settled in his neighbourhood. There was, in fact, no concluded contract between the appellant and Vanmeter. The bill itself states, that the contract with Vanmeter was inchoate only; and although an attempt was made to prove by Vanmeter, that it was concluded, and that he reluctantly absolved the appellant from it, in consequence of a letter from M'Coole, soliciting him to do so; yet he did not know, that the letter was from M'Coole, and it is lost. It seems clear, from the evidence of Vanmeter and Lewis M'Coole, taken on the part of the appellant, that, according to the statement in the bill, Darlington's contract with Vanmeter was inchoate only, and depended on the appellant's advancing money to the value of half the stock in Vanmeter's tan-yard, and for the employment of half the hands, and the payment of half of all other expenses; which would have required a large sum of money, such as the appellant could have by no means commanded, but by selling a tract of land which he held. So that, if he gave up any thing in consequence of M'Coole's promise, it was an uncertain speculation. The improvements on The Falling Waters, were of a character to induce no pecuniary expenditure; and, such as they were, M'Coole is proved to have contributed two-thirds the labour of making them; and the appellant's portion of the labour of making them, was more than compensated by the use of the property for thirteen years, or more, free of rent.

In such a case, when the donor has received nothing, and the donee lost nothing; when the chief motive of the gift, a provision for the donor's daughter, is annihilated by her death; and when the father has discharged the moral obligation to provide for her issue; there is nothing to call into action the powers of a court of equity. There is neither a valuable nor a meritorious consideration; without one of which, a court of equity will not aid a defective conveyance, much less enforce a bare agreement, even if it were in writing.

The decree is affirmed.

Salling v. M'Kinney.

[19 Am. Dec. 722.]

Sheriff—Buying and Selling Office.*—What Contract Now in Violation of Statute.—M'K. sheriff of Scott, farmed his shrievalty to G. whom he appointed his deputy, for a sum in gross, to be paid him by G. who, by the same contract, was to discharge all duties and to take all emoluments of the office: held that such contract is not prohibited by the statute of Virginia against buying and selling offices, and is lawful.

This was a motion made in the circuit court of Scott county, by M'Kinney, late high sheriff of that county, against Salling, his deputy, for the amount of a judgment, which the commonwealth had recovered against M'Kinney in the general court, on account of taxes collected by Salling, which he had failed to pay into the treasury. Salling pleaded several pleas in bar, on which issues were joined, and these issues were tried by a jury; but the jury not agreeing, were discharged, and the cause continued to another term; when the court, dispensing with a jury,† heard the whole case and gave judgment against Salling for 541 dollars 20 cents, with interest from November 12th, 1822, till paid, and costs; spreading all facts proved in the case, upon the record. From this judgment Salling appealed to this court.

The facts in the case were these: M'Kinney was duly recommended and commissioned sheriff of Scott, for the year 1819; but the county court recommended another for the shrievalty for the year 1820, whom the executive refused to commission; and the county court, on its part, refused to recommend M'Kinney; yet it permitted him to qualify, by giving an official bond and taking the oaths of office, and to act as sheriff for the year 1820. In March, 1819, M'Kinney appointed one Gillingwaters his deputy, who being approved of by the county court, executed a bond to his principal, with condition, reciting that he was appointed deputy for the year 1819, and the next year also; and stipulating, that the deputy should perform all the duties of the office, and save his principal harmless. The contract between M'Kinney and Gillingwaters was, that the latter (the deputy) should do all the business and receive all the emoluments of the office, and in consideration thereof, should pay M'Kinney a gross sum of 400 dollars; and he gave him his notes for that sum, and paid him part of it. On the 9th June, 1819, Gillingwaters made a contract with Salling, whereby he farmed to Salling the office of deputy sheriff for both years of M'Kinney's shrievalty, in a particular bailiwick of the county, for the sum of one hundred and twenty dollars, to be paid him by Salling, and Salling was to be accountable to Gillingwaters: he was the sub-deputy of Gillingwaters. There was no evidence, that M'Kinney knew of this agreement between Gillingwaters and Salling, till after the term of office had expired; but on the 10th June, 1819, M'Kinney appointed Salling his deputy, who being approved of by the court, executed his bond to M'Kinney for the due performance of the office; the consideration of which recited, generally, that M'Kinney had appointed Salling his deputy, and stipulated, that Salling should "well and truly execute his duty in his office of deputy sheriff, during his continuance in office, and should well and truly pay M'Kinney all damages which he might sustain, in consequence of the acts of Salling in his office aforesaid." After this, Gillingwaters and Salling executed the duties of the shrievalty for the year 1819. On the 15th June, 1820, Salling was reappointed deputy, and gave a new bond to the same effect as the former. And on the 11th July, 1820, Gillingwaters was also continued in his office of deputy, and gave a new bond. Salling collected part of the public dues of 1820, and paid it over to Gillingwaters, without M'Kinney's consent or privity, which Gillingwaters failed to pay into the treasury; and the commonwealth recovered judgment against M'Kinney for the whole amount of the defalcation. The motion was grounded on Salling's last bond for the due discharge of his office of deputy.

The case was twice argued, at a former term, first by Leigh for the appellant, and Stanard for the appellee, and again by the same counsel, and by Johnson also for the appellant; but no note of the argument was preserved.

CARR, J. This case presents the question, Whether a contract is legal, by which a sheriff contracts, that another shall exercise the duties of his office, and have all the fees, privileges and emoluments of it, and, in consideration thereof, shall pay to the sheriff a gross sum, unconnected in any manner with the fees of the office? This question depends on our statute, which prohibits the sale of any office, or deputation of office, &c. touching the administration or execution of justice, or the receipt or payment of the public revenue, or any clerkship in a court of record; subjects the persons offending to penalties and disabilities; and pronounces all such bargains and sales, bonds, covenants, &c. utterly void, &c. provided, that nothing in the act shall be so construed as to prohibit the appointment, qualification and acting of any deputy clerk or deputy sheriff, who shall be employed to assist their principals in the execution of their respective offices. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 145, p. 559. This act is taken from 5 and 6 Ed. 6, c. 16, with some difference as to the extent of the law, and also with the exception, that the english statute has no such proviso as ours.

That the enacting part of this law extends to the office of sheriff, is most clear, both from its words and the exception 45 *in the proviso. This was acknowledged on all hands in the argument.

It is settled by many cases, that where an office is within this statute, and the salary is certain, if the principal make a deputation, reserving a less sum out of the salary, it is good; so, if the profits be uncertain, arising from fees, if the principal make a deputation, reserving a certain sum out of the fees and profits of the office, it is good; for in these cases, the deputy is not to pay, unless the profits arise to so much; and, though a deputy, by his constitution, is in place of his principal, yet he has no right to his fees; they still continue to be the principal's; so that, as to him, it is only reserving a part of his own, and giving away the rest to another. But, where the reservation or agreement is not to pay out of the profits, but to pay generally a certain sum, which must be paid at all events, this is a sale of the office; and a bond for the performance of such an agreement is void by the statute. This construction of the law, settled by numerous english cases (Sir Arthur Ingram's case, Co. Litt. 234, a.; Doct. Trevor's case, Cro. Jac. 269; 12 Co. Rep. 78; Woodward v. Foxe, 3 Lev. 289; 2 Vent. 187; 3 Inst. 148; Layng v. Paine, Willes's Rep. 571; Parsons v. Thompson, 1 H. Bl. 322; Garforth v. Fearon, 1 H. Bl. 327; Law v. Law, Ca. Temp. Talb. 140; 3 P. Wms. 391; S. C. Harrington v. Du-Chatel, 1 Bro. C. C. 124), has also been adopted by this court in Noel v. Fisher, 3 Call, 215, a case which arose before our law, and was decided under 5 and 6 Ed. 6, c. 16, then in force here. It being thus settled, that the office of sheriff is within the enacting part of this law, and that a deputation for a sum in gross is a sale of the office, and void; the case at bar must be clearly within the statute, unless the proviso can receive such a construction, as to repeal the enacting clause wholly, so far as relates to the deputation of the offices of sheriff and clerk. It is contended, that this construction must be given to it; and the tenor of the reasoning on which this idea rests is (if I understand it) the following: The proviso must be intended to have

To avoid this absurdity, where the proviso says, that nothing in the act shall prohibit the appointment, qualification and acting of a deputy clerk or sheriff, we must construe it to mean, that nothing in the act shall prohibit the sale of the deputation of clerk or sheriff.

To this reasoning, I cannot assent. There seem to me several insurmountable objections to it. In the construction of statutes we are told from high authority, that "when the words are doubtful and uncertain, it is proper to inquire what was the intent of the legislature; but where they have expressed themselves in plain and clear words, it is very dangerous for judges to launch out too far in searching into their intent." In the enacting clause, the statute prohibits, in the strongest and clearest terms, the sale of certain offices, and deputations of offices: among these, the office of clerk is expressly named, and that of sheriff so described, that the law embraces it just as clearly as if it had been named. The proviso says, that nothing in the act shall prohibit the appointment, qualification and acting of any deputy clerk or deputy sheriff. How can we understand the appointment, qualification and acting of deputy clerks and sheriffs, to mean the sale of the deputation of these offices? does appointment mean sale? can there be no appointment but by a sale? When the law uses words of known and settled meaning, we must give them that meaning. The word appointment is one

47 of frequent use and determinate *meaning, in the law: many statutes regulate the appointment of deputies (sheriffs, clerks, surveyors and others); and I fancy it would puzzle the research of the most indefatigable, to produce a single instance in which the word is used to signify a sale. When the act meant to forbid the sale of offices, it used plain terms, "no person shall bargain or sell any office, &c." If it had intended in the proviso to except from the operation of the act, the sale of the deputations of clerk and sheriff, was it not natural to have used the same terms, and to have said, "nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit the bargain or sale of the deputations of clerk or sheriff?"

This construction not only violates the plain language of the law, but the nature of a proviso also; the office of which is not to repeal the enacting clause, but to modify it. The legislature is not to be supposed to intend to contradict, in the latter clause of a law, what they had enacted in a former; but to limit and explain the general words of the enactment. And this explanation is often out of abundant caution, excepting from the operation of the law, expressly, cases which by fair construction would not have come within its range. But here you make the law say, "no sheriff or clerk shall sell the deputation of his office; provided, nevertheless, that nothing in this act shall be so construed as to prohibit a sheriff or clerk, from selling the deputation of his office. If the legislature had used these words, the courts could not have helped it: but is it right to make them speak thus, by a construction which violates the palpable meaning of the words it has used? and this, on the ground solely, that the proviso, will be inefficient, unless you give it this extent?

But if we must look for the intent of the legislature, what was the general object of this law? It is entitled, "an act against the buying and selling of offices." The preamble to the english statute, from which ours is taken, states the objects to be, to avoid corruption &c. and to the intent, that persons worthy and meet to be advanced to the place where justice is to be administered, or 48 any service of trust executed, *shall hereafter be preferred to the same, and no other &c. In Layng v. Paine, chief justice Willes, in delivering the opinion of the court, says, there were two principal reasons for making that statute; 1. that offices might be exercised by persons of skill and integrity; and 2. that they might take only the legal fees; for (he adds) "those who buy their offices, will be apt to make more than their legal fees, according to what is said 3 Inst. 148, they that buy will sell." Now are not the offices of clerk and sheriff within the mischief and the reason of this statute, as well as the letter? Is it not important to the community, that these offices should be exercised by persons of skill and integrity? Do they not furnish the greatest facilities, and the strongest temptations, to imposition and extortion? What officer is there, so closely and intimately connected with the people, in all their civil relations, as the sheriff? In the collection of taxes, the service of process, the levying of executions, the sale of property, and in various other ways, he has it in his power to harass and oppress them, by means so easy of practice, so difficult of detection, as to offer the strongest possible temptations; so strong indeed, that none but the firmest and most upright minds can be expected to resist them. For the judicious selection of this officer, the law has shewn itself very solicitous, however its provisions may have been neglected or perverted in practice. The justices of the peace, we know, are appointed for their good character, and form a most respectable class of the community: out of this body, the court of every county is directed, annually, to nominate to the governor three persons, one of whom, being approved by the governor with the advice of the privy council, shall be commissioned to execute the office of sheriff. What greater caution could the legislature have observed, to ensure the filling this office by men of skill and honesty? And can we suppose, that this same legislature intended, that so soon as the sheriff was appointed, he should set up his office for sale to the highest bidder? That when passing integrity, with least oppression, extortion, and vexation to the people? By no means: but, which will give me the highest price, and best secure me against the consequences of his misdeeds, should they be discovered? Having secured these points, he makes over his office, and divests himself, so far as he can, of all its duties and its cares. What is the view of the buyer? Not, assuredly, to benefit the people, but to better his own condition; to make money. He has probably been screwed up, by competition, to a high price, and is turned loose upon the people, not merely to indemnify himself (for no man will work for nothing), but to make the most of his bargain; and, having bought for gain, an office presenting so many tempting opportunities for extortion and speculation, who can wonder, that he should seek to improve them to the utmost? And thus would be violated the second great object of the statute against buying and selling of offices, which chief justice Willes states to be, that the legal fees only should be taken; for those who buy their offices will be apt to make more than their legal fees, according to what is said in 3 Inst. "those that buy will sell." Thus, whether we consult the plain language of the law, or the intention of the legislature, it is equally clear to me, that the sale of the deputation of the offices of clerk and sheriff, so far from being sanctioned and legalized, is expressly prohibited.

50 *It was said, that while the enacting clause prohibits the sale of the offices of clerk and sheriff, the proviso only permits the sale of the deputation of those offices, and therefore modifies, rather than contradicts, the clause. But does not the clause forbid the sale of the deputation, as well as of the office itself? If you permit a sheriff to sell out his office, to any one, whom he shall make his deputy, I should like to know, what kind of a sale of his office it is, that you prohibit? or of what practical use such prohibition can be?

It was also contended, that the history of sheriffs, traced from the earliest annals of the state, adds strength to the opinion, that the proviso intended to legalize a sale of the deputation of the office; by shewing, that this office was intended to pass in rotation through the magistracy of the counties, as a reward for their various services; which would be frustrated, unless they could farm their offices out, as it was well known, that both from their age, when the office usually came to them, and from their personal unfitness in many cases, they could neither execute the office themselves, nor superintend its execution. And for these positions, the laws of the colonial government and of the state, and the practice under them, were referred to.

Let us first look to the laws. I deny that, by them, the office was either directed to pass in rotation, except for a short time, or given as a reward. There is in 1 Hen. Stat. at large, p. 224, an extract, taken from a manuscript book, stating, that in 1634, the country was divided into eight shires, &c. And it is added, "And, as in England, sheriffs shall be elected to have the same power as there." This is the first notice of sheriffs in our laws. In the same volume, p. 392 (anno 1655) it is enacted, "that the commissioners (justices) of every county, shall recommend three or more to the governor and council, who shall elect such sheriffs, out of those so recommended, as they &c. shall think most meet and fit for the place." The first act I can find, confining the office of sheriff to justices (then called commissioners) is in 1660-1, 2 Hen. Stat. at large, p. 21, 51 *and the second is 1661-2, Id. p. 78. And the reason assigned for it in the last act, is worthy of notice: "Forasmuch as the commissioners of county courts are, by the laws of this country, answerable for the levies and entreatments of each county, of which the sheriff is usually collector, be it therefore enacted, that none but one of the commissioners of each county shall be sheriff of the county; and further, that the commissioners shall exercise the said office, successively, as they hold their places in commission, every one a whole year and no longer." Here two things are remarkable: 1. the office was not confined to the magistracy by way of reward; 2. they were to take it in succession. This act seems to have remained in force, till 1705 (3 Hen. Stat. at large, p. 246) when a law passed, enacting (among other things) that the court of every county shall yearly present to the governor, a list or recommendation of three such persons (being justices) in the same county court, respectively, as they shall think most fit and able to execute the office of sheriff &c. Here, we find, the principle of the office passing in rotation among the justices expressly repealed, and the courts directed to recommend to the governor three such persons, being justices, as they shall think most fit and able to execute the office of sheriff. And this principle of rotation, thus expressly repealed, has not been revived, nor has it received the least countenance from any succeeding law. On the contrary, from the passage of the above law to the year 1748, upwards of forty years, the principle of selecting persons for their fitness and ability, remained express law, and has, in my opinion, given the rule which ought to have governed ever since. For, though the law of 1748 (which has been followed in all the subsequent revisions) says, the justices shall annually present to the governor a list of three persons of their body (omitting the words, "such persons as they shall think most fit and able"); yet, as the principle of rotation had been expressly repealed, I cannot see what rule ought to have guided their selection, but the superior fitness

52 and ability of the persons *chosen; and this, more especially, if it should appear that the office of sheriff was not given to the justices for their benefit or as a reward for their services. This, I think, does appear; 1. from the law before quoted, which assigns a different reason for confining the office to the justices; and 2. from the consideration, that in that early day, when the counties were thinly inhabited and poor, the office was rather a burthen than a benefit: a conclusion greatly strengthened by the fact, that in 1710, the legislature found itself obliged to compel the acceptance of the office, by inflicting the heavy penalty of five thousand pounds of tobacco, on any person commissioned, who should refuse to act; unless such person should make oath, before the court of the county, that he hath used his best endeavour, truly and bona fide, without any covin or collusion, to get security for his performance thereof, and that he could not obtain such security. It is further provided by the act, who hath served as sheriff of a county, shall be liable to the forfeitures of the act, for refusing to serve a second time, unless every person named in the commission of the peace, hath actually after him served in the office of sheriff, or paid the fine for refusal. This act continued in force, I believe, till the revival of 1792, the penalty being reduced from time to time. Now, I ask, can better evidence be wanting, to show, that at the passage of this law, the office was a burthen rather than a benefit? Do we find it necessary to compel by penalties the acceptance of favours, benefits or rewards? To make a man purge himself, by oath in open court, of the suspicion of attempting to evade the acceptance and enjoyment of these rewards, by covin and collusion? If the office had been profitable, would we have seen a proviso exempting a man who had served once, from forfeiture for refusing a second service, unless every other justice had also borne the burthen since his service? These considerations satisfy me, that when the law passed confining the office to the justices, it was a thing rather to be avoided than sought after, and not given to them as a reward for services,

That in the lapse of years, and the progress of society, the office has become valuable, can certainly have no effect upon the original intention of the legislature. That the practice (since my day at least) has been to appoint the justices to the office in rotation, I admit; how far back it commenced, I know not. As a commentary on the law, it would have weight in a doubtful case, but where the law is clear it must speak for itself.

It was also contended, that though the sale of the sheriff's office be not permitted by law, yet it has been the general idea, that it was so, and the universal practice to farm it out; and that this common error makes it lawful. I cannot assent to this position. The sale of the deputation of this office is expressly forbidden by the statute, unless the proviso excepts it. I have shewn it does not. Here, then, we have the statute law prohibiting the sale under a severe penalty, and declaring the bond given as the price of it void: and we have the law of common error, holding the sale and the bond good. Which shall we follow? We cannot serve two masters. To me it seems, that we can know no law but that derived from the law-making power; and that, in opposition to such laws, error, however common, however hoary, can impose on us no obligation. We ought, in such cases, to examine the law thoroughly, and see clearly, that the common opinion is erroneous, before we decide: but, having done this, and finding that we must either violate the law or correct the error, I cannot conceive how we should hesitate in our course. And this, I think, has been the opinion of this court. No error could be more prevalent, than that one bond would answer for the two years of the sheriff's office; but this court did not, therefore, shrink from correcting it. It was equally the general opinion, that you might fine a sheriff, toties quoties, for failing to return an execution; and this was the constant practice: the question, however, at length came before this court, and the error was corrected. It was said, in the argument of 54 the case of Wernick and M'Murdo, also, that the opinion and *practice were old and general, that an administrator de bonis non could sue the representative of a former executor, for assets wasted or converted by him: this court, however, took up the question upon the law, not of public opinion, but of the land; and decided, that he could not. Other cases, I have no doubt, might be mentioned.

It was also said, that if we decide, that a deputation of the office of sheriff for a sum in gross, is a sale, it will have no other effect than to add four words to the bargain, and make the price payable out of the profits. What consequences may follow our decision, is not, as I conceive, the exact question before us. That question is, whether by such deputation for a gross sum, the law is violated which forbids a sale? If it be, we must say so, though the heavens should fall. That such deputation is a sale, was admitted as settled law; and the cases proving it are too numerous to cite. The law, then, pronounces the contract void, and all bonds given under it. If this law may be easily evaded, that can be no reason for our refusing to execute it, though a proper ground for amendment by the legislature.

Upon the whole, I think both bonds, that of the deputy and of the sub-deputy void; and that the motion being on them, cannot be sustained; and, therefore, that the judgment of the court below should be reversed.

GREEN, J. This case presents the question, Whether the respective contracts between M'Kinney and Gillingwaters, and the latter and Salling, were void under our statute prohibiting the buying and selling of offices?

That statute relates to all such offices, or the deputations of them, or of any part of them, as in any wise touch or concern the administration of the executive government, or the administration or execution of justice, or the receipt or payment of the public revenue, or any clerkship in a court of record; and prohibits all persons to bargain or sell

55 the same, or to receive or take any thing directly or indirectly *for the same, or for a vote in appointing thereto, or to take any promise, agreement &c. for the payment of any thing for the same, or for a vote in appointing thereto, under the penalty of being incapable of appointing, or voting for the appointment, to any such office or deputation thereof, or of any part thereof, and of being disabled to hold the office, in virtue of which they hold the right to appoint, or to vote in the appointment to the same, and of being amerced and imprisoned, and if a member of the assembly, of being expelled, and incapable of being afterwards elected. And every person giving or paying, or making a promise, agreement &c. to give or pay, anything for the appointment, or for a vote in the appointment, to any such office or deputation thereof, or of any part thereof, is declared incapable of serving in any such office. It moreover declares, that every such bargain, sale, promise, agreement &c. shall be void: with two provisos: 1. that nothing therein contained shall be so construed as to prohibit the appointment, qualification and acting of any deputy clerk or deputy sheriff, who shall be employed to assist their principals in the execution of their respective offices; 2. that all acts done by any person so offending, by authority or colour of the office or deputation thereof which ought to be forfeited, before he be removed from the office or deputation, shall be valid in such like manner as if the act had never been made.

This statute was taken literally from that of the 5 and 6 Ed. 6, c. 16, with the exception of the proviso in our act in respect to deputy clerks and sheriffs, and of offices touching the administration of the executive government, which are not in the english statute, and of many offices embraced in that which are not touched by our act, none such existing here. The settled construction of the english statute, is, that whenever the agreement is that the deputy shall do all the duties, and receive all the emoluments, of an office, the profits of which are uncertain, and depending upon fees, and shall in consideration thereof pay, or agree to pay, a gross sum to the principal, it is a sale 56 prohibited by the statute. *But if he only engages to pay a stipulated sum out of the fees, it does not fall within it. And this was the construction adopted by this court in the case of a sale of the deputation of the office of sheriff, in Noel v. Fisher, 3 Call 215, a case which arose upon a transaction before our statute was enacted, and when the english statute was in force here.

There can be no doubt but that the enacting part of the statute extends to the office of sheriff, which emphatically touches and concerns the execution of justice, and the receipt and payment of the public revenue. The only question is, Whether the deputation of that office is wholly excepted out of the enacting clauses by the proviso?

The literal terms of the proviso import, that only the case of a deputy employed to assist the principal in the execution of his office, and not one employed to do the whole of its duties, is intended to be excepted from the operation of the enacting clauses. Yet, if the proviso was expunged from the act, the employment of a deputy to do the whole of the duties, would not be prohibited. And it is contrary to the nature of a proviso to enlarge the operation of the enacting clauses. To employ a deputy to do the whole business of the office, paying him a fixed sum, or giving him all its emoluments (except a given sum to be paid by him out of them), as a compensation for his services, would, therefore, be the employment of a deputy to assist his principal, within the meaning of the proviso. But there was no occasion for any proviso, to except such a case from the enacting clauses, since without the proviso, the case would not fall within the prohibitions of the statute. The only case in which a deputation of the office could come within the enacting clause, is that where the deputy paid or agreed to pay for it, a gross sum, at all events, and independently of the amount of the fees: and if the proviso does not except such a case, it has no effect whatever. For, in that case, the statute would, in respect to the deputation of the office of sheriff, read in effect thus: No sheriff shall sell the deputation of his office, provided 57 however, that this shall not be *so construed as to prohibit a deputation made without a sale; which would be absurd, unless there were some doubt, whether the office could be deputed or not, and the proviso was inserted for greater caution, and to sanction deputations which were not contrary to the enacting clause. But there was no shadow of doubt upon that point; for the office of deputy sheriff had been recognized by our statutes, and regulated from the earliest periods of our legislation; and so the office of deputy clerk was also recognized, and only a few years before an oath prescribed to be taken by him, before he could be permitted to act as such.

It was argued, that the offices of clerk and sheriff, and deputations of them, being embraced within the enacting clause, especially that of the former, which is mentioned by name, a construction which would exempt the deputations of them from the operation of the statute, would give to the proviso, not the effect of modifying the general provisions of the enacting clause, but of taking from its operation entirely, one of the cases at least which was embraced by it in express terms, that of the office of clerk of a court of record. A particular attention to the frame of the act, which follows literally that of the english statute, in which there is a proviso excepting certain offices, will shew, that such would not be the effect of that construction. It begins with prohibiting the sale of any office or offices, or the deputation of any office or offices, or any part or parcel of any of them, or the receiving money &c. for any office or offices, or the deputation of any office or offices, or of any part or parcel of any of them, or for a vote in appointing to any office or offices, or the deputation of any office or offices, or any part or parcel of them; and then describes the offices, as being those only which shall in any wise touch &c. The general object of the act being to prohibit the sale not only of offices of a particular description, but the deputation thereof, or of any part thereof, with only two exceptions, not of the offices, but of their deputations only, the most simple method was to announce, in the first instance, a general prohibition, *and then the particular exceptions, not of any office particularly designated in the several prohibitions, but of its deputation only. Thus, notwithstanding the proviso, the offices of clerk and sheriff may be sold contrary to the statute, or at least a vote in the appointment to them may be so sold; as if any justice of the peace should receive a reward for giving his vote in the appointment of a clerk, or the nomination of a sheriff; or any judge for the appointment, or a vote in the appointment, of any clerk; or a member of the executive, for a vote in the appointment of a sheriff. These cases would fall clearly within the denunciations of the statute.

These considerations would incline me strongly to the opinion, if we were not to look beyond the terms of the statute itself, that the sale of the deputation of the offices of clerk and sheriff, was not embraced by the statute. Other circumstances lead to the same conclusion.

One of these is to be found in the history of the office of sheriffs in Virginia. Until 1655, sheriffs were elected. An act was then passed, directing that the justice of the peace in each county (then called commissioners), should nominate three or more, out of which the governor and council should commission one as sheriff. In 1660, it was enacted, that the office should be conferred upon the commissioners in succession. And so the case remained until 1705; when it was enacted, that no person but a justice of the peace should be appointed sheriff, and that the county courts should annually nominate three justices, one of whom should be commissioned, and that a sheriff might be continued for two years and no longer, the former laws, from 1657 downwards, having prohibited any sheriff, or under-sheriff, to serve for more than one year. In 1710, a heavy penalty was imposed upon any one, who was commissioned, and refused to act. This penalty was, from time to time, gradually moderated and finally dropped at the revival of 1792.

Although the laws subsequent to 1705, imposed upon the county court and executive, no obligation to nominate and 59 *appoint the justices in succession to the office of sheriff; yet the invariable practice has always been, and still is, to pursue that course (which is considered as a matter of right), unless there be some very serious objection to the propriety of appointing the senior justice who has not already held the office. The office, although formerly burthensome, and imposed upon the justices under a heavy penalty, has long since been of some value, and considered as a reward and the only one given to them for their important public services. These justices have been uniformly selected from the most valuable and respectable classes of our community, have borne the chief burthen of the administration of justice, and the whole of that of the internal police of the country. They have, in a great degree, composed our legislative bodies. The office of sheriff, devolving on them in succession, generally comes to them at an advanced age, and when they are unfitted, from that cause, as well as from their previous course of life, and other occupations, to discharge in detail the duties of the office, or even to superintend personally the discharge of those duties by others: and they have, as was to be expected, almost invariably, so far as I am informed, and as indeed is perfectly notorious, formed their offices to others, without being conscious of violating any law, either municipal or moral. This practice must have been well known to the legislature, which enacted the law in question. And this induces a belief, that the proviso was intended to except the deputation of this office from the general terms of the statute. In a doubtful case, the state of things, to which the provisions of a statute were intended to be applied, may properly be resorted to, as a means of ascertaining its true construction.

Another circumstance entitled to some weight, is, that the statutes of 4 Hen. 4, c. 5, and 26 Hen. 6, c. 10, which expressly prohibited a sheriff to farm (that is to sell the deputation of his office), were in force here, when the legislature were engaged in the business of re-enacting such of the british statutes, as it was thought fit to adopt into our *code, as preparatory to the abolition of all the english statutes. And though the statute of Ed. 6, was in substance enacted here, and all our own statutes, respecting the office and duties of sheriff, were also revised and brought into one; yet it was not thought fit to adopt the prohibition of the statutes of Hen. 4, and Hen. 6, of farming the office of sheriff. On the contrary, in re-enacting the statute of Ed. 6, which, whilst it would have prohibited the farming, but not the deputation without sale, of the office, if the proviso in question had not been inserted, they inserted that proviso, for no purpose that I can perceive, but to prevent the operation, which the statute would otherwise have had, in prohibiting the farming of the office.

If, however, these circumstances are not sufficient to justify the conclusion, that, upon the literal construction of the statute the sale of the deputation of the office of sheriff, is excepted from its provisions; still the construction is so doubtful, and the practice in question has so long prevailed, and is so extensive, and the consequences of holding it illegal so extensively ruinous, that if there be any case, to which the maxim communis error facit jus can apply, this is surely one. That maxim has been held in England to sanction practices even expressly against the statutes: Clay v. Sudgrave, 1 Salk. 33; Walton v. Spark, Comb. 321; Herbert v. Binion, Roll. Rep. 223; East Ind. Company v. Skinner, Comb. 342.

If this practice were held to be illegal, and the original contract of deputation held to be void, all collateral contracts of indemnity, or otherwise founded on it, as their consideration, would also be void, and the parties subjected to the high penalties imposed by the law; and, in both respects, very great numbers of persons would be involved: while such a decision would have no effect whatever in preventing the future mischief, which might arise from the practice; since it would only serve to admonish the parties of the necessity of adding to the terms of their contracts, four words *(out of the profits), which would not vary the substance of the contract, while it would make it unquestionably valid.

If I am right in these views, the argument, that the sale of public offices is malum in se, and against the principles of the common law, and amount to bribery and extortion, is sufficiently answered.

Upon the whole, I think the contract between M'Kinney and Gillingwaters was valid; and that between the latter and Salling, whether valid or void, can in no way affect M'Kinney, since he was not privy to it. All that we can infer from the facts in the record, is, that M'Kinney having sold the deputation of his whole office to Gillingwaters, the latter substituted Salling to a part of it, and M'Kinney at his instance admitted the latter as his deputy; he giving surety to M'Kinney, to indemnify him against any loss arising from his acts as deputy, and not to Gillingwaters to indemnify him. Salling was therefore bound to see that the revenue collected by him was paid into the treasury, so as to indemnify the high sheriff, and paid it over to Gillingwaters at his own peril. The judgment should be affirmed.

COALTER, J., and CABELL, J., concurred.

BROOKE, President. I do not think it of any importance, to inquire into the history of the shrievalty in Virginia, or to ascertain from it, when and whether it was a valuable office, or in what degree it was intended as compensation to the magistrates of the counties; as very little if any light is to be borrowed from those topics, to illustrate the construction of our statute against buying and selling offices, passed in 1792, and which (with the exception of the 4th section) is a copy of the 5 and 6 Ed. 6, then in force here. That it was the practice to sell the deputation of the office of sheriff, either for a gross sum, or a sum to be paid out of the fees of the office, at the time the act of 1792 was passed, there can be no doubt. The first section of that act disables the persons holding the offices therein described, from holding them, *who shall bargain or sell any office or offices, or receive or take any money, fee or reward, or any profit, directly or indirectly, or take any promise, agreement, covenant, bond or assurance, for any office or offices, or the deputation of any office or offices, or any part or parcel of those which shall in any wise touch or concern the administration of the executive government, or the administration or execution of justice, or the receipt or payment of the public revenue, by declaring, in the latter part of the section, that every person, so offending, shall be incapable of appointing or voting for the appointment to such office, and shall be adjudged a disabled person in law &c. plainly, and in terms, including and interdicting the deputation of, or appointment to, the office of deputy sheriff, among others, for any fee or reward &c. The second section, corresponding with the first, disqualifies the person, receiving the deputation or appointment of such offices, on the terms interdicted in the first section, from holding or serving in such offices. And the third section declares, that such bargain, sale, promise, bond, covenant, agreement or assurance, (referring to all those interdicted in the first section,) shall be utterly void and of no effect. And then comes the proviso in the fourth section, on the construction of which the case before us depends: it is, that nothing in the act contained, shall be so construed as to prohibit the appointment, qualification and acting of any deputy clerk or deputy sheriff, who shall be employed to assist their principals, in the execution of their respective offices. To give to this section no effect at all, would be a monstrous construction of the act. Though it is admitted, that examples may be found in some of our statutes, in which the legislature, for greater caution, have, by a proviso, excepted a case not before in the act; yet no example can be found, in which a case plainly within the terms of the statute, has been held to be unaffected by a proviso, obviously (as in this instance) intended to take it out of the act, upon any construction of the act founded on its policy, and not on the terms of the proviso.

63 Such an example would justify the *court, in almost any case, in departing from the plain letter of a statute, and giving to it a construction, drawn from what it might suppose a wiser and better policy.

The first section of the act plainly interdicts the buying and selling a large description of offices, including that of deputy sheriff; an office which, it must be admitted, it was the practice to sell, under the existing restrictions upon the abuse of the power, not altogether applicable to other offices, viz. the control of the law, which requires an oath to be taken by the deputy sheriff in open court, and of the court also, which might for good reasons object to his qualification. And to except this office from its operation, and also that of deputy clerk, was not so violent an outrage on the whole policy of the first section as seems to be supposed. To insist, that the proviso means only to except the sale of such office for a sum to be paid out of its fees, would be to give it no effect; as such sale was not within the first section of the act. It was known to the legislature, when the act was passed, to have been so decided by the english judges, on the statute 5 and 6 Ed. 6, from which it copied the section. But the proviso, in its terms, is not susceptible of such an ineffectual construction of its meaning: in it is employed the very language of the first section. It is not to be so construed, as to except the naked appointment &c. of an deputy clerk or deputy sheriff, no appointment of either being prohibited by the first section (but on the contrary indirectly provided for) unless made for fee, reward &c. In terms, too, the proviso applies to the third section, which makes void all bargains, sales &c. Its terms are, that nothing in this act contained (including all its sections) shall be so construed &c. plainly, I think, excepting from the act, the operation of the third section also on bargains, sales &c. entered into for the office of deputy sheriff.

The decision in the case of Noel v. Fisher, in this court, if it can have any influence, is favourable to this construction of our act. That decision was on the english statute, from which the first three sections in our statute are substantially

64 *copied. It was in a case arising before the passage of our act of 1792. It pronounced a bond, taken for the office of deputy sheriff, for a gross sum (not to be paid out of the fees of office), to be void, as the english courts had before done, on the statute of Ed. 6. And it can hardly be doubted, that, though that decision was after our statute upon a case arising before it, the law of it was well known to the legislature from the english decisions long before; and it is not conceivable, that in the fourth section of our act (the proviso), it meant to take a case out of the operation of it, which had never been considered as within the act of Ed. 6, but the contrary, by the english judges. I think such a construction inadmissible on every ground, and that the case before us is within the proviso; and that, therefore, the judgment must be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

February, 1829.

Pleading—Plea of Actio Non—Conclusion—Case at Bar.—Sci. fa. by husband and wife, upon a judgment recovered by wife bum sola, suggesting that since rendition of the judgment, the wife had intermarried with the husband. Plea, actio non, because at the date of the emanation of the sci. fa. the wife was not married to the husband as suggested in the writ: concluding to the country. And plea held naught, upon general demurrer: 1. because the matter of it is properly pleadable in abatement only, not in bar; 2. because it neither distinctly negatives the fact suggested in the writ, nor affirms any matter to avoid the action; and 3. because, instead of concluding with a verification, it concludes to the country.

William Fouchee and Mildred his wife sued out of the circuit court of Frederick, a scire facias against Thomas Buck and Anne his wife, dated the 14th November 1822, and returnable at the rules, the first Monday in December following; which, reciting 65 that the said Mildred had, in *October 1821, recovered by the judgment of the said court, 1500 dollars damages for slander uttered by the said Anne, and 133 dollars for costs of suit, and "that since the rendering of the said judgment, the said Mildred had intermarried with the said Fouchee," and that execution of the judgment yet remained to be made, required the said Thomas Buck and Anne his wife to appear at the rule day aforesaid, and shew cause, if any they could, why Fouchee and wife should not have execution of the said judgment &c.

The scire facias was duly executed and returned; and, at December rules 1822, a conditional judgment was entered in the office against the defendants, for the debt in the writ mentioned.

At May term 1823, the death of the defendant Anne was suggested on the record, and the writ abated as to her: And on the motion of the defendant Thomas Buck, the conditional judgment entered at the rules, was set aside; And thereupon,

He filed a special demurrer to the scire facias (wherein it was called a declaration) shewing for cause, that the plaintiffs alleged in the scire facias, a marriage between themselves, without stating when or where it was solemnized. This demurrer was overruled by the court.

And he pleaded, 1. nul tiel record; to which the plaintiffs replied generally; and the court, on inspection, found that there was such a record.

2. He pleaded a special plea, in these words, viz: "And the said defendant, by leave of the court &c. for further plea &c. says, that the said plaintiffs ought not to have or maintain their action aforesaid thereof against him; because he says, that at the date of the emanation of the said scire facias, the said William Fouchee was not married to the said Mildred, as is alleged in their declaration; and of this he puts himself upon the country."

To this second plea, the plaintiffs replied, by way of estoppel, that the plaintiff Mildred recovered the judgment 66 *against Thomas Buck and Anne his wife, at October term 1821; that, on the 11th May 1822, the plaintiff Mildred sued out a capias ad satisfaciendum against Buck and wife, upon which Buck being taken in execution, he surrendered property in discharge of his body, and gave a forthcoming bond for the property, with one Blakemore his surety; and, that a motion being made, at October term 1822, for an award of execution on this forthcoming bond, Buck and Blakemore, his surety, resisted the motion, and moved the court to quash the bond; and the court did accordingly quash the bond, and the execution in consequence of which it had been taken, "it appearing to the satisfaction of the court, as had been insisted by the counsel for Buck, that the plaintiff Mildred, soon after the rendition of the judgment upon which the execution was issued, intermarried with William Fouchée, and was at the time the execution issued, and at the time the forthcoming bond was taken, a feme covert, and that a scire facias ought to have been awarded against the said Thomas Buck and Anne his wife, before execution on the said judgment could regularly be issued." The replication sets forth all these proceedings, at large in hæc verba, and prays judgment, if Buck be not thereby estopped from pleading the matter of his second plea.

To this replication, Buck demurred generally: the plaintiffs joined in the demurrer: and the court held that the law was for the plaintiffs, and gave judgment for the debt in the sci. fa. mentioned. And Buck appealed to this court.

The cause was argued at a former term, when only three judges were present, by Johnson for the appellant, and Stanard for the appellee; and the judges, then sitting, were of opinion, that the judgment ought to be affirmed; but, at Johnson's instance, they directed that the cause should be argued again before a full court. It was argued again, by the same counsel at the present term. Both arguments preceded the appointment of the reporter, and no note of them was preserved.

67 *GREEN, J. The real questions in this cause arise out of the second plea, alleging that the plaintiff was not married at the time of the emanation of the scire facias, the replication thereto, and the general demurrer to the replication, which leads us up to the first fault in the pleadings.

There was, indeed, a special demurrer to the scire facias, for the want of an allegation of the time and place of the suggested marriage of the plaintiffs, which will be noticed, incidentally, in considering the first objection to the plea; which is, that it pleads in bar matter which goes only in abatement. This, if true, is an error of substance, and fatal upon a general demurrer. To notice a few of the many adjudged cases to that effect: Isam & Paget v. Hitchcock, Cro. Eliz. 202; Justice v. White, 1 Mod. 239; Wallis v. Savil, Lut.

41; Crosse v. Bilson, 2 Ld. Raym. 1016. In these cases, matters going only in abatement, being pleaded in bar, and the pleadings terminating in general demurrers, judgments were given against the defendants for that cause only, and for the reason assigned by chief justice Holt, in the last mentioned case, that a plea in bar, admitting that the suit is well brought, and opposing nothing but matter in abatement to the plaintiff's demand, judgment final should be given for the plaintiff, as in case of nil dicit, or any other plea containing no matter of defence.

All the elementary writers and reported cases which I have seen, treat the matter of this plea, when pleaded to an action by husband and wife, as going in abatement only; and I have met with no suggestion, any where, to the contrary, which is entitled to the least respect. 1 Chitt. plead. 441; Tidd's prac. (old edi.) 179; Com. Dig. Abatement, E. 6; 3 Instruct. Cler. 69; Theloall's Dig. lib. II. c. 2, § 8, (referred to in Comyns ubi supra, and in 4 Vin. Abr. Baron and Feme, C. b. pl. 9, p. 184, and citing 11 Ed. 3, Brief, 476,) year book 39 Ed. 3, 32 (cited by Comyns); Alleyne and wife v. Grey, 1 Show. 50; 2 Salk. 437; Comb. 131, in which the matter was pleaded in abatement, as appears by Comberback's report of the case; as it was in Bickerstaffe and wife v. Percy, 2 Lev. 207; 3 Keb. 810, as appears by Keble's report. In Theloall's Dig. lib. II. c. 2, § 12, (citing 7 H. 6, 13, and 50 Ed. 3, 15,) it is said, "so in assize by baron and feme, or debt, or trespass, not his feme is a good plea to the writ: but in dower, or appeal of the death of her husband, it ought to be ne unques accouple in lawful matrimony with the deceased;" and Ibid. § 13, (citing truly 11 H. 4, 13). "In appeal by baron of the ravishment of his feme, it was pleaded ne unques accouple &c. and the plea was accepted." 4 Vin. Abr. Baron & Feme, C. b. pl. 23, 24, p. 186.

These are all the reported cases that I have met with, in which this matter has been pleaded to an action by husband and wife, except those of Machell and wife v. Garrett, 3 Salk. 64; 12 Mod. 276, and Jones's case, Comb. 473, the reports of which do not inform us, whether the pleas were in abatement or in bar. The case, however, of Blake v. Dodemead and wife, 2 Ld. Raym. 1504, in the decision of which the courts of common pleas and king's bench concurred, is decisive of this question. There, to a scire facias by husband and wife, upon a judgment obtained by the wife dum sola, and which suggested the intermarriage of the plaintiffs after the judgment, without stating the time or place of marriage, the defendants demurred specially for that cause; and judgment was given for the plaintiffs; the court holding, that although all material facts, which go to the point of the action, must be pleaded with a venue, yet that such as go only to the person of the plaintiff, or to the point of the writ, need not be so stated, they being only in abatement; and that the question, whether married or not, was matter of the latter character.

Upon this mass of uncontroverted evidence of the uniform opinions of the profession upon this subject, from the time of Ed. 3, downwards we may safely conclude, that the plea of never married, to an action by husband and wife, in personal actions at least is only proper in abatement without going into the large field of inquiry as to 69 the grounds of distinction, *upon principle, between matter in abatement and matter in bar. I shall only add, that it is a settled rule, that the question, whether one suing in autre droit (as an executor or administrator) be entitled to the character he assumes, is a matter in abatement only. And a husband, suing with his wife for her choses in action, sues in her right only; for if he die before recovery, the right and action survive to her; or if she die, he can neither claim the subject, nor prosecute the action, as husband. And this distinguishes the case of a husband and wife suing for her property, from those of a widow suing for her dower, or a wife appealing another of the death of her husband, or a husband appealing another of the ravishment of his wife, in which they sue in their own right, and the marriage, and that a lawful marriage, is an indispensable ingredient in their title, the want of which goes in bar of their suit; while, in the other case, a marriage in fact, whether lawful or not, is sufficient; as was decided in several of the cases before cited, Alleyne and wife v. Grey, Jones's case, and Machell and wife v. Garrett.

But suppose this matter might be properly pleaded in bar, the plea is liable to several other objections, which are fatal upon general demurrer. The scire facias suggests a marriage after the judgment and before the emanation of the writ. The plea is, that the plaintiffs were not married at the time of the emanation of the writ. These allegations are not inconsistent with each other, and the last does not negative the first; for there might have been a marriage after the judgment, as suggested in scire facias, which might have been dissolved by a divorce before the emanation of the scire facias, and so the plaintiffs not married at the date of the scire facias, as alleged in the plea. And this must be considered as the effect of the plea; for if it was intended to deny the fact of the marriage, the plea should have averred that the plaintiffs were never married and might then have properly concluded to the country, since then there would have been a direct affirmative and negative, in respect to the same fact. When a plea is 70 equivocal, it is to be taken *most strongly against the pleader, 1 Chitt. plead. 521. The scire facias did not suggest a continuance of the marriage at the time of suing it out, nor was it necessary that it should: that was an intendment of law, which presumes an existing state of things to continue until the contrary is shewn. And no issue can be taken on a legal inference, nor can it be denied in pleading, but the facts which avoid it must be stated, so as to enable the court to judge of their legal effect. Every material fact averred by one party, and not denied by the other, in pleading, is admitted: And the averment that the plaintiffs were not married at the date of the scire facias, admitted that they were married before, as alleged on the other side; as, in Alleyne and wife v. Grey, the plea that the plaintiff were not lawfully married, was held to be an admission that they had (as they alleged) been married in fact, and only to put the lawfulness of the marriage in issue. The legal inference, that the marriage, once existing, continued, could only be repelled, by shewing the fact by which it was dissolved, or ceased to continue. That could only be by a divorce from the bonds of matrimony. A divorce from bed and board does not dissolve the marriage, nor affect the marital rights of the husband in respect to his wife's choses in action. Stephens v. Tott, Mo. 665; Motam v. Motam, Roll's Rep. 426, cited 18 Vin. Abr. prohibition Q. pl. 10, 11, p. 3. And a divorce could only be the consequence of a legislative act, or a judicial sentence. The plea in question, therefore, proposed to refer to the jury, all these questions of law, and the effect of the act dissolving the marriage; all of which should have been referred to the court, by a plea distinctly stating the matter by which it was insisted the marriage had been dissolved; as was done in the case before cited 39 Ed. 3, 33, when the plea stated a divorce by an ecclesiastical court specified, and that from the bonds of matrimony, on account of the marriage being before the age of assent, and a subsequent dissent. Upon the ground, then, that the plea neither denied 71 directly any facts suggested in the scire *facias, nor alleged any fact directly to avoid their effect, it was fatally defective, even if it had concluded, as it ought to have done, with a verification.

If, however, it were admitted, that the matter of the plea was pleadable in bar, and well pleaded in other respects, the conclusion to the country was an error of substance and fatal on a general demurrer. This was the only ground of the former judgment of the court given in this case; which, after the fullest consideration, I still think was right. After a conclusion to the country, all pleading is closed except to demur, or join issue by a similitur; and as no issue can be made up, without an express averment on the one side, and a direct negative on the other, of the same fact, it is error to conclude a plea to the country, which does not directly deny some matter directly averred on the other side. The plea in this case denied nothing which had been alleged on the other side, but sought to avoid the matter alleged on the part of the plaintiffs, by the allegation of a distinct fact, that the parties were not married at the date of the scire facias, to which they ought to have had an opportunity of replying. That such an improper conclusion is fatal on general demurrer, is uniformly affirmed, by the adjudged cases; of which those of Cowper v. Towers, 1 Lutw. 98, and Charleston v. Finney, 1 Sid. 215, are strongly in point.

Without considering the effect of the estoppel relied on, I think the judgment should be affirmed upon the manifold defects of the plea in matters of substance.

The other judges concurred, and the judgment was affirmed.

February, 1820.

Contracts—Between Master and Slave—Validity.—

Contract between master and slave, whereby the master agreed to emancipate the slave, for $1000 to be paid by the slave to him, of which the slave paid $566. HELD, that the chancellor cannot, on a bill by the slave against the master, enforce such contract so partly performed.

Same—Same.—Held, generally, that the chancellor cannot enforce any contract between master and slave, though it be fully performed on the slave's part.

Robert Gibbon, on the 11th December 1818, agreed with his slave Richard Singleton, the appellee, that he would sell him to himself, or in other words, that he would emancipate him, in consideration of the sum of a thousand dollars to be paid to him by the slave. Of this sum, 400 dollars were to be paid in cash, 300 were to be secured to be paid on the 1st January 1820, and the other 300 on the 1st January 1821. The 400 dollars were paid accordingly, in cash, by the appellee; and William Foushee and Andrew Stevenson, as his friends, executed their joint notes or bonds to Gibbon, for the two sums of 300 dollars each, payable as aforesaid. But no deed of emancipation was executed by Gibbon. On the contrary, Foushee and Stevenson required, as a security for their indemnification, that Gibbon should convey the slave to them, by bill of sale in due form; which was done accordingly. The intention of the parties, however, was that the slave should be emancipated whenever he should pay to his former master, or to his sureties, the amount of the notes. He was thereupon permitted by Foushee and Stevenson to go at large and act as a freeman, for the purpose of raising the funds necessary for the completion of his right to freedom. It appears, that he paid to Gibbon at different times, in part of the first note, the sum of 166 dollars, which with the 400 paid at the commencement of the transaction, amounted to 566 dollars. He contended, that he also paid to William Foushee other sums, in the confidence that he would pay them over to his former master: but this was denied by Foushee. In January 1821, after both notes

73 had become due, Gibbon insisted on immediate *payment; and as the appellee was unable to pay the money, and Foushee and Stevenson were unwilling to advance it for him, an arrangement was made with Gibbon, by which they re-conveyed the slave to him, in consideration of his delivering up their notes. Gibbon appears to have been still very willing to give freedom to the appellee, provided he could have got the balance of the money. The appellee commenced this suit, in forma pauperis, in the superior court of chancery of Richmond against Foushee, Stevenson and Gibbon: and that court decreed, that the appellee was free, and entitled to all the immunities of a free man of colour; and that Foushee and Stevenson should pay to the administrators of Gibbon (who had died pending the suit) the money due on their notes, with interest thereon. From this decree Stevenson appealed to this court.

Leigh for the appellant, and Nicholas assigned counsel for the appellee, submitted the case, without argument.

CABELL, J., delivered the opinion of the court. In the case of Sawney v. Carter, 6 Rand. 173, this court refused, on great consideration, to enforce a promise by a master to emancipate his slave, where the conditions of the promise had been partly complied with by the slave. It is impossible to distinguish that case from this. The court proceeded on the principle, that it is not competent to a court of chancery to enforce a contract between master and slave, even although the contract should be fully complied with on the part of the slave. The decree of the chancellor must be reversed and the bill dismissed.

February, 1820.

Wills—Constructions—Per Stirpes—Per Capita*—Case

at Bar.—John Crow bequeathed, that the balance of his slaves should be divided equally between his children, to wit, the heirs of W. C. [a deceased son of testator], naming them, seven in number, T. C., M. C. and J. C. [sons of testator], and the children of his deceased daughters, M. J. and S. C. but the children of his daughters M. J. and S. C. should take, respectively, only such part as their mothers respectively would take if still alive, that is to say, a child's part. HELD, that the seven children of the deceased son took equally per capita with the testator's three living sons, and the children of his two deceased daughters took per stirpes, each, their mother's part.

This case originated in the county court of Essex, whence it was carried by appeal to the superior court of chancery of Fredericksburg, and brought thence by appeal to this court.

John Crow, by his last will and testament, after having by previous provisions, disposed of his land and some slaves and other property, bequeathed as follows: "I devise and direct, that the balance of my slaves shall be equally divided between my children, to wit, the heirs of William Crow, namely, William, Robert, Patsey, Nancy, Henry, Ennis, and John, (heirs of William Crow deceased,) Thomas, Moses, John Crow, and the children of my deceased daughter Massey Jones, and the children of my deceased daughter Sarah Crane, to them and their heirs; but the children of my daughter Massey Jones are to take only such part as their mother would take if she was still alive, that is to say, a child's part; and in like manner, the children of my daughter Sarah Crane are to take only such part as their mother would take, if

It is well settled that a contract between a master and his slave, for the future emancipation of the slave cannot be enforced against the master, although it may have been fully performed on the part of the slave. Shue v. Turk, 15 Gratt. 265, 276, citing Sawney v. Carter, 6 Rand. 173; Stevenson v. Singleton, 1 Leigh 72. To the same effect the principal case is cited in *Bailey v. she was still alive, that is to say, a child's part."

William Crow deceased, and Thomas, Moses and John Crow, were sons of the testator. It appears from the will, that the testator had one child, Mrs. Whooston, who was living at the date of his will, and 75 that he had had another *child who was then dead, neither of whom is mentioned in the bequest above quoted. He made a distinct provision for Mrs. Whooston; and as to the property given her, he provided, that "if she should die without a living heir, it should return to his estate."

The county court and the chancellor both held, that the residue of the testator's slaves should be divided into six parts, or shares, and one share allotted to the seven children of William Crow deceased, among them, one to each of the testator's sons, Thomas, Moses and John Crow, one to the children of Mrs. Jones, and one to the children of Mrs. Crane. The children of William Crow appealed to this court.

Johnson, for the appellants, said, that under the first part of the bequest, to the seven children of William Crow by name, to the three sons of the testator by name, and to the children of Mrs. Jones and to those of Mrs. Crane by description, had it not been qualified by subsequent words, all the persons named and all the persons described, would have taken equal shares per capita; and the subsequent words, providing that the children of Mrs. Jones and those of Mrs. Crane should take per stirpes, leave the seven children of William Crow, who are particularly named, to take per capita; nay, manifest a clear intent that they should so take. The testator, in directing the subject to be equally divided between his children, to wit, the heirs of William Crow, namely, William, &c. (children of his son William), Thomas, &c. (his own sons) and the children of his daughters, Mrs. Jones and Mrs. Crane, in effect, describes and adopts his grand-children by his son William as his children, while his grand-children by his two daughters are described not as his but as their children. And when the testator said, that the children of Mrs. Jones and Mrs. Crane, respectively, should take only such part as their mothers would have taken if alive, that is to say, a child's part, he meant that part 76 which would be a child's part according to the rule *of division prescribed in the clause itself, not a child's part in the general sense of the phrase; for he left a living child not mentioned in the bequest.

Stanard, for the appellees, observed, that if Johnson's construction prevailed, the children of the testator's son William would take more than half the whole subject, namely, seven-twelfths, and the other five branches of his family only one-twelfth, each; a construction so contrary to the natural bounty which dictated the provision, that it ought not to be allowed, unless it was unavoidable. The words of the will import no such extraordinary and unreasonable disposition. The declared design was, that the subject should be equally divided among the testator's children; and this design would be defeated, if his grand-children by his son William take per capita with the testator's own sons, and his grand-children by his daughters take per stirpes. The children of William, though named, are yet described as his heirs; which is nomen collectivum. The provision with respect to the children of the two deceased daughters, that they shall each take the share which their mothers if alive would take, that is, a child's part, evinced an intent, that the shares should be ascertained by reference to the testator's own children named in the clause.

CARR, J. The sole question presented to the court, is, Whether, under the words of the will, the children of William Crow deceased, will take per capita, equal shares with Thomas, Moses and John, the children of the testator, or per stirpes, the share of their father, as the children of Mrs. Jones and Mrs. Crane take?

In the construction of wills, I think it very often happens, that we, in the first place, make up an opinion as to what the testator ought in justice to have done; that is, what we would in such a case have done; and then endeavour to find out reasons shewing that what he ought to have done, he has done. It was by this process
77 (I rather think) that, on *the argument of this case, I took up a pretty strong impression against the appellants. It seemed to me not right, that the grand-children by one son, should receive more than the other grand-children, and equal shares with the children of the testator; and, therefore, I concluded, that such was not the meaning of the will. But this is surely a very erroneous process; for the testator having a perfect right to the property, his will is the sole law: we are to inquire what that will is: and in this inquiry, what we think it ought to be, should not have the least influence. The reasons, the calculations, the feelings, the whims even, which may have influenced the testator are inscrutable to us: his words are the only safe guides to conduct us to his meaning.

In the case before us, it seems to me, that the plain natural meaning of the words, and the rules drawn from the cases, lead us to the same conclusion. The cases all lay it down, that where a legacy is to several, whatever may be their relations to each other, or however the statute of distributions might operate upon such relations, equality shall be the rule, unless the testator has established a different one. Thus, to A. and B. and the children of C. all take per capita: to A. B. and C. and their children; all living at the testator's death take equally. So, to the descendants of A. and B., all their descendants, children, grand-children &c. take per capita. Richardson v. Spraag, 1 P. Wms. 434; Blackler v. Webb, 2 P. Wms. 383; Eccard v. Brooke, 2 Cox, 213; Butler v. Stratton, 3 Bro. C. C. 367; Weld v. Bradbury, 2 Vern. 705; Northey v. Strange, 1 P. Wms. 340; Wicker v. Wilford, Harg. law tracts, 513; Malcolm v. Martin, 3 Bro. C. C. 50; Phillips v. Garth, Id. 64; Davenport v. Hanbury, 3 Vez. 257; Freeman v. Parsley, Id. 421.

Look now at the words of the will: "the balance of slaves to be equally divided between my children, to wit, the heirs of Wil-

William Crow, namely (enumerating his son W. C.'s children), Thomas, Moses, John Crow (children of testator), and the children of my deceased daughter Massey Jones, and the children of my deceased daughter Sarah Crane." *Now, suppose the testator had stopped here: could there be any doubt, that each of his children and grand-children, named or described, would take equally, per capita? He first establishes equality as the rule of partition; and then enumerates, as the takers, ten persons by name, seven of whom he calls the heirs of William Crow, three his own children; and then he describes, as takers, the children of his two deceased daughters. It does not seem possible to raise a doubt, that if the testator had stopped here, all the children and grand-children, who were the objects of his bounty, must have taken equally. And of this he himself was well aware; for he adds, "but the children of my daughter Massey Jones, are to take only such part as their mother would take, if she were still alive, that is to say, a child's part; and in like manner, the children of my daughter Sarah Crane, are to take only such part as their mother would take, if she were still alive, that is to say, a child's part." Now, this is a clear and distinct exception: and it shews two things: 1. that the testator knew, that under the former part of the clause, all the objects it would take per capita: 2. that he did not intend, that all should so take. He, therefore, excepts from its operation, those who were to take by a different rule, namely, per stirpes; and these were the children of his two daughters. This seems to me to give tenfold strength to the claim of William Crow's children to take in their own right, per capita. However clearly in favour of that claim the first part of that clause may be, it might, (but for the exception) have been doubted, whether the testator so understood it: but that is impossible now: he has given his own explanation. Knowing, then, that by the operation of the first words, his daughters' children (whom he had only described generally as children) would take equally, and a fortiori, that William Crow's children, (each of whom he had individually named) would so take; when he excepts the children of his daughters, and leaves the children of William to the unrestrained operation of the clause, the conclusion, that these last were intended to take 79 *equally, is precisely as strong as that the others were to take by a different rule.

Nor is this conclusion at all weakened, in my mind, by the testator's calling them William Crow's heirs. He knew nothing of the technical distinction between children and heirs. He shews that he uses them in the same sense: for he says, "the heirs of William Crow namely, William &c. meaning his children." And in another part of the will, speaking of his daughter Whooston, he says, that what he has given to her shall return to his estate &c. if she shall die without a living heir.

But it was said, the words "a child's part," used in this clause, are strong to shew, that the testator meant, that this residuum should be divided into six parts, and consequently, that William's children should come in per stirpes only. I cannot see it in that light. By "a child's part," did the testator mean a part to be ascertained, by taking the whole number of his children, living and dead, as the divisor? This would seem the natural sense. But this would give eight as the divisor; for he had had four sons and four daughters: but this is not contended for. Did he mean all his living children? No! for one of them is confessedly excluded from this legacy, and the children of three deceased children included. The truth is, that by child's part, he did not mean at all to designate the number of portions, or the manner of taking: for the general purpose of the clause, he had already done this; and the whole purpose of this part of the clause, was to except the children of his daughters, and establish for them a mode of taking, different from that of his three sons and the children of William. In doing this, he says, they are to take only such part, as their mother would take, if she was still alive, that is to say, a child's part; meaning, simply, to place them in the shoes of their mother, that they should take whatever part she as a child would have taken, without intending to designate either the amount of that part, or its proportion to the whole.

80 *I am of opinion, that the appellants take per capita; that the personality subject to this clause, should be divided into twelve parts, of which the appellants should take seven, one each; the three sons, one each; the children of Mrs. Jones one, and the children of Mrs. Crane one.

GREEN, J., said, that he inclined very strongly to the opinion, that the decree of the courts below was right, but the opinion of the other judges to the contrary was so clear and decided, that he surrendered his own.

chase money to be paid on the 1st January 1805, and the residue in twelve months thereafter: a title free from all incumbrances, was to be made on the day appointed for the first payment. It being ascertained before the 1st January 1805, *that Beverley, in consequence of some leases which he had made, would be unable to comply with this contract, the parties consented to modify it, by an agreement that Tapp should receive the rents for the year 1804, and take a conveyance subject to the leases; and that he should have a credit of four years, instead of one year, for the excess of the purchase money beyond £1000. provided this sum should be paid on the 1st January 1805. In the latter part of the year 1804, Beverley contracted with Ross, Grinnan, Mundel and Carter, to sell them his patrimonial estate in the county of Culpeper, which included the land he had previously sold to Tapp; and on the 1st January 1805, he conveyed the whole estate to them, and took back a mortgage upon it, to secure the purchase money. He communicated to them, on the same day, by a memorandum in writing, that he had before sold to Tapp, a part of the land, not then surveyed, but supposed to contain 700 acres, at forty shillings per acre. On the 12th January 1805, the land having been surveyed, and found to contain 797½ acres, Beverley conveyed it to Tapp, and received from him £1000, and took his bond for £575. the residue of the purchase money, payable on the 1st January 1809, according to the modification of their contract. On the 19th March 1805, he paid to Ross, Grinnan, Mundel and Carter, the £1000. he had received from Tapp, and took their obligation to convey the land to Tapp and to take an assignment of Tapp's bond for the balance of the purchase money. It would seem, from the terms of this obligation, that they were not then informed of the change that had been made in the contract between Beverley and Tapp, as to the time of the last payment; and Beverley swears that he did not communicate it to them. This obligation was soon afterwards delivered to Tapp, and Beverley tendered to Ross and his associates, an assignment of Tapp's bond for £575. payable on the 1st January 1809, as above mentioned; but they refused to receive it, on the ground that it ought to have been made payable on the 1st January 1806, according to the original contract *between Beverley and Tapp, which was the only one that had been made known to them, and on the basis of which they had consented to convey the land. Shortly after the 1st January 1806, they instituted a suit in chancery against Tapp and Beverley, for the purpose of compelling an immediate payment of the balance of the purchase money; but they were cast in that suit. They thereupon took from Beverley an assignment of Tapp's bond, brought suit upon it, and prosecuted it to a judgment.

Tapp then exhibited a bill, in the superior court of chancery of Fredericksburg, against Beverley and against Ross and his associates, claiming credit for the rents of 1804, and two discounts for debts contracted to him by Beverley, subsequent to the date of his bond to Beverley, and (as he alleged) before Beverley's assignment thereof to Ross and others; insisting on a specific execution by Ross and others, of their contract to convey to him the land he had bought of Beverley, before he should be held to pay them the purchase money; and praying an injunction to proceedings on the judgment at law, till these matters could be heard and adjusted in equity. The injunction was awarded.

Ross and his associates, in their answers, contest the two discounts claimed by Tapp, for the debts due him by Beverley, on the ground, that when those debts were contracted, Tapp had notice that Beverley had assigned to them the whole of the debt which Tapp owed for the land. And they filed with their answers, a deed conveying all their right in the land to Tapp, which they said they would deliver to him, when he paid the money. This instrument was executed by them all; but as to some of them, there were no subscribing witnesses; nor was it acknowledged or certified for record, in any of the modes prescribed by the statute.

Upon the coming in of the answers, the chancellor referred the accounts to a commissioner; who made a report, in which, rejecting the discounts claimed by Tapp for the debts due by Beverley to him, he gave him credit for 86 dollars, as of the 1st

January 1809, for the rents of 1804, 83 and for *1160 dollars paid by Tapp on the 1st January 1813, pending the suit in chancery; and stated a balance due from Tapp of 1192 dollars 65 cents with interest from 1st January 1813. And the commissioner reported, that this was the state of the account, which the defendants, Ross and others, admitted to be right.

The chancellor, upon the coming in of the report, perpetuated the injunction as to seventy-four dollars only (on account of the rents of 1804) to be credited as of the 1st January 1809, and dissolved the injunction as to all the residue. He made no provision in the decree, for perfecting and delivering the conveyance from Ross and others to Tapp. And he decreed that Tapp should pay the costs. Tapp appealed to this court.

The case was argued here, by Leigh for the appellant, and Stanard for the appellees.

The question, whether Tapp was entitled to the two discounts he claimed, for debts contracted to him by Beverley, as against Ross and others, the assignees of Beverley, was a question of fact, depending intirely on the proofs; and on this point, this court concurred with the chancellor, and decided against the claim of the appellant.

Leigh objected to the decree, 1. that it dissolved the injunction as the 1160 dollars, paid by Tapp, in part satisfaction of the debt, pending the suit in chancery, though the defendants themselves admitted that credit before the commissioner: and 2. that the court should have decreed the defendants, Ross and others, to make and deliver a conveyance of the land to Tapp, so perfected as to be admissible to record, before or at the time he should be called on to pay the balance of the purchase money.

Standard answered, 1. that the payment made pending the suit in chancery, not being a subject of controversy (as it could not possibly have been) nor presented by the pleadings, could not properly have been noticed in the decree: "2. that the conveyance by Ross and others, having been executed by those parties, and filed as a deed which they proffered to deliver, whenever Tapp should entitle himself to it by paying the purchase money, would be at Tapp's command the moment he paid the purchase money, and the chancellor might at any time direct that it should be delivered to him; and besides, Ross and others had only an equitable title, the legal title having been re-vested in Beverley and he having conveyed to Tapp.

CABELL, J. I am of opinion, that the commissioner rightly rejected the set-offs claimed by Tapp, as they were for transactions with Beverley, long subsequent to the time when Tapp knew, that whatever was due from him for the purchase of the land, was justly payable, not to Beverley, but to Ross, Grinnan, Mundel and Carter; and I approve of the statement of the commissioner in all respects. The chancellor approved of it also, and ought, consequently, to have made it the basis of his decree. But he has not done so; for he perpetuated the injunction for 74 dollars only, as of the 1st January 1809, and dissolved it as to the residue; thus letting loose the execution for the difference between 74 and 86 dollars, and also for the sum of 1160 dollars, paid pending the suit. This was clearly wrong as to the first mentioned sum, viz. the difference between 74 and 86 dollars, because the commissioner's report clearly shews, that Tapp was entitled to the 86 dollars. And I think the decree was equally wrong in not giving credit for the 1160 dollars. The fact of the money not having been paid, until after the institution of this suit and the granting the injunction, might affect the question as to who should pay the costs of the suit, but it surely could not authorise the dissolution of the injunction as to money actually paid and no longer due. The injunction should have been perpetuated for all but 1192 dollars 65 cents with interest thereon, according to the statement of the commissioner.

85 "I am also of opinion, that the decree is erroneous in another respect. Ross and his associates did not stand in the situation of persons holding a mere equity, which may be released by parol or by act in pais. They had expressly bound themselves, by their written obligation of the 19th March 1805, to convey the land to Tapp. They must, under the circumstances of this case, be regarded as vendors of the land; and they shew, that they considered themselves bound to convey it with general warranty; for they exhibit with their answers, a deed conveying the land with general warranty, which appears to have been executed by all the parties. As to some of the grantors, however, there were no witnesses; nor was the deed acknowledged, in any of the modes prescribed by the laws regulating the recording of conveyances. A person bound to make a conveyance of lands, is bound to execute it in the presence of witnesses, or to acknowledge it in such manner, that the person to whom it is made, may have it recorded according to law. It was error in the court of chancery, not to provide for this, contemporarily with the dissolution of the injunction.

The decree should be reversed with costs, the injunction reinstated, and the cause remanded to be further proceeded in, according to the principles now declared.

As to the costs in the court of chancery; the appellees voluntarily allowed all just credits; and were willing, at all times, (after they took the assignment,) to make the conveyance, provided the appellant would pay the balance justly due. He forced them into the court of equity, to defend themselves against his unjust claims of set-off, and he should therefore pay the costs incurred in that court.

The other judges concurring, the decree was reversed with costs.

his own use. Plea, the general issue. Verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, for 684 dollars damages. The defendant filed a bill of exceptions to opinions of the circuit court given at the trial; which stated,

1. That the plaintiff, having first proved that the slave in question was, on the — day of March 1808, the property of R. R. Keeling, gave in evidence a deed of that date, executed by Keeling, and duly recorded, whereby Keeling, in consideration of his wife Amey having joined him in the sale and conveyance of lands of her own inheritance, conveyed the slave in question (among others) to the plaintiff, in trust, that he should permit Amey, the wife, to hold possession of the property, and enjoy the profits, to her separate use, during her life; and after her death, in trust to the use of the children of the marriage, then born or afterwards to be born, during their minority; and after the youngest should attain to full age, in trust for such of the children as the wife should appoint, and in default of such appointment, to be equally divided among them. The plaintiff then

87 proved, *that Mrs. Amey Keeling during her lifetime, sold the slave in question to one Pendred, and died within five years next before the institution of this suit: Pendred died in possession of the slave: administration of Pendred's estate was granted to his widow: and she married Henry Newsum the defendant; who having thus acquired the possession of the slave, sold him in his representative character, before the institution of this suit, to one Bonney for 450 dollars, who afterwards sold him to one Adams. But the plaintiff adduced no proof, either of a demand of the slave of the defendant, or any notice to him of the plaintiff's title, prior to the institution of the suit. Whereupon, the defendant's counsel prayed the court to instruct the jury, that unless such demand and refusal were proved, they should find for the defendant, because as he acquired possession of the slave lawfully, and had parted with it prior to any demand of the property, and without notice of any defect in his intestate's title, the evidence did not shew a tortious conversion of the slave to the defendant's own use, and the action did not lie against him. But, the court refused to give the instruction; and instructed the jury, that, if from the evidence, they believed there had been an actual conversion of the slave to the defendant's use, proof of demand and refusal was not necessary.

2. The defendant's counsel then moved the court to instruct the jury, that the action could not be maintained against the defendant, he having acquired possession of the slave in his representative character, as above mentioned, and parted with it before the institution of this suit; but the court refused to give such instruction.

3. The defendant then offered in evidence the inventory and appraisement of Pendred's estate, and the account of his administration thereof, regularly settled; in order to shew, that the price he had obtained for the slave had been credited to Pendred's estate, in his account of administration, and paid to the creditors of that estate; and that there was a large balance due on the account, to the defendant, as the administrator. *But the plaintiff objected to the introduction of this evidence; and the court (the facts first above stated as to the plaintiff's title being admitted), sustained the objection and excluded the evidence; because the facts it was offered to prove, if proved, would not exonerate the defendant from the plaintiff's action, or affect his right to recover.

To all these opinions the defendant filed exceptions, and applied to this court for a supersedeas to the judgment, which was allowed.

Stanard, for plaintiff in error. This case presents the question, Whether an administrator, acquiring in that character a chattel of which his intestate died possessed, and selling it in the regular course of his duty, without notice of any adverse right, or of any defect in his intestate's title, be personally liable as for a wrongful conversion to his own use, at the suit of a person claiming title adverse to that of the intestate? There is no adjudged case exactly in point. In the analogous case of an agent receiving property or money for his principal, and paying or transferring it to his principal, or devoting it to his use, if it afterwards appear, that the principal had no right, the principal and not the agent is liable. The possession of the slave, in this case, was cast upon the administrator by act of law: he was a mere fiduciary, and bound by the law to appropriate it to the use of his intestate's estate: and in selling it, without notice of doubt or defect in his intestate's title, and applying the proceeds in due course of administration, he was only discharging his bounden duty. The performance of his legal duty, was a just defence, and he ought to have been allowed to prove the truth of it. If he had disposed of the subject, after notice of the adverse claim, such notice as a demand made would have given him, then he would have acted at his own peril, and been personally responsible for the conversion. But as no demand was made, and he had no notice of the adverse claim, his sale and application of the proceeds, was a conversion, not to his own use, 89 but to *the use of his intestate's estate. It was the intestate that made the wrongful conversion: and the action lay against the administrator in his representative character, so as to charge his intestate's estate, not against him, in his own right, to charge him personally. The equity of the statute (1 Rev. Code, c. 104, § 64), gives trover against an executor or administrator for a conversion by the testator or intestate in his lifetime: And this was the proper remedy in the present case.

The evidence of the plaintiff having been adduced, as set out in the bill of exceptions, and the court, being asked to instruct the jury, "that the evidence did not shew a tortious conversion of the slave to the defendant's own use, and that the action did not lie against him," refused the instruction. The title shewn by the plaintiff is therefore properly examinable. He shewed no title. For 1st, the act of limitations began to run, from the date of Mrs. Keeling's sale to Pendred, instead of the date of her death; Pendred's possession was, from the time of his purchase, adverse to the title of the trustee; and, if he held the slave five years, counting from the time of his purchase, such possession gave him title. Newby v. Blakey, 3 Hen. & Munf. 57. 2ndly, The plaintiff was a mere trustee, without power, in any manner or for any purpose, to alien the trust subject; but if he may maintain trover for this slave, and recover his value, he may thereby in effect alien him; for it is settled, that a recovery in trover, vests the title of the subject in the defendant of whom the value is recovered. The trustee, if he could maintain the action on his naked legal title, could only sue and recover damages pro interesse suo; but here he has recovered obviously the whole value. The cestuis que trust may also sue and recover damages pro interesse suo; and they too may recover the whole value again.

Conway Robinson, for defendant in error. The questions raised by Mr. Stanard, as to the sufficiency of the plaintiff's title to recover, and as to the just measure of damages, *are not presented by the record. This is not a demurrer to evidence, or a special verdict, but a bill of exceptions to opinions of the circuit court on specific points; and as there was no occasion, so there was no attempt, to state more of the evidence, than what would suffice to shew the relevancy of the points moved, and the decisions given, at the trial. There was no general objection to the plaintiff's title, in the circuit court: the objection was only, that his evidence did not shew a conversion to the defendant's own use, and that the action did not lie against him, without proof of a demand and refusal.

The opinion first excepted to, was, that proof of demand and refusal was not necessary to maintain the action; no more. And, clearly, proof of demand and refusal, being only presumptive evidence of conversion, cannot be necessary, where direct proof of actual conversion is adduced. 3 Starkie on ev. 1492, 1496.*

The other opinions of the court, stated and excepted to, amount in effect to this, that the facts, of the defendant's acquisition of the slave in his representative character, of his having parted with him in the same character, and of his having disbursed the proceeds of sale in due course of administration, before the institution of the suit, all combined, constituted no good defence to the action. The circumstance of the possession of the property having been parted with by the defendant, is surely of no avail: nay, that was the very act of conversion. The manner in which he acquired the possession, cannot be material to the only inquiries proper to the case; namely, had the plaintiff just right to the property? And had the defendant converted it to his own use? There is no instance, in which the manner of the defendant's acquisition of property belonging to another, has been allowed to justify or excuse a conversion of it. With regard to the application which the defendant made of the proceeds of sale, the right owner cannot be affected by that: *to him the evil is just as great, whether the defendant gave the proceeds of his property to others, or retained them to himself. Neither can the defendant's want of notice of the defect of his intestate's title, avail him. It is the duty of every man, who sells property, no matter in what character or under what pretence, to see that it belongs to himself, and not to his neighbour. And if it be granted, that the administrator's conduct in this case was dictated by a sense of duty, and his motives and purposes fair, the personal loss he has incurred must yet be laid to his own fault or at least his misfortune, certainly not to any fault of plaintiff.

CARR, J. The exceptions taken to the opinions of the court given at the trial, present the only points for the consideration of this court. The ingenuity of counsel, indeed, suggested several others; but we are compelled by the settled law of the court to say, that they do not arise upon this record. The distinction between a bill of exceptions and a demurrer to evidence, has been so often taken by this court, that it would be a waste of time to repeat it, and most mischievous to depart from it. This distinction clearly excludes from our view, the question made upon the act of limitations. Whether the five years of possession ought to run from the sale of the slave by Mrs. Keeling, or from her death? It is not upon the record, and non constat what was the evidence. Neither can we, sitting in a court of law, take cognizance of the equitable rights of the children of Mrs. Keeling: that consideration is for another forum. Nor, as it seems to me, does it come fairly before us, on this record; to decide, whether a trustee can bring trover for a slave? Or, whether his damages should be for the full value, or nominal merely? The plaintiff sues, not as trustee, but as owner of the slave; the jury has found a general verdict; and the evidence is not before us. True, in a bill of exceptions, taken by the defendant, to a refusal of the court to instruct the jury (not that a trustee could not maintain trover for a slave, but "that unless a demand, and refusal *was proved, the verdict must be for the defendant,") there is a statement of some evidence, and among other things, a deed of trust, which, it is said, conveyed the slave to the plaintiff; but what other evidence might have been before the jury, it is impossible to say.

If, however, these questions were properly raised, I should feel no hesitation in saying, that a court of law looks only to the legal title, and that being in the trustee, he may assert it, by any action which is given to the legal owner of property: nor can a court of law limit his recovery to nominal damages.

As to the instructions of the court, they seem to me intirely correct. Demand and refusal, is only evidence of conversion, and therefore not necessary under the facts of this case, where a conversion is proved by other evidence. In like manner, the defendant was liable to the action, though he received the slave as administrator, sold him as administrator, and disbursed the money as administrator, without the least notice of the defect of his intestate's title. The right of the owner to sue for his slave, can never depend on such circumstances as these. The administrator, when he sells property as belonging to his intestate, acts at his peril. If he sells my property, he must answer to me for it, however he may have thought himself bound by law to sell, and however fairly he may have applied the proceeds to the debts of his intestate.

The court was also right in rejecting the evidence offered by the defendant. What had the inventory, appraisement and settlement of his administration account, to do with the claim of the plaintiff? They were wholly irrelevant to the question, whether the slave was the property of the plaintiff or not.

I think the judgment must be affirmed.

GREEN and CABELL, J., and BROOKE, president, declared their intire concurrence with the opinion of JUDGE CARR; but 93 *COALTER, J., said he was not prepared to say, as a general proposition, that, where a testator or intestate has fairly purchased property, a horse for instance, from one who turns out afterwards not to be the true owner, and dies possessed of such property, having for a considerable time used it as his own, and it comes to the possession of his executor or administrator after his death, and he, without any notice or demand from the true owner, sells the horse, with the other perishable estate, and fully administers the whole personal fund, if in such case, trover be brought against the representative, for a conversion by him as an individual, the action can be sustained, so as to throw the loss on him.

He added: I understand the law to be, that if a defendant come to possession of a chattel by finding, or in other lawful way, it is necessary for the plaintiff to prove a refusal to deliver, unless the defendant shall have unlawfully intermeddled with the goods. If they be lost or taken from him, he is not guilty of a conversion, because he has not disposed of them as if they were his own.

Does the executor or administrator, as an individual, unlawfully intermeddle with the goods, in the case put? Can he be said to have converted them to his own use? Is it an answer to this to say, that he has converted them to the use of the estate? It will, no doubt, be a conversion in the testator or intestate, in the case put, for which, under the act of assembly, trover will lie against the executor or administrator, and may be a conversion by him as executor or administrator, and for which trover may lie against him as such, so as to charge the estate for the value; or an action for money had and received by the executor or administrator as such, so as to charge the estate; but the question is, whether, under our system of laws, in relation to executors and administrators, and especially since the party is not without his just remedy under the act giving trover against executors or administrators as well as for them, he can be charged individually, as for a conversion to his own use, unless demand and refusal, before he has sold, be proved?

94 When the *goods come to the hands of the executor or administrator, the regular remedy is replevin or detinue for them. 1 Wm's. Saund. 216, a., note 1. The law makes it his duty to sell: he cannot resist the claims of creditors: he cannot demand, as to them, that the personal estate shall remain five years in his possession, so as to put to rest all demands of this kind: he cannot resort back to creditors, since he cannot shew who has received the money arising from any particular chattel. Suppose he departs from the directions of the law as to selling, leaves the property to answer executions, and points out to the sheriff what has come to his hands, and he levies and amongst other things takes the horse in dispute and sells him, no notice being given; is this a conversion by him individually? Yet this would be a conversion in the finder of goods, for they would go to his use; he would have disposed of them as his own.

If A. deliver goods, which afterwards turn out to be the property of B. to C. to deliver to D. and C. does so deliver them, having no notice that they are the property of B. is he guilty of a conversion of them to his own use?

The most analogous case which I can find to the supposed one now under consideration, is that in which I understand it to have been settled, that if a sheriff levy an execution on the goods of a bankrupt, and sell them after the act of bankruptcy, but before commission and assignment, he is not liable in trover, though the goods ceased to be the goods of the bankrupt, from the moment of the act of bankruptcy. But the plaintiff, at whose suit they were seized, is liable to the action? for though equally ignorant, they came thus to his use. Before assignment, the sheriff is presumed to be ignorant of the act of bankruptcy, and is acting in obedience to the writ, (how it would be if express knowledge of it was proved, is another question): but after commission and assignment, which is public and notorious to all the country, he can no longer plead ignorance, and acts at his own peril.

Our legislature, by various statutes, has shewn a disposition to protect executors and administrators, who are honestly

95 *doing their duty, against individual loss. If a party does not know his own rights, why shall an executor or administrator of the adverse claimant, be presumed to know them? If from any cause, he be unable to make his rights known, even by a demand in pais, why shall his misfortune, if he lose his property, be visited on one equally innocent with himself?

But the present case is not considered as presenting the broad proposition laid down in the case above supposed. It presents the case of a slave conveyed in trust by a deed duly recorded (there being no objection to the deed, as not being duly recorded) and there is consequently implied notice, at least, that the title was not in the intestate. This is not a case of demurrer to evidence; and we know not what was proved.

All I mean to say in this case, is, that, as I am at present advised, I am not prepared to affirm the broad doctrines, which have been contended for; nor am I intirely prepared to disaffirm them. I wish the point, as it really is not involved in this case, not to be considered as settled by it.

Equity Practice*—Application to Stay Proceedings at Law—Confession of Judgment Necessary to Granting Injunction.—Where a party defendant in a suit at law, before judgment, resorts as plaintiff to equity, praying relief against the claim asserted at law on equitable grounds, and an injunction to stay proceedings at law, the injunction should be granted only on condition that he confess judgment at law, though he may have grounds of defence at law, distinct from the grounds of relief preferred to the court of equity.

Same—Same—Same—Appeal.—Where an injunction has been granted in such a case, and the chancellor dissolves the injunction, unless the plaintiff in equity will confess judgment at law, on appeal from such an order, this court will not examine the merits, though, at the time the order was made, the cause stood for hearing.

This controversy had been already before this court, several times, in various forms; and a recapitulation of the former adjudications concerning it, formed an essential part of the state of the case, in the shape in which it was now presented to the court.

In ejectment, brought by John Camm and wife and John Warwick and wife against Reuben Norvell, for a piece of land in Amherst, the jury found, in a special verdict, that the land in controversy was parcel of a tract of 3926 acres, which had been granted, in September 1755, to James Christian, John Christian and William Brown. No division was made among them. After the death of the grantees James and John Christian, (whereby the whole land survived to Brown) Charles and John Christian, sons of the grantee John, presented a petition to the governor, for the whole tract, as lapsed and forfeited for non-payment of quit rents. The general court, in April '74, gave judgment for the petitioners, that the lands were forfeited and re-vested in the crown, and ordered it to be certified to the governor. In October '77, the petitioners Charles and John Christian, conveyed and delivered possession of 933 acres of the land to James Gresham. Gresham, in August '87, conveyed and delivered possession of 433 acres, parcel of the

97 933 *acres, to Thomas Powell; he died in '88, intestate; and Mrs. Camm and Mrs. Warwick were his daughters and heirs. The tract of 433 acres was the land claimed in the ejectment. Camm and wife and Warwick and wife, and those they claimed under, had been in possession of it from '74 till 1800, when Norvell entered and ousted them. Norvell had obtained a grant for land, including about 330 of the 433 acres, founded on a and office treasury warrant, entered in September '94, surveyed in November '95, and granted by patent dated November '97. Upon this state of facts, the district court gave judgment for the heirs of Powell, Mrs. Camm and Mrs. Warwick; and, on an appeal taken by Norvell to this court, the judgment was affirmed, in May 1811, on the single ground, that the long possession, which had been held by the heirs of Powell, and those they claimed under, gave them title to recover, in ejectment. Norvell v. Camm, &c., 2 Munf. 257.

Norvell then brought a writ of right for the tract of 433 acres of land, against Camm and wife and Warwick and wife; upon the trial of which, the titles under which both parties claimed being exhibited, the circuit court instructed the jury, that, as the land had been once granted by patent in '55, though it had been adjudged forfeited and lapsed, by the general court in '74, and though no new patent had been granted to the petitioners, at whose suit it was so forfeited, yet it was not waste and unappropriated land, subject to be taken up by a treasury warrant; and, therefore, the patent granted to Norvell in November '97, was void. The jury, under this instruction, found a verdict for the tenants, and the court gave them judgment. Norvell appealed. And a special court of appeals, in December 1818, held, that Norvell's patent, being on its face fair and regular, could not be thus impugned, collaterally and by extrinsic evidence, but only by suit in equity to set it aside, or some other proceeding having that for its direct object; and that patent must prevail, except 98 against an elder one: therefore, *the judgment was reversed, and a new trial directed. Norvell v. Camm, &c., 6 Munf. 233.

Upon the second trial in the circuit court, the tenants forbore to exhibit their title: they merely offered evidence of long and continued possession, in themselves and those under whom they claimed, payment of quit-rents &c. to lead to the presumption of a patent prior to that under which Norvell claimed. And Norvell, first, to establish his own title, exhibited his patent of November '97, and another patent dated June 1813, with parol evidence to shew that those patents included all the land in controversy; and, then, for the purpose of repelling the presumption of a prior grant to those under whom the tenants claimed, or any of them, he gave in evidence the record of the ejectment first above mentioned, wherein the special verdict set forth the true state of the title under which the tenants claimed, and excluded all presumption of any patent prior to his own. And he set forth all the evidence, that adduced by the tenants as well as that adduced by himself, in a demurrer to evidence, which he tendered; but the tenants refused, and the court would not compel them, to join in it. To this Norvell filed exceptions. Upon the evidence set forth in the demurrer to evidence, several questions of fact arose: Whether Norvell's entries were made on the land held by the tenants? Whether the patents under which he claimed, covered it?

*Injunctions.—The principal case is cited in Lawrence v. Bowman, 15 Fed. Cas. 24, which case holds contra. See monographic note on "Injunctions" appended to Claytor v. Anthony, 15 Gratt. 518.

&c. There was a general verdict and judgment for the tenants. Norvell again appealed. And another special court of appeals, in December 1823, declaring that the judgment of the former special court, 6 Munf. 233, was the law of, and no longer questionable in, this case, held that the circuit court ought to have compelled the tenants to join in Norvell's demurrer to evidence; and, therefore, reversed the judgment, and remanded the cause, with directions that the verdict should be set aside, and the tenants compelled to join in the demurrer. Norvell v. Camm, &c., 2 Rand. 68.

In February 1824, the case of Whittington v. Christian, (Id. 353,) was decided by the regular court of appeals; *wherein the heirs of John Christian, in ejectment brought against Whittington, claimed 1000 acres of the 3926 acres of land, granted by the patent of September '55, to James Christian, John Christian and William Brown: they claimed under John Christian, the son of John the original patentee, and one of the petitioners, at whose suit the general court, in '74, had declared the patent of '55 forfeited. Whittington claimed under Norvell, who claimed this tract of 1000 acres, under three patents, dated in '97, upon surveys made in '95 and '96, and who, and those claiming under him, had held the land ever since. In this case, then, the same questions arose, which were presented in the case of Norvell v. Camm, 6 Munf. 233, and which were then decided in favour of Norvell: Whether the land in question, having been granted in '55, and having been afterwards, in '74, adjudged forfeited and re-vested in the crown, was waste and unappropriated land subject to location on a treasury warrant? if not, Whether, nevertheless, the commonwealth's legal title therein passed to Norvell, by virtue of the patents granted to him in '97? And the court upon the fullest consideration, decided both points against Norvell: it held, moreover, that the petitioners, at whose suit, in '74, the lands were adjudged forfeited by the original patentees of '55, and their heirs or assignees, were even now entitled, by right of preemption, to claim grants for the lands so forfeited, and that such grants, when issued, would relate back to the date of the original patents of '55.

Immediately, after the first decision of the special court of appeals in Norvell v. Camm, 6 Munf. 233, Warwick and wife and Mrs. Camm (her husband was now dead) preferred their petition to the superior court of chancery of Lynchburg, setting forth the rights under which they claimed; charging, that Norvell's grant of November '97, embracing the tract of 433 acres (or part of it) claimed and held by him, was fraudulently, surreptitiously and illegally obtained, upon the false suggestion, that the land thereby granted was waste and unappropriated land, subject to 100 location *and grant upon treasury warrant; and praying a scire facias and certiorari, to have the patent certified to the court, examined, and repealed. And, in May 1824, after the second decision of the special court of appeals in Norvell v.

Camm, 2 Rand. 68, remanding that case to the circuit court, and after the contrary decision in Whittington v. Christian, Id. 353, they exhibited their bill in the same court of chancery, setting forth a full history of the controversies at law between them and Norvell, and all the facts which had been developed in the progress of them; the pendency of Norvell's writ of right in the circuit court, then standing on his demurrer to evidence; the points presented by the demurrer; the principle settled by the judgments of the two special courts of appeals, in Norvell v. Camm, as the law of that particular case, no longer to be questioned, that Norvell's patents cannot be impugned at law, but are only voidable in equity; and the direct opposite principle settled by the regular court of appeals in Whittington v. Christian, as the law of the land, that those patents are not only voidable in equity, but void at law: charging, that Norvell's patents of November '97 and June 1813 were obtained fraudulently, surreptitiously, illegally, and upon false suggestion: and praying, that the patent of November '97 might be examined and repealed by the chancellor; that, meanwhile, Norvell might be enjoined from farther proceedings on his writ of right in the circuit court, till the subject could be examined and determined in equity; and that the court might order a new trial of the mise joined in the writ of right, wherein Norvell should be inhibited from using that patent in support of his claim.

The injunction was awarded, the 21st May 1824.

Norvell, in his answer, denied, that his patents had been obtained fraudulently, surreptitiously, illegally, and upon false suggestion. He stated some matters of fact, which (he said) had not been heretofore adduced, in the trials of the suits at law, and which evinced his innocence of any actual fraud; and he referred to the records of three other controversies 101 *he had had (besides those that had been brought by appeal to the court of appeals) concerning the validity and regularity of the patents he had obtained, for the lands included in the patent of '55 to the two Christians and Brown, all of which were determined in his favour; and, alleging that the plaintiffs here were privies to the parties there, he insisted that those decisions concluded the main question, whether the lands thereby granted to him, were in point of law subject to location and grant upon treasury warrants. But, if this question were still open, he insisted, that the lands granted by the patent of '55, adjudged by the general court in '74 to be lapsed, forfeited, and re-vested in the crown, but not re-granted to the petitioners at whose suit the forfeiture was declared, were lands subject to location and grant upon treasury warrant, under the land laws, at the time the grants thereof to him emanated: in short, he controverted the opinion of the court of appeals, on this point, in Whittington v. Christian.

This answer was filed the 9th May 1825, and on the 21st of the same month, Norvell moved the court to dissolve the injunction; on which the chancellor took time to advise till the next term.

A general replication to the answer, was put in at the rules, 25th May 1825; and commissions for taking depositions were awarded to both parties.

No depositions were filed by either.

The plaintiffs exhibited the record of Norvell's writ of right against them, which contained the record of their previous ejectment against him. The defendant exhibited the record of a suit in the superior court of chancery of Richmond, in which John and Charles Christian were plaintiffs and Norvell defendant, and in which some of the grants obtained by Norvell for parcels of the 3926 acres granted by the patent of '55, were impeached, and the lands claimed by John and Charles Christian, as in justice their property; and their bill was dismissed in September 1807. And that record contained two other records; the one of a caveat *prosecuted by Charles Christian against Norvell, in the district court of Charlottesville, to prevent the issuing of a grant to him of the very parcel of land (it appeared) for which he afterwards obtained the patent of November '97, the validity of which was now controverted by Warwick and wife and Camm, which caveat was dismissed in September '97; the other, the record of a caveat prosecuted by Norvell against John Christian, in the same district court, to prevent the issuing of a grant to him of the 1000 acres of land (it appeared) that was in controversy in Whittington v. Christian, on which caveat judgment was given for Norvell in April '99.

At the rules in September 1825, this cause was regularly set for hearing.

And, at the ensuing October term, the chancellor made the following interlocutory order: "This day came the parties by their counsel, and the court having maturely considered the premises and the arguments of counsel, doth order, that the injunction awarded the plaintiffs in this cause (Warwick and wife and Camm) on the 21st May 1824, to restrain the defendant (Norvell) his agents &c. from further proceeding in the action instituted by him against them, in the circuit court of Amherst and by the judge of that court removed to the circuit court of Lynchburg, stand dissolved, as an act of this day, unless the plaintiffs shall at the next term of the circuit court of Lynchburg, confess a judgment for the 433 acres of land in the bill mentioned, as claimed by them, or so much thereof as may be comprised in the defendant's grant sought by the present bill to be repealed." From this order Warwick and wife and Camm appealed to this court.

The cause was argued by Johnson, for the appellants, and Stanard, for the appellee.

I. Johnson pressed the court, very earnestly, to enter into a consideration of the merits of the cause, and put an end to this long protracted controversy. All the materials for *forming a judgment upon the merits, were in the record, and were before the chancellor at the time he made the interlocutory order: the parties had filed no depositions in the long interval allowed them for the purpose; it was obvious, neither had any parole evidence to adduce; all their evidence was documentary, and contained in their exhibits. And though a motion to dissolve the injunction, was made at May term 1825, which the chancellor took time to consider till the next term, yet before the next terms the cause had been set for hearing, and stood then for hearing: therefore, the chancellor ought to have taken it up as upon a hearing, instead of taking it up on the motion to dissolve the injunction. But, even if he was right in taking it up, on the motion, the motion itself presented the merits to him for decision; for Norvell had moved for a dissolution of the injunction, generally, not for a conditional dissolution unless judgment should be confessed in his action at law. If the chancellor might and ought to have decided the merits, this court may and ought to do so. Besides, this court has often, in cases where the merits of a controversy were really open to full view, though not in point of form regularly before it, availed itself of the opportunity to express its opinion upon them, and thus to put an end to further expensive and vexatious litigation; and if this were ever proper in any case, it was proper in this. He, therefore, proceeded to examine, succinctly, the main point in controversy, the regularity and validity of Norvell's patent of '97; and shewed, that the decision of Norvell v. Camm, 6 Munf. 233, determined that it was examinable, and might be annulled, in equity; and that the solemn decision of Whittington v. Christian, 2 Rand. 353, condemned it as void.

Stanard, for the appellees, did not wholly decline the discussion of the merits; but he said, it was improper to discuss them; for they were not now before the court. The chancellor had not considered them, or made any decree touching them. His order only settled a point of practice. The sole province of this court was to revise that order; its jurisdiction *was altogether appellate; and if, instead of revising the order the chancellor made, the order appealed from, this court should decide upon matters, on which the chancellor did not decide, but on the contrary carefully avoided the decision of, it would exercise original, not appellate, jurisdiction.

II. As to the conditional order dissolving the injunction, Johnson insisted, that the chancellor ought not, in such a case as this, to have imposed upon the plaintiffs in equity, the condition that they should confess judgment in the action at law. Warwick and Camm had a right to have the validity of Norvell's patent, upon which alone he could sustain his claim at law, examined in equity, where only it was examinable, without relinquishing any grounds of defence, wholly distinct from the merits of the patent, which might avail them at law. The bill in equity impeached Norvell's title: but the chancellor would not entertain them there, for that purpose, unless they would surrender their own: thus giving to a holder of a patent, impugned as surreptitiously and illegally obtained, the advantage of avoiding every other difficulty, and every objection to his claim, save only the objection to the regularity of the patent, and of avoiding too, the merits of his adversary's independent claim of title; and laying a party seeking, upon equitable grounds, to prevent his opponent from using a wrongful patent against him at law, under the necessity of foregoing any and every rightful defence he might have, available to him at law, triable only at law, and wholly distinct from the matters preferred to the court of equity as grounds for relief. This was, in effect, to deny the plaintiffs their remedy in equity, not upon condition that they should waive their legal remedy for the same right, but that they should waive other rights.

If the matters preferred to equity for relief against proceedings at law, be the sole ground on which the party praying such relief, claims right, the chancellor ought to require him to abandon his defence at law, by a confession of judgment; but if, besides the grounds for relief in equity, he *have distinct and substantive grounds of defence at law, not cognizable in equity, he ought not to be required to confess judgment at law. Suppose one action of debt brought on several bonds, and the defendant to have complete defence at law as to all but one of the bonds, and, as to that, to prefer his bill in equity, alleging that it was obtained of him by fraud, and praying a discovery of the fraud, an inhibition to make use of the fraudulent bond at law, and a stay of proceedings at law till this matter can be heard in equity: must he, in order to entitle himself to this equity, confess judgment for all the debts claimed of him in the action at law?

In the practice of the english chancery, where relief is asked against a claim asserted at law, and no defence available at law is pretended, the chancellor does not enjoin the proceeding in the action to judgment: his injunction inhibits execution on the judgment when obtained. But when it is the object of the bill in equity, to obtain matter of defence to be used at law, the court stays the proceedings in the action at law. 1 Madd. Chan. 130-134; 2 Id. 218-19; 1 Newland's prac. in Chan. 217-223; 2 Harr. Chan. prac. 171-8; Partington v. Hobson, 16 Ves. 220; Appleyard v. Seton, Id. 223; Earnshaw v. Thornhill, 18 Ves. 485; White v. Steinwacks, 19 Ves. 83; Hindman v. Taylor, 2 Bro. C. C. 7; Revet v. Braham, Id. 639, note (a).

Norvell claimed in his writ of right a tract of 433 acres of land; one unascertained part, under his patent of November '97; another, under his patent of June 1813. The chancellor's order of dissolution required Warwick and wife and Camm to confess judgment for that part of the land covered by the first patent: for the part of the land claimed under the last patent, Norvell was left to get judgment if and when he can. So, if this order be complied with, two judgments must be rendered at law; one for one parcel on the tenants' confession, and another for the other parcel, for the demandant or for the tenants, according to the judgment of the court as to the right; which would be irregular and anomalous.

106 *Stanard said, that as to the difficulty of rendering two judgments in the same action at law, there would be the same difficulty in suing out two executions on the same judgment, one immediately for the part as to which no relief was asked in equity, the other after the decree in equity, for the part as to which relief was sought there, if the decree should deny the relief. [Green, J., said, a question of this kind was considered in Taylor v. Beck, 3 Rand. 316, and his opinion then was, that, upon a partial cognovit actionem, no judgment ought to be rendered till the whole should be tried, and then one judgment given as to the whole.] Stanard said, the chancellor had, in truth, done more for the plaintiffs than he ought, in allowing them to confess judgment in part: he ought to have required them to confess judgment for the whole.

The bill in this case was not a bill for the discovery of matters to be used as a defence in the action at law; it was a bill for substantive relief in equity, upon equitable grounds, with a view to use, not facts discovered, but the relief obtained upon them in equity, as a defence at law. On bills for discovery of matter to be used on a trial at law, the proceedings at law may be stayed, till the discovery be obtained in equity; but in such bills, there should be no prayer for substantive relief; if there be, the bill is demurrable for that cause. On a bill for relief in equity against a claim asserted at law, there was no instance of an injunction awarded to prevent the plaintiff at law from proceeding to trial and judgment. And the authorities cited for the appellants, all shewed, that whenever a party resorts to a court of equity, for substantive relief against a claim asserted at law, he must submit himself to the jurisdiction of the chancellor, intirely and without reserve: if he ask relief in equity, after judgment at law, the chancellor invariably requires, as the condition of his interference, a release of errors at law; if before judgment, a confession of judgment, which is a release of errors.

107 *He denied the propriety, in this case, of granting any injunction to prevent the plaintiffs at law from proceeding to trial and judgment, or, indeed, that there was any reason or occasion for one.

PER CURIAM. Although the cause was set for hearing after the motion to dissolve the injunction, and before the conditional order dissolving it (which is the order appealed from), the cause has not been heard in the court of chancery on its merits; and either party has yet the right to produce new evidence. To pronounce any decree here, on the merits, would be to take original and not appellate jurisdiction.

As regards the order dissolving the injunction on the condition stated, the general rule is, that when a party comes into a court of equity to be relieved against proceedings at law, he must confess judgment at law, and rely solely on the court of equity for relief. Anon. 1 Vern. 120, 1 Madd. Chan. 132. Nor is there any thing in the peculiar circumstances of this case, to take it out of the rule. Indeed, it does not appear, that there was any cause for an injunction, except to restrain the defendant in equity, after judgment obtained by him at law, from turning the tenants out of possession, before the validity of the patent on which his legal title depended, shall be examined and decided on, in the court of chancery; and the relief, after the confession to judgment, will be as ample as in ordinary cases. If Norvell's patent be vacated, the injunction will be perpetuated as to the land covered by it, or he may be decreed to convey his title under it, to the plaintiffs in equity.

108 *Harvey and Wife v. Branson.

(Absent CABELL and COALTER, *J.)

Chancery Practice—Decrees—When Final—Case at Bar.—A decree in chancery disposing of the whole subject, deciding all questions in controversy, ascertaining the rights of all parties, and awarding the costs, though it appoint a commissioner to sell part of the subject, and account for and pay the proceeds to the parties, with liberty to them to apply to the court to add other or substitute new commissioners, or for a partition of the subject directed to be sold, in kind, is a final decree.

Levi Branson filed his bill against Harvey and wife and Peck, setting forth that his grand-father, Benjamin Borden the elder, by his will in 1742, among other things, directed that all his lands on the waters of James river should be sold, excepting 5000 acres of land, all good, which he gave to five of his daughters, Abigail Worthington, Rebecca Branson, Deborah Borden, Lydia Borden, and Elizabeth Borden, that is, 1000 acres of good land a-piece to every one of the said five daughters above mentioned, to them and their heirs and assigns forever: that his widow and eldest son and heir Benjamin Borden, the younger, were executors of this will: that the 1000 acres were never allotted to Rebecca Branson: that she was dead, and the plaintiff was her heir at law: that Benjamin Borden, the younger, as executor and heir, took possession of all the lands of his father: that he died leaving a daughter Martha, his heir, with whom the defendant

Harvey intermarried: that all the lands unsold have passed into their hands: and, after some farther details, the bill prayed a decree against Harvey and wife and Peck (who was stated to have some of the lands in possession) for the 1000 acres of land. The answer of the defendants, acknowledged most of the facts in the bill, but stated, that Rebecca Branson and her husband, in 1745, conveyed the land by deed to Benjamin Borden, the younger, with general warranty; and, though it should appear that the right of Rebecca was not divested by that conveyance, yet

Soon after answering this bill, Harvey and wife filed a cross-bill against Branson, stating his claim for the 1000 acres, and the deed of his father and mother; that it was made for a valuable consideration, but the privy examination of the wife was not taken: charging, that Branson was bound by the warranty and covenants of his father, and that he has received or claims considerable estate from him, which they seek to have decreed them, if the plaintiff should recover the land: especially, a claim made by Branson for his father's portion of a part of the estate of Benjamin Borden the elder, which that testator directed should be sold, and divided among his children. This bill was answered.

On a hearing of the original and cross-suits, in December 1813, the chancellor decided, that Branson was entitled to the 1000 acres of land devised to his mother: that the warranty in his father's deed did not bind him, because no assets had descended to him: that this case, however, was not ready for a final decree, because it appeared, that the particular land claimed in the bill had been already appropriated in satisfaction of the claim of another daughter: And it being suggested to the court, that there were other persons possessed of land subject to the claim, leave was given to amend the bill, and make them parties. And, with respect to the cross-bill, the chancellor said, that though the warranty of his father did not bind Branson, yet that the covenants in the deed would bind the personal estate of the father, to answer any damages sustained by the breach of them: that Branson denied that he had received any personal assets from his father, and there was no evidence to prove that he had: that he was seeking, however, in another suit depending in this court (Borden's representatives v. Bowyer & al.) to recover a sum of money on account of the devise in the will of Benjamin Borden the elder, of certain lands to be sold, and the monies arising therefrom to be divided between his daughter 110 ter Rebecca Branson and others: *that the court held Mrs. Branson's share of this last mentioned subject, a chattel interest, to which her husband and his personal representatives were entitled: and that the court would, therefore, provide, that whatever of that legacy the personal representatives of Branson, the father, would have been entitled to receive, should be held liable to the indemnification of Harvey.

*COALTER, J. did not sit, because he had been formerly counsel in the cause.

Under the leave given, Branson amended his bill, and made several new defendants, in whose possession, it was stated, there were lands subject to his claim. These defendants answered, and much evidence was taken.

The two causes were again heard, together with the case of Borden's representatives v. Bowyer, in July 1818; when the chancellor made an interlocutory decree, touching all the three causes, wherein he declared, that the great difficulty of selecting, at this day, lands to answer the devise of Benjamin Borden the elder, of 1000 acres of land to each of his daughters, and the injury which would result from it to persons, who, or those under whom they claimed, had been long in possession, rendered it proper, that the claim of Mrs. Branson's heir (the only claim not yet satisfied) should be ascertained in money, and paid out of the shares of Robert Harvey and John Bowyer, of the monies received, or to be received, for the proceeds of the lands directed by a former decree of the court to be sold; and, if that should prove insufficient, then out of their own estates, in proportion to the amounts which they or their ancestors had received for lands (of B. B. the elder) sold by them. He further decided, that the claims of all the testator B. B.'s daughters, for shares of the proceeds of the lands devised to be sold, had been extinguished, except that of Mrs. Branson; and that the claims of two of his sons Joseph and John Borden, as well as that of Mrs. Branson, remained yet unextinguished. And he appointed commissioners to ascertain the compensation to which the heir of Mrs. Branson was entitled for the 1000 acres of land, specifically devised to her, but never assigned to her, with directions to *report &c. And other directions were given, and reports ordered, in relation to the case of Borden v. Bowyer, not material to be particularly stated here.

It appeared, that the former decree, directing lands to be sold, referred to in the above mentioned decree of July 1818, was an interlocutory decree made in the case of Borden v. Bowyer; that the lands thereby decreed to be sold, were such of the lands devised by the will of Benjamin Borden the elder, to be sold, and the proceeds divided among all his children, as then remained unsold; that sales had been made; and that the proceeds thereof were then at the disposal of the court, or in a train of collection by Samuel Clarke, the commissioner who made them: so that the subject, which was afterwards to be disposed of, appertained to the case of Borden v. Bowyer.

The commissioners appointed to ascertain the compensation due to Mrs. Branson's heir, for the tract of 1000 acres devised to her, reported it to be 20,000 dollars; and to this report there was no exception.

The other reports, relating to the case of Borden v. Bowyer, required by the decree of July 1818, were also returned; and exceptions thereto were filed by the parties.

And, in August 1820, the three causes, Branson v. Harvey and wife and others, Harvey and wife v. Branson, and Borden's representatives &c. v. Bowyer &c. were heard together; when the following decree was pronounced as to them all:

"These causes came on, together, this 5th day of August 1820, to be finally heard, on the decrees herein before rendered, and on the report of the commissioners and the exceptions thereto, and were argued by counsel: Whereupon the court doth overrule all the exceptions, taken by Bowyer and Harvey and wife, to the report of commissioner Samuel Clarke made in the case of Borden's representatives against Bowyer et al. and doth also overrule the third exception taken to said report by the plaintiff's counsel; but doth sustain the first

exception of the plaintiffs, so far as 112 to require *that the £48. 8. 8. therein mentioned, with the interest allowed thereon, should be debited to the defendant Bowyer; and doth sustain the plaintiff's second exception, requiring that the value of the 260 acres of land therein mentioned, should be brought into the account, at the price of £176. according to the estimate of the commissioners in 1804, on which sum of £176. interest should be calculated at the rate of six per centum per annum from the 1st November 1804 to the 1st November 1818, and the amount added to the purchase money received by Hawkins and wife, with which the defendants Harvey and wife are chargeable. The report aforesaid, when reformed on these principles, will shew the following results: that the whole fund, proceeding from the sale of lands distributable under the will of Benjamin Borden the elder, calculated up to 1st November 1818, is 75,524 dollars 73 cents; of which the plaintiffs, the representatives of Joseph Borden, are entitled to one ninth, equal to 8,391 dollars 63 cents, and the defendant John Borden to one other ninth; and of which the defendants Harvey and wife are entitled to three ninths, and a moiety of the ninth which would have belonged to the representatives of Branson, equal to 29,370 dollars 72 cents, and the defendant Bowyer to the like amount; that, deducting from the sum aforesaid, to which the said Harvey and wife were entitled, the amount which has been received by them and the said Hawkins and wife, to wit, 8,140 dollars 80 cents, stated on the 23d page of the commissioner's report, and 996 dollars on account of the aforesaid 260 acres of land, equal in the whole to 9,136 dollars 83 cents, there would remain due to the said Harvey and wife, of the fund aforesaid, a balance of 20,233 dollars 92 cents; and that deducting from the said Bowyer's portion of the fund aforesaid, what has been received thereof by his testator, that is to say, 17,759 dollars 57 cents, stated on the said 23d page of the commissioner's report, and 352 dollars, the principal and interest of the aforesaid £48. 8. 8. equal in the whole to 18,111 dollars 94 cents, there would remain due of the fund aforesaid, 113 said, to said Bowyer 11,258 *dollars 78 cents. The said report, thus reformed, the court approves and confirms. The court, having heretofore decided, in the case of Branson v. Harvey and others, that the plaintiff must be compensated for the 1000 acres of land to which he was entitled, by the value thereof in money, to be paid out of that portion of the fund aforesaid to which the defendants Harvey and wife and Bowyer were entitled, and commissioners appointed for that purpose having ascertained and reported to this court, in the year 1818, that the value of said land was 20,000 dollars, which report is approved and confirmed, there must be now appropriated to the said Branson, out of the balances above stated to be due to the said Harvey and wife and Bowyer, the said sum of 20,000 dollars; which being deducted in moieties, from the said balances, will leave due to the said Harvey and wife the sum of 10,233 dollars 92 cents, and to the said Bowyer the sum of 1,258 dollars 78 cents. (The several results herein stated will appear more distinctly by reference to a statement made and signed by the plaintiff's counsel, marked A. B. filed among the papers, and approved by the court.) The court doth, therefore, adjudge, order and decree, that commissioner Samuel Clarke, to whom hath been entrusted the management of the fund aforesaid, under the direction of the court, do proceed, without delay, to collect the same with such additions as shall have been made thereto since the 1st November 1818, as the respective sums loaned out, or payable for the original purchase money, shall fall due, after retaining his commissions thereon, and paying therefrom the costs yet unpaid which have been expended, as well by the plaintiffs and the defendants Harvey and wife and Bowyer, in the original suit of Borden v. Bowyer, as by the plaintiffs and defendants in the original and cross-suits of Branson v. Harvey and wife, and Harvey and wife v. Branson and others: that he do pay unto the plaintiffs the representatives of Joseph Borden deceased, their agent or attorney, the aforesaid sum of 8,391 dollars 63 cents, with six per centum per annum interest thereon from the 114 1st November *1818 till paid: that he pay unto the defendant John Borden, his agent or attorney, a like sum with like interest: that he pay unto the representatives of Rebecca Branson deceased, their agent or attorney, the sum of 20,000 dollars, with like interest from the same period till paid: that he pay unto the aforesaid Robert Harvey and wife, the aforesaid sum of 10,233 dollars 92 cents, with like interest from the same period till paid: and that he do pay unto the aforesaid John Bowyer, the said sum of 1,258 dollars 78 cents, with like interest from the same period till paid. If the fund aforesaid should be inadequate to the payment of the said several sums, then the sums decreed to the said Joseph Borden's representatives, John Borden, Harvey and wife and John Bowyer are to abate in the following manner; one-ninth of the deficiency is to be deducted from each of the sums decreed to said Joseph Borden's representatives and said John Borden, and the residue of the deficiency is to be deducted in equal moieties from the sums decreed to said Harvey and wife and Bowyer. If the said fund should be more than adequate to pay the said several sums, then the surplus shall be paid as followeth, one-ninth to said Joseph Borden's representatives, one-ninth to John Borden, and the residue in equal moieties to said Harvey and wife and Bowyer. It is further adjudged, ordered and decreed, that the agency of said Samuel Clarke in the sale of lands yet remaining unsold, continue as heretofore, and that he proceed to make sales thereof, in such manner as he may judge most conducive to the interest of the parties; and after retaining his commission, and the proper costs and charges of the sales, that he distribute the proceeds thereof, in the same manner as the surplus of the fund aforesaid is directed by this decree to be distributed. Leave is, however, reserved to the parties aforesaid, at any time whatever, to apply to this court, to supersede the appointment of said Clarke as commissioner to make sales as aforesaid, or to appoint any commissioner or commissioners to act with or to succeed him, or to have the said unsold lands divided amongst the parties aforesaid 115 *in the foregoing proportions. If it should so turn out that one-ninth part of the unsold lands aforesaid, should be more than sufficient to remunerate the said Harvey and wife and Bowyer, for the balance of the 20,000 dollars with interest decreed to the representatives of Branson, after deducting therefrom the said Branson's one-ninth of the fund aforesaid which has been assigned by this decree to the said Harvey and wife and Bowyer, then the surplus of the said one-ninth of the unsold lands shall go and be paid to the said representatives of Branson. It is further adjudged, ordered and decreed, that the bill of the plaintiffs be dismissed (but without cost) as to the defendants whose lands were surveyed and laid off, on the supposition that they were subject to the devise of a thousand acres in the will of Benjamin Borden the elder."

In April 1824, Harvey and wife presented a petition to the chancellor praying an appeal from the above decree of December 1820, as to the two suits between them and Branson, which he denied; and, in July 1824, they presented a petition for an appeal to a judge of this court, by whom it was allowed. And the cause being now called for hearing, Johnson, for the appellee, moved to dismiss the appeal, as having been improvidently allowed.

Whether it was so or no, depended on the character of the decree: if the decree was interlocutory, the cause was pending in the court of chancery when the appeal was allowed, and then the appeal might be allowed; if the decree was final, the appeal from it was barred by the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 66, § 53, whereby the right to the appeal is limited to three years from the date of the decree.

He maintained, that the decree was final; final as to all the causes; final, at least, as to the two causes between Branson and Harvey, as to which only the appeal from the decree had been taken.

116 *If the decree were interlocutory as to Borden v. Bowyer, it was not therefore the less final as to Branson and Harvey. It disposed of every point and subject in controversy between them; it determined the suits pending between them; it was final then as to them, even if the suit of Borden v. Bowyer were still left pending as to the parties thereto. Royall v. Johnson, 1 Rand. 421.

But the decree was final, as to the case of Borden v. Bowyer too. The chancellor certainly intended it should be so; for the decree expressly stated, that the causes came on to be finally heard. In the decree of July 1818, it was determined, that all the claims to the subject to be disposed of in Borden v. Bowyer, were extinguished, except the claims of the parties remaining in the court, in the three causes, when they were heard in December 1820. The claims of these parties, claims to the subject collected and at the disposal of the court in Borden v. Bowyer, alone remained to be adjusted. The decree of December 1820 decided every question in dispute; ascertained the rights of all the parties, in all the causes, to the whole subject in controversy; awarded the costs; and in short, left nothing to be done by the court, but to carry the decree into execution. The reservations made in the decree, had respect only to the future execution of it: liberty was not reserved to any party, ever afterwards, to contest the rights declared by it, but only to resort to the chancellor, for his aid in carrying it into effect, for the benefit of all parties. Reservations of this kind do not make a decree interlocutory. Sheppard v. Starke, 3 Munf. 29. If such reservations made a decree interlocutory, no decree could be final. For, in case of final, as well as interlocutory decrees, the parties have always a right to the aid of the court (whether liberty to apply for it be reserved or not) to execute the decrees they have obtained: indeed, they must resort to the court for the purpose, if the decree be not voluntarily and regularly fulfilled in all its provisions.

117 *Stanard, for the appellants, contended, that the decree was interlocutory. He said, every decree which leaves any thing to be done in the cause, by the court, was interlocutory, as between the parties remaining in court, though it might be final, as to the other parties then or previously dismissed from the cause. Fairfax v. Muse, 2 Hen. & Munf. 557-8, n. 2; Allen v. Belches, Id. 595; Aldridge v. Giles, 3 Hen. & Munf. 136; Templeman v. Steptoe, 1 Munf. 339; Goodwin v. Miller, 2 Munf. 42; Mackey v. Bell, Id. 523; Chapman v. Armistead, 4 Munf. 382, 398; Alexander v. Coleman, 6 Munf. 328. In Mackey v. Bell, the rights of the parties were completely adjusted, and the costs were awarded; yet this court held the decree interlocutory, because commissioners were appointed to carry the decree into effect: here, not only was a commissioner appointed to carry the decree into effect, but provisions were made for adding other or substituting new commissioners, or for dispensing with the sales, and making partition of the lands, by subsequent orders in the causes. The stating in the preamble of the decree, that the causes came on to be finally heard, could not determine the character of the decree: it could only shew, at the most, that the chancellor intended to make, or supposed he was making a final decree: but such a design (if it could fairly be inferred) could not make the decree final, if it was in truth interlocutory. The decree, which this court held to be interlocutory in Chapman v. Armistead, was manifestly intended to be a final one, by the court that pronounced it. The decree in question here, was a single decree in the three cases of Branson v. Harvey, Harvey v. Branson, and Borden v. Bowyer; in the scheme of the decree, the first two cases were indissolubly blended with the last; indeed, the whole of the subject, disposed of by the decree as between Branson and Harvey, grew out of, had been collected in, and appertained to, the case of Borden v. Bowyer: if, then, the decree was interlocutory as to Borden and Bowyer, it was so as to Branson and Harvey. Now, he said, the decree, as to Borden v.

118 Bowyer*, was clearly interlocutory: part of the lands remained to be sold by the commissioner; he was ordered to sell them; and those sales were of course to be reported to the court, and might be confirmed or set aside: accounts of subsequent collections of the proceeds of former as well as of subsequent sales, were to be rendered, were liable to exception, and were subject to the examination of the court. Otherwise, the chancellor's decree, in effect, constituted his commissioner a vice-chancellor. And, in those subsequent proceedings, all the parties in all the causes were interested, Branson as well as the others: for, by those proceedings, it was to be ascertained, whether the ninth part of the proceeds of the lands yet to be sold, will be more than sufficient to remunerate Harvey and Bowyer, for the balance of the 20,000 dollars and interest decreed to Branson, after deducting his ninth part of the fund in hand assigned by the decree to Harvey and Bowyer; in which case, the decree provided, that the surplus of the ninth part of the proceeds of the unsold lands shall be paid to Branson. The rights of the parties were not completely adjusted. The reservations contained in the decree, were therefore proper; and they were such as were proper only in an interlocutory decree, being reservations intended to be made effectual by subsequent orders or decrees in the same causes. If the decree were final, those reservations could only lay the foundation of new suits.

CARR, J. All decrees are either interlocutory or final: there is no middle class. In the progress of a cause, it often becomes necessary to make orders of different kinds, in order to enable the court to come at the whole case, or to settle the details, after the principles of the cause are decided: all these are interlocutory orders or decrees. But when a decree makes an end of a case, and decides the whole matter in contest, costs and all, leaving nothing further for the court to do, it is certainly a final decree. Let us try the case before us by this test.

119 Branson* filed his bill to recover 100 acres of land: this was the sole object of it. The defendants Harvey and wife filed their cross-bill, claiming that if Branson should recover the land, they might be indemnified out of the assets of his father descended to him. To Branson the chancellor said, he could not give him land, but he would give him the value of it in money; and he decreed his receiver to pay him 20,000 dollars. To Harvey and wife he said, that no lands had descended to Branson from his father, in respect of which he was liable on his father's warranty; but that there was a fund in the power of the court, which he was seeking, and which the court held liable to their indemnity; and that fund they should have, so far as it would go: accordingly he directed his receiver to pay this fund, so far as it was in hand, and to continue to apply it in the same way, as it shall accrue. The costs are given in both cases; and the bill dismissed as to some of the defendants, against whom no decree could be made. Now, did not this make an end of the business? What remained to be acted upon? What more did the court mean to do, or could it do? I cannot conceive. It is said, that the land was not all sold, from which the fund was to arise: but that, in my judgment, has no effect on the character of the decree. The court had done all it meant to do, or could do; and, in the suit of Borden v. Bowyer, the rights and interests in this land, and in the proceeds of it, had been settled, and also the mode of sale and distribution. Branson's share both of the money raised and of the land to be sold, was settled at a ninth: all his share of the money in hand, the court had decreed to Harvey and Bowyer, and all the proceeds of future sales, till they should be paid. To say that this was not a final decree, would be saying that no final decree could be made in such a case. How many decrees do we see, directing money to be paid at stated times, thereafter; decreeing an annuity for instance: but it never was doubted, that such decrees were final, if intended to be so.

120 *But it is said, that this case is so blended with that of Borden v. Bowyer, as to have become a part of the same cause, and that the decree being, as to Borden v. Bowyer, clearly interlocutory, this must be so as to Branson v. Harvey too. But how are these blended? there has been no order of consolidation, and I do not understand how without that, two distinct causes can become one. A consolidation of them, would seem to me very improper; their objects are different, and so are the parties in interest. The suit of Borden v. Bowyer is not before us; we have no copy of the record; I can speak of it, therefore, only from extracts from it, introduced into this case. Its general object seems to have been, a call upon the representatives of Benjamin Borden the younger, to account for and distribute the proceeds of all the lands, which Benjamin Borden the elder directed should be sold, and the proceeds divided among his children. To this suit all the children or their representatives must have been parties. But the bill of Branson, was for a specific devise of 1000 acres of land to his mother; and no child was made a party to this; nobody but Harvey and wife. How then could the suits have been consolidated? Would it have been right to have clogged

Branson, who had a specific object in view, by forcing him into the general contest, and affecting him by all the costs and all the delays, arising from such a number of parties, and such numerous subjects and points of litigation? The causes were connected in this way only: the chancellor declining to give Branson land, threw him upon Harvey and Bowyer's portion of the general fund, collected in Borden v. Bowyer; and also gave Harvey and Bowyer indemnity out of Branson's share of that same fund: but this could not make the two suits one.

It is said the chancellor heard them together, and pronounced one decree in them all. It is true the chancellor found it more convenient to have one hearing, and to pronounce one decree, than two; but 121 it was never in his *thought, that by this proceeding he was consolidating them: for throughout both his decrees, he treats them as distinct and separate suits; and it may be seen at a glance, what part of the decree is referable to the one, and what to the other.

I cannot think then, that this case is, in any respect, made a part of Borden v. Bowyer. But if it were, and if the decree in Borden v. Bowyer, was clearly interlocutory, it would not follow, that the decree here must of necessity be so too. The claim of Branson was certainly a distinct one: none of the parties to the other suit, none of the heirs of Borden, participated in that claim: he claimed for himself alone, the share of his mother; her 1000 acres. Even, then, if he had carried this separate claim into the general suit, there might have been a final decree as to him, without any decree on the other parts of the cause. For, I think, this court clearly right in Royal's adm'r. v. Johnson, where it decided that where a decree is made as to one of several defendants, the interests of that one being wholly unconnected with the others, and he being directed to receive or pay costs, such decree is final as to him, though the cause may be still pending in court as to the rest. Now, I have shewn, that the decree makes a complete disposition of the subjects of the bill and cross-bill of Branson v. Harvey, with the costs; and these subjects are so entirely unconnected with the objects of Borden v. Bowyer, that it would be difficult to imagine, how any thing subsequently done in this last, could affect the right or interest of Branson.

But I am strongly inclined to think this decree is final as to Borden v. Bowyer itself. I can only judge from the extracts from the record of that case, before mentioned, and the decree itself. The objection taken at the bar, I understood to be, not that the court had left any part of the case undecided, but that the decision was not final, because the commissioner of the court was still to go on and sell the lands, and because liberty was reserved to the parties to apply to the court to supersede 122 him, or to appoint one or *more commissioners to act with him, or to succeed him, or to have the unsold lands divided among the parties in the proportions settled by the decree. But this does not seem to me, to make the decree interlocutory. The commissioner was not to report his proceedings: the court did not mean to pass upon them, in order to their validity. The power to sell, included the power to convey: and he was to distribute the money in settled proportions, as it came to hand. The liberty reserved to the parties to apply to the court, was merely to enable it to stop the commissioner, if he should be found abusing his trust; or to stop him, if all the parties should agree to divide the unsold lands, in the proportions settled by the decree. No leave was given to apply to the court to change any part of the decree in principle. We know, that in all cases where lands are to be sold, and the money applied to the use of particular persons, if all interested be sui juris and agree upon it, they may apply to equity, and elect to have the land. The leave given here, was nothing more: they could have done it of themselves in pais. But does not the very circumstance of leave being given to the parties, shew that the decree is final, and they out of court? If the case was still pending, and the parties in court, what need could there be of leave to apply to the court? In England, I find it every day's practice to appeal from decrees, where leave is granted to apply to the court for its assistance. It seems never to have been thought of there, that such leave makes the decree interlocutory.

It seems to me, that such a doctrine in this case, would be calculated to do much mischief. How long will you keep the decree open? The parties may apply or not: it is perfectly optional with them. The decree may be for years in a course of execution. There seem to be various scraps and slipes of land, the remnants of a large body, scattered here and there, through two or three counties. The commissioner is not to sell at once, or at auction: this would involve a sacrifice, which the parties did not wish. Years may 123 *pass away, before he closes the agency. And would it not be productive of fearful mischief, to decide, that during all that time, there shall be a lis pendens? that every thing done in the cause, may be undone? that all the titles, (perhaps, two or three hundred) suppose to have been settled by the decree, are still liable to be disturbed? and that every one who has purchased since the decree, resting (as he thought) on the firm foundation of a final decree not appealed from, is to be taken as a lite pendente purchaser? Such a doctrine promulgated, would shake many titles to their foundation.

I have met with but one case in our reports, which may seem to apply to this point; the case of Sheppard v. Starke. That was a bill brought against an executor by a distributee, for an account, and division of the residuum: a certain sum was decreed against the executor, to be paid to the children on their executing bonds &c.: "and liberty was reserved to the parties, or either of them, to resort to the court for its further interposition, if it should be found necessary." To this decree, the executor filed a bill of review, upon which proceedings and a decree were had; and the cause came up by appeal. On the argument here, not a word was said about the character of the decree, or the regularity of the bill of review. This court prefaced its opinion on the merits, by saying, "the court is of opinion, that though either of the parties to the original decree pronounced in this cause, might, in a summary way, have resorted to the court of chancery, for its further interposition, if deemed necessary, (under the special reservation in the decree contained,) they might also proceed by bill, as was done in the present instance; that mode being equally justified by the reservation aforesaid, and beneficial to the parties." It is clear to me, that the court had no intention, there, of expressing an opinion, that the decree was interlocutory: if so, it could not have sustained the bill of review, which, we know, can only be filed after a final decree; for not even the consent of parties can make a decree 124 final, which in its nature and terms *is interlocutory, as the court had decided in M'Call v. Peachy, 3 Munf. 296.

Upon the whole, I am of opinion, that the decree in the two suits of Branson v. Harvey, was final, and not being appealed from in time, the appeal must be dismissed.

GREEN, J. I am of the same opinion. In my judgment, every decree which leaves nothing more to be done in the cause, no subject to be acted upon or disposed of, no question to be decided by the court, is in its nature final; and that, therefore, this decree, in respect both to the case of Borden v. Bowyer and the cases of Branson and Harvey, is final. But I have some doubts, whether this opinion be quite conformable with former adjudications of the court, on questions touching the character of decrees, whether interlocutory or final.

BROOKE, President. I concur in the opinion, that the decree is final and conclusive, as to all the cases; and this, as well upon the former decisions of the court on like questions, as upon principle. I consider the case of Sheppard v. Starke, as in point: the court there, must have regarded the decree as final, else it could not have entertained the bill of review as regular and proper. As to the reservations in this decree, those and all similar reservations, are, in my view, simply provisions for the execution of the decree, as one final and conclusive, not reservations of any points for future consideration and decision.

The appeal was dismissed.

(Absent BROOKE, P.)

Conveyance of Land—Proviso—When Not Executory—Case at Bar.—M. agrees to sell R. a tract of land, parcel of a larger tract held by him, to consist of equal quantities of bottom and hill land, the boundaries of the bottom being fixed, but its quantity unknown: M. by deed, conveys R. a tract of land within specified bounds supposed to contain equal quantities of bottom and hill, with a proviso, inserted after the conveying part of the deed, that if the specified bounds contain less, or contain more, hill than bottom, in the one case, one of the lines described in the deed shall be drawn in so as to exclude the excess of hill land, and in the other case, that the same line should be thrown out so as to include as much of hill as bottom: and it is found, by survey, that the lines described in the deed, contain 76 acres less of hill than bottom, so that the line specified in the proviso is thrown farther out to include this 76 acres of hill. HELD, that the proviso is not a mere executory contract to convey the additional 76 acres of hill land, but this 76 acres is conveyed by the deed, and that with sufficient certainty.

Same—Mortgage to Secure Purchase Price—When Not an Encumbrance on Title Although There is No Release—General Warranty*—Case at Bar.—M. agrees to sell R. 822 acres of land, for 5,754 dollars, and the parties covenant, that as the sufficiency of M.'s title is not certain, M. shall procure his brother to join him in the conveyance with general warranty to R. which is done accordingly: the 822 acres is parcel of a large tract of 12,500 acres, which was purchased of P. in London, in 1803, and then mortgaged to secure the purchase money £3,375 sterling: this mortgage has never been recorded in Virginia, and there is strong reason to believe the debt thereby secured fully paid: but no release of it has been obtained. HELD, this mortgage is no valid objection to a decree for M. against R. for a balance of the purchase money of the 822 acres of land.

Charles Fenton Mercer, by deed of bargain and sale, dated January 13th 1804, and duly recorded in the county court of Mason in July following; reciting that he had purchased of William Philip Perrin of London, a large tract lying on the Ohio, of near 14,000 acres, which Perrin had purchased of George Mercer deceased, for £3,375 sterling, payable in four instalments; that this purchase had been made for the mutual benefit of himself, John Fenton Mercer and James Mercer Garnett, though the land had been conveyed by Perrin to him alone; and that he had mortgaged the land to Perrin to secure the purchase money; in consideration, that John Fenton Mercer and 126 James Mercer Garnett *agreed to pay, each, one third of the purchase money to Perrin, conveyed to each of them, one equal undivided third part of the land, in fee simple.

Partition of this land was soon afterwards made between the two Mercers and Garnett.

By articles, dated August 31st 1809, between John F. Mercer and James Richards, Mercer covenanted to sell and convey to Richards 1300 acres of land on Sixteen Mile creek in Mason county (parcel of a lot which had been assigned to him in the partition) for a price to be ascertained by arbitrament, and to be satisfied and paid by Richards, partly by a conveyance to Mercer of other designated lands then held by Richards, and partly in money. And the articles contained a covenant in these words: "As the sufficiency of the titles, by which the lands aforesaid are respectively held by the parties, is not known to them, for the further assurance of the sufficiency, the said Mercer covenants and agrees, that he will procure Charles F. Mercer to join him in the conveyance of the said 1300 acres of land, and in a general warranty thereof, to the said Richards, or he will convey the lands he may receive from the said Richards, in trust, to such persons as may be nominated by the said Richards, for his benefit, and liable to be sold in the event of the failure of the said Mercer's title to the land he may convey to the said Richards or any part thereof, for as much money as may be lost by the insufficiency of the said Mercer's title." And Richards, on his part, entered into a similar covenant, for securing to Mercer, the title of the lands he contracted to convey him in exchange.

This contract was afterwards modified, by agreement between the parties, so as that John F. Mercer, instead of the 1300 acres of land on Sixteen Mile creek, mentioned in the original articles, was to sell and convey to Richards another piece of land on Crab creek and the Ohio, parcel of another designated lot that had also been assigned to Mercer in the partition above mentioned; which substituted tract was to consist of equal quantities of hill land 127 and river bottom, the *former at two dollars, and the latter at twelve dollars, averaging for the whole seven dollars per acre. The boundaries of the bottom land intended to be sold, were ascertained and known at the time; but the quantity of bottom was not known; and (of course) it was not known, how the lines were to be run, so as to include an equal quantity of hill land.

In pursuance of the contract, thus modified, John F. Mercer and Charles F. Mercer, by deed, dated November 8th 1809, conveyed to Richards, a parcel of land lying on the Ohio, in Mason, "bounded as follows; beginning at or near the mouth of Crab creek, at the corner of the said John F. Mercer and James Mercer Garnett; thence, with the line of Mercer and Garnett, to the back line of the original military survey called Mercer's bottom, to another corner of Mercer and Garnett in the said back line; thence northwardly as far along the same (the back line), as to the common point of intersection of the said back line with a line running from the lower corner of Caroline Maret's lot, at the foot of the hills, parallel with the said Mercer and Garnett's line; thence (that is, from the point of intersection of the said back and parallel lines) with the parallel line, to the corner of Caroline Maret's lower line (this is the course called the short parallel), to the river Ohio; and thence with the meanders thereof to the beginning, containing by supposition 700 acres of hill and bottom land." Habendum, "the said tract or parcel of land" with the appurtenances &c. to the said Richards, his heirs and assigns: "Provided that should the hill land within the said boundaries, exceed in number of acres the river bottom therein contained, then the said hill land shall be reduced to the same extent with the bottom, by running the short parallel above mentioned, as much nearer to the line of Mercer and Garnett aforesaid, as may be necessary for that purpose; and should the hill land, on the other hand, be less in quantity than the bottom within the said boundaries, then the quantity of hill land shall be extended, by running the said short parallel as much farther from the said Mercer and 128 Garnett's line, *as may be necessary

*Conveyance of Land—Defect in Title—General Warranty.—A vendee in possession of land under a conveyance of general warranty has no claim to relief in equity against the payment of the purchase money on the grounds of a defect in title where there has been no actual eviction or suit depending or threatened. Beale v. Seiveley, 8 Leigh 675, citing Ralston v. Miller, 8 Rand. 44; Yancey v. Lewis, 4 Hen. & M. 390; Grantland v. Wight, 5 Munf. 296; Richards v. Mercer, 1 Leigh 125; Koger v. Kane, 5 Leigh 606. for that purpose, and thus having equalized the number of acres of bottom and hill, provided the whole quantity shall fall short of 700 acres, there shall be a reduction from the purchase money, of seven dollars per acre for every acre it may so fall short; on the other hand, should the said tract of land exceed in quantity 700 acres, then for every acre of such excess, seven dollars per acre shall be added to the price," to be paid by Richards, as provided by the articles of August 31st 1809, in respect to the money thereby contracted to be by him paid. This deed contains a covenant of general warranty of both John F. and Charles F. Mercer.

Richards, in May 1810, procured a survey of the land he had thus bought, to be made by the surveyor of Mason, wherein the bottom was represented to contain 373 acres, and the short parallel was so run as to include 373 acres of hill land; in all 746 acres.

Richards made several payments on account of the purchase money; but before the transaction was closed, John F. Mercer died, and by his will devised his estate to Charles F. Mercer, and appointed him executor: who, in July 1819, exhibited his bill against Richards, in the superior court of chancery of Fredericksburg, setting forth the facts above stated; complaining, that in the survey which had been made at Richards's instance, in May 1810, there were in truth 441 instead of 373 acres of bottom, and only 305 instead of 373 acres of hill land; insisting that, consequently, according to the terms of the proviso contained in the deed of November 8th 1809, Richards was bound to take 136 acres more of hill land at the price of seven dollars per acre; and praying, that the land might be laid off to Richards conformably with the true intent of the covenants and of the deed, and that he might be decreed to settle and to pay the balance of the purchase money.

Richards, in his answer, insisted on the survey of May 1810, as fair in itself, and one in which the Mercers had acquiesced.

129 *In the progress of the cause, the chancellor ordered a survey, which was made and returned by the surveyor of Mason. It appeared by this survey, that the quantity of bottom land was 411 acres; and the line, called the short parallel, was thrown out, so as to include the equal quantity of hill land; making in all 822 acres; that is to say, 76 acres more than Richards's survey had made it.

The chancellor also ordered an account, to ascertain the balance of the purchase money due from Richards. The commissioner reported that both parties acquiesced in the last survey, and stated the balance to be 1,774 dollars, with interest &c. With this report both parties were content.

But Richards, in the mean time, by leave of the court, filed a supplemental answer; wherein he stated, that since filing his former answer, he had discovered, that the whole tract of 14,000 acres, whereof the land he had bought of John F. Mercer was parcel, had been mortgaged by Charles F. Mercer to William Philip Perrin of London, to secure £3,375. sterling, payable in four equal annual instalments, with interest from October 1803; and that this mortgage (for aught he knew) was still a subsisting security and incumbrance on the land.

Upon this, all the deeds affecting the title, were exhibited. The land was originally granted to George Mercer, by the colonial government, by patent dated in December 1772, wherein the quantity is stated to be 13,532 acres. George Mercer, by deed of lease and release, dated in November 1773, conveyed the whole tract to William Philip Perrin (described as being of the parish of St. George, Bloomsbury, in the county of Middlesex). By deed of lease and release, dated October 1803, W. P. Perrin (described in this deed, as being of Dorset street, in the parish of St. Mary Le Bone in the county of Middlesex) conveyed the whole tract to Charles F. Mercer, for the consideration of £3,375. sterling, payable in four instalments: And C. F. Mercer immediately mortgaged it to Perrin (described here also as of Dorset street &c.) as a security for the purchase 130 money. *He also gave his bonds for the debt, in which Mr. Monroe, then American Minister at London, and a Mr. Rennolds of London, were his sureties. And, in July 1809, Perrin conveyed the land and assigned the mortgage and the debt to Rennolds. The conveyance from Perrin to C. F. Mercer, was recorded in the general court; but neither Mercer's mortgage to Perrin, nor Perrin's assignment thereof to Rennolds, was ever recorded in Virginia.

Mercer averred, that the whole of the debt due to Perrin, had long since been paid; and he adduced evidence, which rendered it highly probable, though not certain, that it was paid. But no release of the mortgage, either by the heirs of Perrin or of Rennolds (they were both dead) was produced; and it seems, that for the want of knowledge who or where they were, such release could not be procured. It appeared, indeed, that Mercer had forgotten the execution of the mortgage, till he was reminded of it by the supplemental answer of Richards.

The chancellor was of opinion, that the mortgage to Perrin was no obstacle to the relief prayed by Mercer; and he decreed, that Richards should pay Mercer the balance of 1,774 dollars, with interest &c. and the costs of suit: but the decree did not require, that Mercer should convey to Richards, the surplus 76 acres of hill land, included in the lines of the survey made under the order of court, which the decree compelled Richards to take, and the price of which constituted part of the balance of purchase money decreed.

Stanard, for the appellant, made two objections to the decree. 1st. The deed of November 1809 conveys the land lying within certain defined metes and bounds, and no more; and the survey made under the order of the chancellor having departed from those metes and bounds, and thrown out the short parallel, so as to include 76 acres of hill land lying without the metes and bounds specified in the deed, that deed did not pass this additional 76 acres.

131 The *proviso in the deed is an executory contract for the conveyance of such additional quantity; but it is not itself a conveyance, nor can it enlarge the actual conveyance that precedes it. It is apparent, that the deed was not intended to convey, by its own force, more than the quantity contained within the bounds therein specified. The chancellor, therefore, ought not to have decreed the unconditional payment of the whole purchase money, including the price of the additional 76 acres, without providing that Mercer should make a conveyance thereof to Richards.

2d. The proof of the payment of the debt due to Perrin and secured by the mortgage, is insufficient to establish the fact; and if the debt be paid, yet the mortgage has not been released, and therefore the legal estate is still outstanding in the heir at law of Perrin or of Rennolds; neither has the heir at law of Perrin or of Rennolds been made a party, so that the court could decree a release of the mortgage. John F. Mercer, at the time of his sale to Richards, and Charles F. Mercer, at the time of the decree, held only an equitable estate. And the court ought not to have made the decree until the legal title was got in; or at least it ought to have made the payment of the balance of the purchase money by Richards, dependent on the consummation of his title.

Harrison and Johnson, for the appellee. As to the 1st point: To understand the description of the land contained in the deed, and especially the effect of the proviso, it must be remarked, that, at the time the deed was made, the river boundary in front, the western line (Mercer and Garnett's line), the back line of the military survey, the eastern line running out from the river quite through the bottom to the very foot of the river hills but no farther (Maret's lower line), and the back line of Maret's land, were all fixed and known to the parties; and the river hills gave the line which divided the bottom from the hill land; so that the boundaries of the bottom land were fixed; but the quantity to the bottom land had not been ascertained; conse-

132 quently, it was not known *where the short parallel, or the line which was to be run parallel to Mercer and Garnett's line, and which was to be run from the back line to Maret's land, ought to be located, so as to include as much of hill as there was of bottom land; and consequently, too, the number of acres intended to be sold was not ascertained. Therefore, it was not intended to fix the location of the short parallel by the deed, but to prescribe a certain method of locating it: the quantity of bottom land within the known boundaries of it, was first to be ascertained; and then the short parallel was to be drawn in, or thrown out, so as to give an equal quantity of hill land. The function of the proviso is to explain the previous description of the land conveyed; it is part of the description. The deed leaves the short parallel ambulatory; but it prescribes a plain and simple mathematical process for the location of it; and wherever it should by that process be located, it was the effect as well as the intent of the deed, to convey all the land within it, and no more. Greater precision and certainty cannot be required. Accordingly, Richards made no complaint in the court of chancery, as to the sufficiency of the deed to convey all the land included in the last survey, which fixed the location of the short parallel; and the amount of the purchase money, by his express assent before the commissioner, was computed with reference to the quantity shewn by that survey.

As to the 2d objection, there are many considerations any one of which would furnish a sufficient answer, much more all combined. 1. The mortgage to Perrin was never recorded in Virginia; and it was a conveyance of real estate to an alien, for Perrin is therein described as of Dorset street, in the parish of St. Mary Le Bone in the county of Middlesex; and though the instrument might have been available as a security in equity, yet as there can be little doubt that the mortgaged debt has been satisfied, it could never avail him to recover the naked legal title. 2. There was certainly no fraudulent concealment of this incumbrance practised by John F. Mercer upon Richards: On the contrary, 133 *the probable defect of the title is noticed in the original articles of August 31st 1809. Richards, in all probability, had actual notice of this mortgage, when he purchased: and if he had not, he might with the exercise of the slightest diligence have had notice of it: if he looked at all into the title of his vendor (as all purchasers ought, and almost all do) he would have seen a recital of this mortgage in the deed under which his vendor immediately claimed, then of record in Mason county court open to his inspection; namely, Charles F. Mercer's deed to his brother and Mr. Garnett, of January 13th 1804. He took, and he has hitherto held, possession, undisturbed. No suit has been prosecuted; none is threatened. He cannot now object this technical and patent, if not known, defect in the title. Sugd. law of Vend. 2, 8; Id. ch. 9, § vi. 345, 6, 7; (a) Ralston v. Miller, 3 Rand. 44; Vail v. Nelson, 4 Rand. 478. And 3. Richards knew there were doubts concerning the title, and stipulated for a particular security; a covenant of general warranty, wherein Charles F. Mercer should join with the vendor. This security he has got. He can ask no more. Sugd. ch. 9, § iv. 331; Harg. Co. Litt. 384, a. note 1.

Stanard, in reply. The reasoning, by which the appellee's counsel endeavour to obviate the first objection to the decree, conflicts with the principle on which the bill is framed, its prayer and its object. The argument concludes, that the deed of November 1809, was an executed contract in all its parts, and that this is a suit only to recover the purchase money: whereas the bill treats the proviso contained in the deed as an executory covenant, and prays a specific execution of it. And the bill takes the right ground. There is not a single word of grant or conveyance in the deed, that applies to a foot of land lying without the lines therein specified: the proviso, surely contains no words of grant; it is, in its terms, an executory contract; there 134 is "nothing in the context, to give it a meaning variant from that which its words import; and no principle of equity or even of convenience requires, that the construction should be strained in the least. The short parallel is defined by the deed as precisely as any other line: the deed gives its course, its terminus a quo and terminus ad quem; calls for a straight line, parallel to Mercer and Garnett's line, from Maret's corner to the back line of the military survey; and conveys all the hill land included within that line, and neither more nor less. The proviso is a covenant providing for a future change of this line. Its language is prospective throughout; providing what should be done afterwards, and not even professing to declare what was done, or intended to be done, in this particular, by the deed. If the short parallel as located by the deed, should be found to include more of hill than of bottom land, the proviso bound Mercer to take a re-conveyance of the excess, and to make a proportional abatement from the price; if found to include less of hill than of bottom, Richards was bound to accept a conveyance of, and to pay for, an additional quantity of hill land. This is the effect of the proviso. According to the construction of the appellee's counsel, the deed does not, proprio vigore, pass the additional hill land; it operates to convey it, only by force of the future survey: in effect, the survey, not the deed, is the operative conveyance of the additional 76 acres of hill land: and whether a survey can be a conveyance of land, let the court judge.

Then, as to the incumbrance of Perrin's mortgage. That this mortgage was not recorded, can no wise help Richards, seeing that he has notice of it, before payment of the purchase money. Supposing Perrin an alien, and admitting that therefore he cannot claim to take and hold under the mortgage, as a conveyance, at law, it is nevertheless effectual as a security for the debt in equity; and I submit, that the evidence does not suffice to establish the payment of the debt. But, there is no proof that Perrin was an alien, unless it be impossible that an American citizen can be domiciled *in London. And if the 135 description of Perrin's domicile in the mortgage, prove him an alien, it proves too, that he was a British subject; so that he was competent to take and hold under George Mercer's conveyance of November 1773; and, under that conveyance, as the land was never confiscated, he continued to hold it, till the 6th article of the treaty of 1783 prevented any future confiscation, and till the 9th article of the treaty of 1794 secured his title, and provided, that with respect to this subject, and the legal remedies incident thereto, he should not be regarded as an alien, but might grant, sell or devise it, in like manner as if he was an American citizen. (1 Bior. Laws U. S. 205, 212.) That Perrin was competent to sell and convey the subject in 1803, the appellee himself must maintain; else Richards has no title at all. Can it be doubted, that the treaty of 1794 enabled him to take an immediate mortgage of the same subject, to secure the purchase money? The argument deduced from the supposition, that Richards had actual notice of Perrin's mortgage, or at least that that incumbrance was a patent defect in the title, of which he might without gross negligence have acquired knowledge is refuted by the fact, clearly appearing on the record, that this mortgage was so little known, or had made so little impression on the Mercers themselves, that Charles F. Mercer, who executed the instrument, had forgotten that it ever existed. With what reason can it be contended that Richards was conscious of that of which the Mercers were ignorant? There is as little reason to impute knowledge of the defect to him, as concealment of it to them. The proposition, that the parties have stipulated, and Richards has obtained a particular security against defects of title, namely, a general warranty of the land, in which both the Mercers joined, is quite destitute of foundation, unless the appellee be at liberty to tear a covenant out of the contract of August 1809, for the sale of 1300 acres of land on Sixteen Mile creek, though that contract was completely abandoned, and to insert it

 136 *deed of November 1809, for the sale of another parcel of land on Crab creek. Let it be remembered, that this is not a case of a purchaser coming into equity, asking relief on account of defect of title, after having accepted a conveyance, and paid the purchase money, but of a vendor, claiming specific execution and payment of the purchase money, and a defect of title discovered, before the purchase money is all paid, and before specific execution decreed. In such a case, the very authorities cited for the appellee, prove that the vendor is bound to clear the title. Sugd. ch. 9, § vi. p. 345. The objection to the title is not merely technical: the legal estate is outstanding: and this is so serious an objection, that it has become a settled and invariable rule, that a purchaser shall not be compelled to accept a doubtful title, nor be forced to take an equitable one. Sugd. ch. 7, § III. 242.

COALTER, J., compared the price at which John F. Mercer sold Richards the tracts of 822 acres, with that at which Charles F. Mercer bought of Perrin the whole military tract of 13,582 acres; and shewed, that the purchase money of the small parcel bought by Richards, containing not a sixteenth of the whole tract, amounted to about a third of the purchase money for which the whole tract had been bought of Perrin: whence, he said, it might be fairly inferred, that if the whole debt secured by the mortgage to Perrin, were yet unsatisfied, there would be land enough, and much more than enough, to satisfy the whole debt, without touching the parcel held by Richards. But he remarked there were many circumstances (which he stated and commented on) to raise a belief that the debt to Perrin had been fully paid.

And (he proceeded) though these circumstances do not amount to absolute proof of the payment of the debt secured by the mortgage to Perrin, yet they go so strongly to establish a belief that this must be the fact, as to authorise us (as it seems to me), especially connected with the other circumstances of the case, to leave the party 137 to his remedy on *the covenants in his deed. Those other circumstances are, that first stated, namely, the improbability that the parcel of land bought by Richards, could in any event be touched by Perrin's mortgage, and the further fact, that the parties, being ignorant as to the goodness of the title to the lands given in exchange under the contract, or being apprised that difficulties of some kind or other did exist, agreed mutually to procure others to join them in the deeds and covenants of warranty, so as to secure them against such defects. This, therefore, is stronger than the ordinary case of covenants by a vendor alone; a particular security was required, and that very security given: and if, in an ordinary case, a court (under such circumstances as this case presents) might turn the party over to his covenants, a fortiori may it be done where security was required and given.

It is said, the legal title is still outstanding, and the party has a right to have it in. If, however, the debt has been paid, as there is every reason to believe, can actual notice of an unrecorded mortgage, after payment, affect the party at law? Is it not void for want of registry, unless notice is given before the debt is discharged? I incline to think there can be no danger to the party on this ground. The deed to Richards does not lead him, by reference, to the deed of Charles F. Mercer, to his brother and Mr. Garnett, in which alone the mortgage is mentioned; and he swears he had no actual notice of the mortgage until May 1822. At most, then, he had before that time, such implied notice as might affect him in equity in relation to the creditor, had the mortgage been undischarged. It seems to me, it could not have been the intention of the legislature, that notice of an unrecorded satisfied mortgage should affect the party at law.

I should be sorry to be obliged to say, that a mortgage executed in a foreign country, held up for so long a time, and when it must be so difficult to get releases &c. shall be a sufficient ground, on which to hold up the purchase money, especially under the circumstances attending this case. How long is it to be held up?

138 *The mere possibility that the legal title conveyed by the mortgage may prove a disturbance to Richards's title, resting on the intire improbability that the debt has not been paid, or that it cannot be paid out of the remaining lands, is surely too slight a ground, on which either to vacate the contract, if that was asked, or to tie up the purchase money to an indefinite period of time. The covenants and security given in the deed ought to be enough to cover this surmise of a want of clear title. How could Perrin disturb the title, either at law or in equity, if the money has been paid, or can be satisfied out of the remaining lands, or can be made out of Mercer?

But it is further said, that the deed does not convey that small portion of the hill land, which is now embraced by the moveable line, as now established by the decree in this case.

This seems to be an objection thought of, for the first time, in this court. It is not taken in the answer; and it is not to be supposed, that, if any doubt had been suggested in the court below, there could have been any hesitation in that court to decree a conveyance thereof, either by the party, or by a commissioner. If there were any doubt on this subject, however, and if the decree were to be reversed on such ground, the costs ought to be paid by the appellant, the appellee having substantially prevailed. But can there be any doubt as to this matter?

The bottom land was bounded by the river on one side, and by established lines on two of the other sides, running out from the river to the hills; and was bounded on the other side by the hill land. The whole bottom land is conveyed, but the quantity was not precisely known. Had the parties established the lines along the foot of the hill, and stated them in the deed, leaving the quantity unascertained, and then made the same provisions as are now contained in the deed; it is believed, all would agree that the deed would convey one equal quantity of hill land. The parties intended a conveyance, and not an executory contract, as to the hill land; and the question is, whether, as the mar- 139 gin of the hill *land was not ascertained in the deed, but as that must now be a matter resting on opinion only, the deed can operate a conveyance? This objection, if well founded, might (it seems to me) go further than in the argument it was thought fit to push it: it might go to shew that the contract itself, considering it executory, could not be executed for uncertainty. Who is to form this opinion, if the parties, themselves, have left it vague? But if others can ascertain the line of division between the hill and bottom land, then so soon as that is done, it is as certain, as if the parties themselves had done it in the first instance, and the residue follows by mathematical certainty. That is certain which can be rendered so. Suppose the parties themselves, or a surveyor for them, had run this border line, so as to ascertain the quantity of bottom land, and they had thus been satisfied as to that, and the surveyor had proceeded, with like consent, to close and mark the open line, and Mercer had afterwards brought his ejectment for the land, thus embraced in the survey, is it possible, that any court of law, these facts appearing, could hesitate in deciding that the deed covered this land?

But here is a decree settling the boundary, in a suit brought by Mercer, claiming to settle it precisely as it has been; and it is, in fact, by the assent of both parties to the survey, settled to their mutual satisfaction. Who can disturb this? not Mercer surely; and if he cannot, no one under him can; no one can, except one having title paramount to both. No mere intruder could prevail against this title, thus confirmed by a decree founded on assent as to the boundaries. Hence, no one in the court below dreamed of the necessity of a farther conveyance. The strong reasons urged in the argument in favor of this position also furnish additional ground to shew, that no doubt ought to exist on this point.

On the whole, therefore, I think the decree ought to be affirmed.

The other judges concurred, and the decree was affirmed.

[19 Am. Dec. 743.]

(Absent BROOKE, P., and COALTER, J.)

Judgments—Order of Satisfaction.*—If several creditors by judgments of different dates, resort to a court of equity, for satisfaction out of an equitable interest of their debtor in real estate, they are to have satisfaction out of the fund, according to the order of their judgments in point of time, the elder being entitled to priority over the younger.

Same—On What a Lien.—In equity, judgments are liens on the whole of the debtor's equitable estate in lands; so that not a moiety only but the whole fund is first to be applied to satisfy the elder judgment, and not a moiety only but the whole of the residue is then to be applied to satisfy the younger judgment.

Same—Elegit—How Lands Extended—Quere.—Whether if there be two judgments of different dates, and elegits on each, and a moiety of the debtor's lands be extended on the elder, the whole instead of half only of the other moiety, be not properly extendible on the younger judgment.

By deed dated June 10, 1823, Mereday Haley conveyed to his sons Philip and William Haley, in fee, a mill and sixty-five acres of land thereto adjoining, and another tract of sixty acres, lying in Caroline county. The consideration expressed in the deed was 1500 dollars, and a receipt for the money of the same date with the deed, was subjoined to it.

The same Mereday Haley, by deed dated June 18, 1823, conveyed to Samuel Chiles and Timothy Chandler, trustees, a tract of 340 acres of land in Caroline, and the same mill and lands comprised in the deed of June 10, 1823, ten slaves, sundry stock of horses, cows &c. plantation utensils, and household and kitchen furniture, in trust, to secure a debt of 1099 dollars due by M. Haley to F. James & Co. and another debt of 935 dollars due to his son Joseph C. Haley.

Judgments—Order of Satisfaction.—Amongst incumbrancers, where all having nothing but equities, and none the legal title, their equities being equal, they are entitled to satisfaction according to the priority of their incumbrances in point of time, upon the maxim qui prior est in tempore, potior est in jure. Couits v. Walker, 2 Leigh 280, citing Haleys v. Williams, 1 Leigh 140. To the same effect the principal case is cited in Michaux v. Brown, 10 Gratt. 619; Hale v. Horne, 21 Gratt. 123; Findlay v. Toncray, 2 Rob. 377.

+Decrees—On What a Lien.—A decree creates a lien on the debtor's equity of redemption under his deed of trust; for though the equity of redemption could not be sold under a fi. fa. and was not extendible, yet the decree constituted an equitable lien thereon, entitled to priority over subsequent liens by judgment or otherwise. Findlay v. Toncray, 2 Rob. 377, citing Haleys v. Williams, 1 Leigh 140; Couits v. Walker, 2 Leigh 280. The principal case is also cited in Nickell v. Handly, 10 Gratt. 399, and in McClung v. Belrne, 10 Leigh 406, citing the principal case. It is said, the equity of redemption in land conveyed in trust should have been first sold out and out,—not a moiety only, but the whole.

But where a creditor, standing on the lien of his judgment alone, comes into a court of equity to day Haley conveyed to George Martin, 176 acres of land, apparently parcel of the largest tract comprised in the deed of trust of June 18, 1823, for the sum of 1200 dollars, whereof Martin paid 50 dollars, and gave his bond for 1150 dollars, which bond M. Haley transferred to his son Joseph C. Haley.

F. James & Co. shortly after the deed of trust of June 18, 1823, was executed, assigned the debt thereby secured, 141 *and the security, to Philip, William and Joseph C. Haley, sons of Mereday, for a full and fair consideration. And on the 29th September 1823, the assignees had a sale made under the deed of trust; at which Philip Haley purchased three of the trust slaves, and sundry articles of furniture, at the price of 239 dollars; William Haley purchased four slaves, a horse and some furniture, for 337 dollars; and Joseph C. Haley purchased three slaves, for 105 dollars. These sales were so conducted as to prevent competition, and the prices shew that there was none.

After all these transactions, James Williams and Richard Williams, recovered judgments against Mereday Haley, for debts contracted before any of the deeds above mentioned had been executed; and sued out executions, which were unavailing. James's judgment was the eldest.

And then they exhibited their bill, in the superior court of chancery of Fredericksburg, against Mereday Haley, Philip, William and Joseph C. Haley, Martin and F. James & Co. charging that the deed of June 10, 1823, was altogether voluntary and fraudulent; that the deed of trust of June 18, 1823, though fair so far as it secured the debt to F. James & Co. was fraudulent so far as it secured the debt of 935 dollars to Joseph C. Haley, no such debt having been remove an obstruction interposed by a fraudulent conveyance in the way of his remedy at law against the legal estate of his debtor, a court of equity cannot enlarge his rights so as to reach property not liable at law; the most it has done in such cases, is to expedite his remedy by decreeing a sale of the moiety. McNew v. Smith, 5 Gratt. 88, citing principal case. See also, citing principal case, foot-note to McClung v. Belrne, 10 Leigh 394. To the same effect the principal case is cited in Buchanan v. Clark, 10 Gratt. 177.

In Cronie v. Hart, 18 Gratt. 745. It is said, in respect to the third and last inquiry suggested, it will be seen that the language of the Code is very clear. After declaring, that "the lien of a judgment may always be enforced in the court of equity," it does not authorize such court to decree a sale of real estate, or any part thereof, unless "it appear to such court that the rents and profits of the real estate, subject to the lien, will not satisfy the judgment in five years." This enactment was doubtless designed to clear up the difficulties arising under the decisions of Haleys v. Williams, 1 Leigh 140. Blow v. Maynard, 2 Leigh 29. Tennent v. Pattons, 6 Leigh 196. McClung v. Belrne, 10 Leigh 394, and McNew v. Smith, 5 Gratt. 84, cited by counsel for defendants in error; and to fix the grounds and extent of equitable jurisdiction in the enforcement of judgment liens. These cases left in doubt as to what was the precise limit of the discretion to be exercised in decreeing satisfaction of the rents and profits; so that it was peculiarly fit for the assembly to regulate the matter by positive enactment. This is done in language clear enough to comprehend all cases; nor does it seem that there is any ground to suppose from the report of the revisors as was ingeniously contended for, that the case of original equitable jurisdiction to set aside a fraudulent conveyance was not designed to be embraced by these terms. See monographic notes on "Judgments" appended to Smith v. Charlton, 7 Gratt. 423, and "Decrees" appended to Evans v. Spurgin, 11 Gratt. 615.

due; that the sales under the deed of trust of September 29, 1823, were fraudulent; and that though the sale of October 1, 1823, of 176 acres of land to Martin, was fair so far as he was concerned, the transfer of his bond for 1150 dollars of the purchase money, by M. Haley, the father, to Joseph C. Haley, the son, was fraudulent: And praying, that all the transactions, thus impeached as fraudulent might be set aside, and the property subjected to their judgments. The defendants filed their answers; and a volume of depositions in relation to the frauds charged in the bill, were taken and filed by both parties. The chancellor held that the charges of fraud were fully proved, and pronounced an interlocutory decree according with the prayer of the bill. The Haleys appealed to this court.

142 *The cause was argued by Stanard for the appellants, and Johnson for the appellees. The argument turned chiefly on the questions of fact touching the imputed frauds; but in the course of it, two points of law were suggested. 1. The chancellor's decree directed, that R. Williams, the junior judgment creditor, should participate equally with J. Williams, who had the elder judgment, in the distribution of the funds held liable to the judgments, whether those funds should be sufficient to satisfy both judgments or not; and the question was whether the elder judgment was not entitled to priority of satisfaction to its full amount? 2. Whether the whole of the real subject was bound by the judgments, or only three-fourths thereof, that is, a moiety by the elder, and a moiety of the other moiety by the junior?

GREEN, J. The transactions impeached in this case, are so palpably fraudulent, that it would be a waste of time to discuss the proofs in detail. The decree subjecting the property in question to the satisfaction of the plaintiffs' judgments, is, therefore, right in principle, but it is erroneous in its details in several particulars. (Here the judge pointed out several errors in the details of the decree, and indicated the proper corrections thereof: they involved no principle.)

The decree directs, that Richard Williams shall participate equally with James Williams, in the distribution of the funds held liable to their demands, whether they be sufficient to pay them in full or not; whereas the latter having obtained the first judgment and placed the first execution in the sheriff's hands, is entitled to priority, both in respect to the real and personal property, the judgment binding the former, and the execution delivered, the latter, in equity. It is a settled rule in respect to the satisfaction of judgments, and other liens upon an equitable fund, where neither has the legal title, that all are to be paid according to their priority in point of time, upon the maxim, in equali jure, qui prior est in tempore, potior est in jure.

143 Symmes v. *Symonds, 4 Bro. P. C. 328; (Tomlin's edi.); Brace v. The Dutchess of Marlborough, 2 P. Wms. 495. And in this case the fund is equitable, so far as the judgment creditors are concerned, the legal title being in the trustees for the security of the debt due to F. James & Co.

This leads us to a more particular examination of the questions, suggested in the argument, as to the extent to which the plaintiffs' judgments, and the proceedings under them, operated as an equitable lien upon the trust property. As to which, it was insisted, on the part of the appellants, that only three-fourths of the land was bound, a moiety by the first judgment and a moiety only of the remaining moiety by the second. This question might be very properly raised, if the subject upon which the judgments operated, was lands, of which the debtor was seised, and which might be extended at law. And, even in that case, I should strongly incline to the opinion, that two judgments at different times, would, under all circumstances, and no matter when elegits were taken upon them and executed, bind the whole of the debtor's land, each a full moiety. The words of the writ command, that a moiety of the lands of which the defendant was seised at the time of the judgment, or at any time after, shall be delivered to the plaintiff. If, therefore, an elegit upon the second be executed before one upon the first judgment, a moiety would be taken: for, the debtor in that case, would continue seised of the whole, and no injury would be done to the creditor who had the prior judgment, as a moiety would be left to satisfy his elegit; and as to the effect of two elegits under those circumstances, there does not appear ever to have been any doubt. So, if an elegit were executed on the prior judgment, and afterwards an elegit taken upon the latter, it seems to me that the remaining moiety might be taken; for, notwithstanding the extent under the first elegit, the debtor continues seised of the land extended, since the tenant by elegit has no freehold, but only a chattel interest which goes to his executor, and is extend-

144 ible only as a chattel. 2 Inst. 396; 10 Vin. Abr. 543; Execution, M. pl. 1, and the notes there; 11 Id. 173, 5, Executors; 2. 2, pl. 6, 23, 30, 34. Accordingly, it was held, that the whole of the land might be taken by two successive elegits, under these circumstances; 10 Ed. 2; Execution, cited at the end of the case of Huit v. Cogan, Cro. Eliz. 483. In this last case, however, the court held, that the second elegit should only take a moiety of the remaining moiety, but advised the sheriff to return the special matter: the point, therefore, does not appear to have been adjudged. Again, in the case of The Attorney General v. Andrew, Hardr. 23-27, in which it was held, that upon two contemporary judgments, the whole might be taken, a moiety under each, it was said in argument, that upon a second elegit only a moiety of the remaining moiety could be taken; for which was cited Huit v. Cogan, before notice, and Burnham v. Bayne, 2 Brownl. 96, in which that point was agreed by all the judges. And in Pullen v. Burbeck, 12 Mod. 357, Holt, C. J., said, that although, in such a case, only a moiety of the remaining moiety ought to be taken, yet if the whole of the remaining moiety be in fact taken, this is well, and no audita querela would lie. Although, then, there is no adjudged case, contradicting that of the 10 Ed. 2, yet these repeated and imposing dicta would induce me to pause, if it were necessary to decide that point in this cause, though upon the whole, I should probably follow the ancient decision, as conforming to the literal effect of the writ, and the true spirit of the law.

It is, however, unnecessary to decide that point here, since if the lien of a judgment upon an equitable subject, was in all respects analogous to its lien upon lands of which the debtor had a legal seisin, upon the principle that equity follows the law; yet no elegit being in fact executed or capable of being executed, a court of equity upon the familiar principle of marshaling securities, according to which, when several have liens upon the same subject, they will be so arranged in equity, that he who has the prior security, shall use it in such a way as not to affect the interest of 145 the *others, if that can be done without injury to himself, would postpone the effect of James Williams's elder to that of Richard Williams's junior judgment, so as to make the case analogous to that at law, where an elegit upon a posterior judgment is executed before one is taken out on a prior judgment, in which case each would take a full moiety. (See the cases referred to in 1 Mad. Chan. 202, upon the subject of marshaling securities.) The rights, however, of judgment creditors, in respect to an equitable fund, are not analogous of their rights at law, but stand, particularly in respect to property in mortgage, upon an intirely different foundation. A judgment creditor acquires an equitable lien upon the equity of redemption in the debtor's property subject to mortgage. And a court of equity, upon the principle that equity follows the law, would, if it were practicable, only give the same effect to the equitable lien, as would be given to it at law, if the subject of the lien was a legal title; that is, would only subject a moiety. But that is impracticable; since the only means by which a court of equity can enable the creditor to reach the equity of redemption, is to allow him to redeem; which cannot be done, with a proper regard to the rights of the mortgagee, without requiring him to redeem in toto, and not for a moiety only. The consequence of which is, that, acquiring by that means the legal title to the whole, the creditor cannot be redeemed by the debtor, without paying not only the whole of the mortgage debt, but also the whole of the judgment, upon another principle of equity, that he that asks equity must do it. An example of this is to be found in the case of Stileman v. Ashdown, as reported in Ambler, p. 13. See also Bacon v. Ashby, Finch. Rep. 366; Morret v. Westerne, 2 Vern. 663. To the purposes of this case, the deed of trust has the same effect as a mortgage.

In strictness, R. Williams's judgment, upon which no execution had been put into the sheriff's hands, at the time of the filing of the bill, was no lien in equity, upon that portion of the trust property which was personal, nor could he rightfully 146 *resort to a court of equity as to that subject. Shirley v. Watts, 3 Atk.

200. Yet he was right in court, as to the lien of his judgment on the equity of redemption in the land, as was James Williams, in respect both to the real and personal subject. And R. Williams having placed an execution in the hands of the sheriff, pending the suit, which has been returned nulla bona, he might reach the personal fund, by filing a supplemental bill, if that were necessary. But it is not: he, like any other creditor who had acquired a lien upon the personal property in question, by judgment and execution delivered to the sheriff, may exhibit his claim before a commissioner without a bill, and have satisfaction out of the fund, according to his rights in respect to priority. Burroughs v. Elton, 11 Ves. 29.

The result is, that the defendants Joseph, Philip and William Haley are entitled, first, to satisfaction out of the trust fund, for the balance of the debt due originally to F. James & Co. secured by the deed of trust, and transferred to them, after deducting whatever they may be found to have received, from the hires of the slaves and the rents and profits of the mill and lands, or for the disposition of any of the slaves, and the value of the personal property which they acquired under colour of the sale of September 29, 1823; and James Williams next, and then Richards Williams, are entitled to satisfaction of their judgments, or of so much of Richard Williams's as may be due, out of the residue. And any surplus should be paid over to such of the defendants, as may shew that he or they are best entitled to it.

CARR, J. With respect to the remarks of my brother Green, on the subject of the elegit, viz. that if the elegit of A. be levied on the half of B.'s land to-day, and to-morrow C. get a judgment against B., C. by his elegit can take the other half of the debtor's land; I do not mean to say that I am against it: my impression has been otherwise; but I have not examined the subject, nor does it arise in this case. I mean merely to say, that I have no opinion with respect to it.

147 CABELL, J.* I wish it to be understood, that I give no opinion on the question, how far two elegits may, under all circumstances, be made to reach the whole land of the debtor. That question is not necessary to be decided in this case.

The whole court concurred in a decree approving the principles of the chancellor's decree, but correcting several of its details, and conforming with the results stated in the opinion of judge Green.

Clarkson's Adm'r v. Garland and Another.

(Absent BROOKE, P., and COALTER, J.)

Usury—Case at Bar.—C wanting to raise $2335, tells J. this, and offers him as many slaves as will command that sum: upon which, J. pays him $2335, in gross, for 16 slaves, and C. gives him a bill of sale thereof; and it is, at the same time, agreed, that the slaves shall remain in C.'s possession, on hire, for one year; and if at end of the year, C. shall pay J. $2335, J. shall, in consideration thereof, re-sell the slaves to him; if any of the slaves die during year, C. to pay same price and no less, for survivors; and if C. shall not pay the $2335 punctually, J's agreement to re-sell them to him to be void. HELD, a shift to evade statute of usury, and contract usurious.

Same—When Equity Will Not Disturb Sale under Usurious Deed of Trust.—C. contracting usurious debt to G. gives him a deed of trust of slaves, to secure it: afterwards, C. voluntarily surrenders trust slaves to trustee, to be sold to satisfy the debt: at trustee's sale, in itself fair, G. buys greater part of trust slaves, and the proceeds of sales are applied to the debt. HELD, though deed of trust usurious, yet trustee's sales of the subject to G. the usurious creditor, shall not be disturbed in equity.

Same—Equitable Relief—Usury.—Though where one resorts to equity for relief against usurious debt yet unpaid, he shall be required to pay only the principal advanced to him without even lawful interest, according to the statute of Virginia; yet where debtor seeks, in equity, an account of and decree for money already paid on usurious contract, the measure of relief is, the excess paid above principal and lawful interest: and if his payments exceed principal and lawful interest, the surplus with interest shall be decreed to him.

Clarkson exhibited his bill against Garland and Jacobs, in the superiour court of chancery of Lynchburg, setting 148 *forth, that on the 23d March 1815, he in fact borrowed of Jacobs the sum of 2335 dollars, at exorbitant usury, though this usurious loan was covered by the device of a sale of 16 slaves by Clarkson to Jacobs, redeemable by Clarkson, on payment of 2935 dollars, on or before the 23d March 1816; and on the 22d May 1815, he in fact borrowed of Jacobs another sum of 2666 dollars 26 cents, likewise on usury, though this loan was also covered, in like manner, by the device of a sale of 14 slaves by Clarkson to Jacobs, redeemable by Clarkson, on payment of 3394 dollars, on or before the 23d March 1816. That, the slaves not being redeemed by Clarkson, Garland, with full knowledge of the usury, by an arrangement with Jacobs, became jointly and equally interested with him in the contracts; and, in August 1816, they procured Clarkson's bond for 7000 dollars, being the aggregate of the two usurious debts contracted to Jacobs, with the addition of further usury for forbearance. That, at the same time, Clarkson was indebted to Garland on other accounts, and Garland exacted usury for forbearance of these debts also; for which, and the usurious premium for forbearance thereof, amounting together to 2465 dollars 56 cents, Clarkson gave Garland another bond. And then, Clarkson, by a deed of trust, mortgaged 28 slaves, to secure payment, in March following, the debts due by both the bonds, with interest from the dates thereof. That, after these bonds and the deed of trust were executed, Clarkson delivered Garland his crop of 21383 pounds of tobacco, for which he was entitled to credit at the rate of 20 dollars per cwt. being the price stipulated by the previous contract; but Garland gave him credit for it, only at the rate of 11 dollars and some cents per cwt. That a large balance of the debts remaining unpaid, Garland, on the 6th August 1817, made a new contract with Clarkson, for farther forbearance thereof, on a new usurious premium, and for the forbearance, on usurious premium also, of other debts claimed by Garland of Clarkson; and then took Clarkson's bond for 11250 dollars

149 *payable (with interest from the date) in June 1818: and Clarkson, to secure payment of the debt due by this bond, by a new deed of trust, mortgaged fifty-one slaves. Of what items this large debt of 11250 dollars was composed, Clarkson said he did not exactly know, and he called on Garland to explain; it consisted in part of the old balance of the former usurious debts, of new usurious premiums for forbearance thereof, of other debts claimed, and usurious premiums for forbearance of them too; a very large proportion of the whole sum was usury. That Clarkson paid Garland 15 hogsheads of tobacco, which Garland was to give him credit for, at the then fair market price, which was from 8 to 11 dollars per cwt. That in November 1818, Garland caused a sale to be made, of the slaves mortgaged by the deed of trust of August 1817, for the payment of the debt of 11250 dollars thereby secured: at which sale, two of the slaves were purchased by Garland, and twelve by third persons, for the aggregate sum of 7270 dollars: ten others were bought in, nominally by Garland, but really for Clarkson, at the price of 3856 dollars; Garland having agreed to let him retain them, at the prices at which he should buy them; but Garland afterwards refused to let him have them, without a premium of 600 dollars on the cost, to which extortion Clarkson was, in his necessities, forced to submit. That, after this sale, farther forbearance, for new usurious premiums, was given: and a new bond, dated in November 1818, was exacted of Clarkson, for 7483 dollars 70 cents, payable in November 1819, (embracing the accumulated usury of the former transactions, with new usury, the 3856 dollars, the price of the ten slaves, and the 600 dollars advance thereon) and a new deed of trust was executed by Clarkson, mortgaging 25 slaves to secure this debt. After this, Clarkson paid Garland 8 hogsheads of tobacco, the price whereof, 588 dollars 60 cents, Garland credited on the judgment he afterwards obtained on the last mentioned bond. That in November

1819, Garland caused a sale to be made 150 of the slaves mortgaged *by the last deed of trust, and purchased the greater part of them himself, at a great sacrifice; which he effected by refusing to let his own creditors bid at the sales, to the amount of the debts he owed them. The proceeds of these sales were 6020 dollars 50 cents, which sum was also credited on the judgment Garland afterwards obtained on the bond of November 1818. This judgment, recovered against Clarkson in August 1821, was for 7483 dollars 70 cents, the debt mentioned in the bond, with interest thereon from November 14th 1818, subject to credits for the said sums of 588 dollars 60 cents, paid October 1st 1819, and 6020 dollars 50 cents paid November 25th 1819. Clarkson acknowledged in the bill, that he had had, during the course of these transactions, various dealings with Garland, for merchandize bought of him; and that he could not state, exactly, how the debts he had contracted in those dealings, had been brought into the bonds and deeds of trust before mentioned. But he charged, that all the contracts, bonds and deeds of trust, specified in his bill, were tainted with most exorbitant usury, and void; and therefore, that the sales made under the deeds of trust were void also, and as to all the purchases made by Garland himself, at those sales, especially the last, the sales ought to be held naught, and Garland compelled to restore the slaves to him, and render an account of the profits thereof. And he prayed that Garland and Jacobs might answer the allegations of the bill on oath; that Garland might exhibit detailed accounts of the transactions, and his books in which those accounts were kept; that an account of all the transactions between him and Jacobs, between him and Garland and Jacobs, and between him and Garland, might be taken, in which no interest whatsoever might be allowed to them, but only the principal sums due them; that they, respectively, might be decreed to refund the excess, if any, paid by him above the principal; that Garland might be compelled to restore the slaves he had bought at the sales, and render an account of, and pay him, the profits thereof; and that Garland 151 should *be enjoined from further proceedings on his judgment on the bond of November 1818; and general relief.

The injunction was awarded.

Jacobs, in his answer, went into the details of the two transactions of March and May 1815; and stated, that those contracts were bona fide sales by Clarkson to him, the first of the 16 slaves for 2335 dollars, and the last of 14 slaves for 2666 dollars 66 cents, and conditional re-sales of the same slaves by him to Clarkson, for 2935 dollars, and 3394 dollars, payable in March 1816, provided those prices should be then punctually paid: he denied, that the sales were devices to cover usurious loans, or that there was any treaty for a loan, or any borrowing or lending, actual or intended by either party: but he owned, that Clarkson told him he wanted certain sums of money, and offered as many slaves as would command those sums. He denied the usury charged to have been practised by him and Garland in 1816: but his account of the transaction was not very distinct: he said, that in March 1816, he agreed with Garland to take a moiety of the benefit and burthen of a contract which he had made with Clarkson, in February preceding, whereby Clarkson was to sell his crop of tobacco to Garland, for 11 dollars 15 cents per cwt. and Garland to lend Clarkson 7000 dollars on simple interest; and the product of the tobacco was to be applied to the payment of sundry debts of Clarkson due to different persons, and the debt due to Jacobs among the rest: that the 7000 dollars secured by the bond of August 1816, was made up of the debt due Jacobs on the transactions of March and May 1815, with simple interest thereon, and of some claims of Garland against Clarkson: that he contributed a moiety of the 7000 dollars; and Garland, in 1817, accounted to him for the same with interest thereon; and, thenceforth, he ceased to have any concern in or knowledge of the transactions.

Garland, in his answer, denied all the allegations of the bill generally, and each allegation in particular, which imputed to him, usury, extortion or oppression, 152 or knowledge *of or participation in the usury and extortion imputed to Jacobs. He stated, that Clarkson in February 1816 sold him his crop of tobacco at the price of 11 dollars 15 cents per cwt. stipulated by contract in writing (which he exhibited), and he agreed to advance for Clarkson 7000 dollars more, to be applied to the payment of certain specified debts of Clarkson, of which the debt to Jacobs was one: in these contracts Jacobs had no concern. That the debt due to Jacobs, amounting to 6329 dollars, was paid off in March 1816. That, in August 1816, Jacobs took an interest in the debt of 7000 dollars, and in the tobacco contract: and Clarkson gave Garland his bond for the 7000 dollars, and another bond for 2465 dollars 56 cents, for moneys due Garland on other accounts; and a deed of trust mortgaging slaves to secure payment of both debts. That no usurious premium was included in either, nor was any contracted for. That in 1817, Garland, at Clarkson's request, paid Jacobs the portion of the debt of 7000 dollars due to him. That, in August 1817, Clarkson gave Garland a new bond for 11250 dollars, payable in June 1818, and a new deed of trust of slaves, to secure the debt: and these securities were given for the then amount of debt justly due to Garland, on good and valuable consideration, without any usurious premium for the loan or forbearance of money: but the answer did not state or explain how, or of what particular items, this large debt was made up. That all the payments made him by Clarkson were fairly credited. That at the sale of the trust subject in November 1818, which was a cash sale, he purchased ten of the slaves, without any previous arrangement with Clarkson on the subject, and afterwards sold them to him, at his earnest request, on a credit, at an advance of 600 dollars: and then he took Clarkson's bond for 7483 dollars 70 cents (the just balance of debt then due him, without any usury whatever) and the deed of trust of 25 slaves to secure the same. That this trust subject was sold in November 1819, and fairly sold, without any 153 contrivance of Garland to reduce the price, and fairly purchased *by him: the proceeds of this sale, as well as the price of 8 hogsheads of tobacco delivered by Clarkson in October 1819, were credited on the bond, and reduced the balance to 1331 dollars 32 cents, bearing interest from November 25th 1819, for which Garland had obtained judgment, and which was justly due to him.

There was much documentary evidence exhibited, and many depositions filed, bearing on the questions of fact put in issue.

1st. The written contracts between Clarkson and Jacobs, of March and May 1815, (considered in connexion with Jacobs's answer,) were relied on to prove the usury imputed to those transactions. The first was a bill of sale executed by Clarkson and John Barnett to Jacobs, under date March 23d 1815, whereby they conveyed to him 16 slaves by name, in consideration of 2335 dollars; with two memorandums indorsed thereon; one, stating that the slaves were delivered to Jacobs; the other, stating that Clarkson and Garnett had the same 16 slaves, the property of Jacobs, then in their possession, on hire till March 23d 1816; and they being desirous of purchasing the slaves of Jacobs, he agreed, that if they should pay him 2935 dollars on or before March 23d 1816, he would and did thereby, in consideration thereof, sell the slaves to them, but if either of the slaves should die, Jacobs was to receive the same sum, and no less, for the survivors, and if the 2935 dollars should not be paid by the 23d March 1816, this agreement was to be utterly null and void. The other contract was a bill of sale executed by Clarkson to Jacobs, under date May 22d 1815, whereby Clarkson conveyed to Jacobs 14 slaves, in consideration of 2666 dollars 66 cents; with two memorandums indorsed thereon, exactly like those indorsed on the first contract, save only that the sum which was to be paid by Clarkson for these slaves, on the 23d March 1816, was 3394 dollars 17 cents. And for proof of Garland's knowledge of the true character of these contracts, 154 before he *mixed his own with them, many circumstances, disclosed by the evidence, were relied on.

2dly. The contract between Clarkson and Garland, for the sale of Clarkson's crop of tobacco to Garland, was exhibited. It was dated February 6th 1816; and it bore, that Clarkson sold Garland his crop of tobacco, supposed about 20000 pounds, deliverable the 1st May following, for which Garland was to allow him 11 dollars 15 cents per cwt. and to advance him besides 7000 dollars, to be applied to the payment of sundry specified debts, and among them 6495 dollars 83 cents to Jacobs. There were depositions taken on Clarkson's part, for the purpose of proving, that the fair market price of the tobacco, at the time, was 20 dollars per cwt.; that in the original contract made in February 1816, the price stipulated for the tobacco, was 20 dollars; that that was a verbal contract, and that the written contract exhibited, by which the price was reduced to 11 dollars 15 cents, was in fact signed some time after the contract was made. On Garland's part, depositions were filed, for the purpose of proving, that the agreed and the fair price of the tobacco, was truly stated in the written contract to be 11 dollars 15 cents.

3dly. As to the 600 dollars also, demanded by Garland and agreed to be paid by Clarkson, as an advance upon the price of the 10 slaves purchased by Garland at the sale of November 1818, and then sold by him to Clarkson, there was evidence on both sides; evidence on Garland's part, that he bought the slaves at the sale on his own account, and after his purchase sold them to Clarkson on a credit; evidence on Clarkson's part, adduced to sustain his charge of extortion and oppression in this particular.

tween him and Clarkson, wherein there was a debit to Clarkson, under date May 1st 1817, in these words: "To this sum, which you agreed to allow for trouble in attending to your business in settling your accounts with different persons, and for interest on various sums *of small amount, on which no interest has been charged, and for interest on about 1500 dollars advanced for you in 1816, and not contemplated in the loan of 7000 dollars—$482 74."

5thly. From the accounts exhibited by Garland, it could not be ascertained, how the large debt of 11250 dollars, secured by the bond and deed of trust of August 1817, was made up.

6thly. There was no evidence to sustain the imputation against Garland, of unfair conduct and contrivance, at the sale of November 1819, to enable him to purchase the slaves he then bought, at under prices; and he adduced evidence to shew, that Clarkson himself voluntarily produced the slaves to be sold by the trustee, was present at both sales, and made no objection or complaint; and that Garland's conduct was fair, and the prices he gave, the reasonable value of the property.

Clarkson died pending the suit, and it was revived in the named of Rives his administrator.

On the motion of the plaintiff, the chancellor awarded an injunction (November 5th 1824) to restrain Garland from removing out of the state, the slaves held by him under his purchases at the sales of the trust subject.

The cause coming on for hearing in October 1825, the chancellor decreed, 1. That, as to Jacobs's purchases and Clarkson's repurchases of slaves, in March and May 1815, they were shifts to avoid the statute of usury, and the transactions consequently usurious; that, so far as Jacobs was individually concerned, Clarkson was to account for the prices Jacobs paid him for the slaves, and legal interest thereon, instead of the prices he contracted to pay Jacobs for the redemption of them; and that an account of these transactions should be stated by a commissioner on this principle. 2. That, as to the joint transactions of Garland and Jacobs with Clarkson, the commissioner should state accounts of them, and if there was usury in them, should strike it off, and charge Clarkson with legal interest 156 only. *3. That as to the transactions between Clarkson and Garland, the commissioner should examine and state all the accounts between them, strike off the usury if any should appear, and charge legal interest. 4. That there was no objection to Garland's purchases at the sales of the trust subject. 5. That there was no necessity for the injunction awarded the 5th November 1824, and that it should be discharged, as having been improvidently awarded. And the court declared, that without giving any other opinion as to what might or might not be usurious in any of the transactions, or any opinion on the tobacco contract, it would expect of the commissioner, such a state of all the accounts, as he should consider just and proper, or as either party should require.

Clarkson's administrator appealed to this court.

The case was argued here, by Johnson, for the appellant, and Stanard, for the appellees. There were several points of law discussed. But much of the argument turned on questions of fact, and consisted of careful examination of the particular proofs in the cause bearing on them; the counsel for the appellant maintaining, and the counsel for the appellees controverting, the following propositions: That, supposing the two contracts of March and May 1815, between Clarkson and Jacobs, usurious, Garland was acquainted with their true character, and, with this knowledge, took a joint interest in them, mixed them with his own transactions, and exacted more usurious premium for forbearance of the debt: That those contracts were, mainly, the basis of all the subsequent transactions, which, therefore, on this account alone, were tainted with usury: That new and aggravated extortion was practised at every subsequent step in the progress of Garland's dealings with Clarkson: That the price at which Clarkson sold Garland his crop of 21283 pounds of tobacco, in February 1816, was fixed by the original contract at 20 dollars per cwt. and the reduction of the price to 11 dollars 15 cents, was an after-157 operation, *and was in truth an usurious extortion: That the 6000 dollars advance on the price at which Garland bought the ten slaves at the sale of the trust subject in November 1818, exacted by him of Clarkson, on his re-sale of that property to him, was usurious: That the 482 dollars 74 cents, debited to Clarkson, in the accounts exhibited by Garland, for his trouble &c. and for interest &c. was usury: And that it was impossible to ascertain, from those accounts exhibited by Garland, how the large debt of 11250 dollars, secured by the bond and deed of trust of August 1817, accrued; on the contrary, the accounts shewed, that by no means so large an amount was or could be justly due; and Garland ought not to be allowed to charge the amount of that bond to Clarkson, without shewing the consideration of it.

As to the points of law: I. Johnson maintained, that the two contracts of March and May 1815, between Clarkson and Jacobs, were usurious. Jacobs acknowledged in his answer, that Clarkson told him he had to raise the two sums of money, which Jacobs gave him for the property, and offered as many slaves as would command those sums; that is, in substance, that he knew Clarkson's object was to borrow money upon the security of this property. It was his own real purpose to lend it upon that security. The contracts were upon the face of them, usurious: they were, in substance, mortgages of property for 2335 dollars advanced the 23d March, and 2666 dollars advanced the 22d May 1815, redeemable by the payment of 2935 and 3394 dollars, on the 23d March 1816. And if these contracts were not strictly mortgages, the form given to them was, palpably, a mere shift to evade the statute of usury.

Stanard remarked, that the contracts gave Clarkson a right to deliver the slaves, however they might depreciate in value, or, if half or two-thirds of them had died, to deliver the residue, to Jacobs, on the 23d March 1816, and thereby to discharge himself from the payment of any money; while it gave Jacobs no right to refuse to receive the slaves, or such as should be living 158 at the appointed time, *and to demand money. The contracts were, surely, not mortgages. Jacobs took the hazard of the loss of the slaves by death, or by depreciation in the market, in the interval. He said, that wherever the person receiving money is not bound to return money, wherever the person advancing money is not entitled to demand money, whatever may be the character of the transaction, it is not usurious; since, in such case, there is no borrowing or lending or forbearance of money: and, wherever the bargain is one of hazard, where risk is one of its essential properties, the contract differs in its nature from a loan; and, though it may be hard, it is not usurious. Ord on Usury, 24, 39; Beddingfield v. Ashley, Cro. Eliz. 471; Chesterfield v. Janssen, 2 Ves. 125; 1 Atk. 301; 1 Wils. 286.

Johnson replied, that the argument for the appellees assumed, that the contracts were in substance and reality exactly what in form they seemed. But they were in truth loans of money, veiled under the form of sales and re-sales of property; and too thinly veiled to hide the true features of the case. The option, which the contracts gave Clarkson, was to pay the money, or to return slaves worth, in the estimation of both parties, doubtless, more than the money; and entitled Jacobs, if he did not get the money he advanced, with about 25 per cent. per ann. upon it, to property of greater value. The hazard was merely colourable; or rather no hazard at all; since, in all probability, the slaves would increase in numbers, and therefore in value. That the property was liable to depreciation, by casualties of any kind, entered not into the thoughts of either party. The provision that if any of the slaves should die, Clarkson should pay the same price for the survivors, shewed the true character of these contracts. Hazard, slight and colourable, had been often infused into contracts really usurious, to evade the law; it was an old and well-known shift; and was of itself, in general, conclusive proof of usury. Ord, 69, 70, and the cases there cited.

159 *II. Johnson contended, that, as the deeds of trust were tainted with usury and vicious, the sales made under them partook of the same vice, and ought to be avoided, so far as Garland was a purchaser and holder of the subject; and that he ought to be compelled to restore the property, and account for the profits of it, and Clarkson held accountable for the debt to the discharge of which it had been applied.

Stanard answered, that it was in proof, that Clarkson had himself produced the trust property to the trustee to be sold, without compulsion on Garland's part, and without any complaint on his own; and that the sales were fair in themselves. They were, then, nothing more than a willing application, by Clarkson, of that fund to the payment of the debt; and such payments could not be distinguished, in principle, from any other payments out of any other funds.

III. A question arose, upon the supposition that the usury was established, what ought to be the measure of relief?

Johnson observed, that in England, when a party asked relief in equity against an usurious debt yet unpaid, he was relieved only from the usurious excess above the principal and legal interest; and, upon the same principle, when he sought to recover back money paid upon an usurious contract, he recovered only the usurious excess. But in Virginia, a party entitled to relief in equity against an usurious debt not paid, was held to the payment of the principal only, and was exonerated even from the legal interest. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 102, § 3; Young v. Scott, 4 Rand. 415. And, by analogy, the measure of relief in equity, or of damages at law, to a party entitled to recover back money paid upon an usurious contract, ought to be the excess paid beyond the principal sum advanced to him. The case of Stone v. Ware, 6 Munf. 541, might seem contrary to this proposition; but this point was not considered there; and besides, that case was decided before the construction of the third section of our statute was settled by the decision in Young v. Scott. The payments made by Clarkson, ought to be applied to the principal of the debts he contracted to *Jacobs, Garland and Jacobs, and Garland; and the excess of his payments above the principal of his debts, ought to be refunded to him, with legal interest from the time when the principal was extinguished, and afterwards from the dates of the payments.

Stanard said this proposition could not be sustained. The principle of the provision contained in the third section of our statute, was very peculiar: it imposed on the usurer the forfeiture of legal interest on his money, as a penalty for violating the law in contracting for more; and it made the court of chancery the instrument to inflict the penalty, whose province it was, in general, to relieve against penalties and forfeitures, as well as extortion and oppression. But this section of the statute provided for a particular case; the case of a party resorting to equity for discovery of, and relief against, usury not yet paid. And he said, there was no reason for extending so harsh a principle beyond the case to which the statute applied it. A party seeking to recover back money actually paid by him on an usurious contract, could only ask what the party who received it may not ex æquo et bono retain. He may conscientiously retain legal interest on his money as well as the principal. The usurious excess above the principal and legal interest, is all that he may not conscientiously retain, and therefore all that he can be justly required to refund. This rule, long settled, and upon well known principles of justice, the legislature might have altered, but forbore to do so: and the court could not be justified in altering it, by analogy to a statutory provision made for another case. CARR, J., delivered the resolutions of the court:

1. That the contracts between Clarkson and Jacobs of the 23d March and 22d May 1815; the tobacco contract of the 6th February 1816; the charge by Garland against Clarkson, of 482 dollars 74 cents, for trouble &c. and interest &c. and the re-sale by Garland to Clarkson of the ten slaves at an advance of 600 dollars on the price they cost him; were all usurious transactions.

161 *2. That Garland shall not be allowed to charge Clarkson with the bond of the 6th August 1817, for 11250 dollars, unless he shall shew the consideration thereof.

3. That in taking the accounts, all usurious gain should be expunged, or accounted for by the party receiving it: if Clarkson's payments shall be found to exceed the principal and interest of the claims unaffected by usury, together with the principal of the usurious debts, then legal interest should be allowed on the sums infected with usury, to the extent only of extinguishing such excess of payment; but if there shall still remain a balance of such excess, then that balance with interest thereon shall be paid to Clarkson by the party who received it.

4. The majority of the court was of opinion, that the sales made under the deeds of trust, are not to be disturbed.*

The consequences of these principles are:

That Clarkson should be charged to Jacobs, with 2335 dollars, as of the 23d March 1815, with interest thereon from that date, and with 2666 dollars 66 cents as of the 22d May 1815, with interest thereon from that date; and credited by 6329 dollars 17 cents, as of the 23d March 1816, that being the sum with interest for which Garland finally accounted to Jacobs: and Jacobs should be decreed to pay the balance with interest from the last date.

That, in stating the account between Garland and Clarkson, Garland should be allowed to debit Clarkson with 6329 dollars 17 cents as of the 23d March 1816, with interest from that date: but he should not be allowed the 482 dollars 74 cents: nor should he be allowed the advance of 600 dollars on the re-sale of the ten slaves: nor should he be allowed to charge the bond of 11250 dollars of the 6th August 1817, unless he should shew the consideration thereof; and if that bond 162 should appear to be usurious, he *should only be allowed to charge the true principal sum, with interest, upon the principles before stated.

And that Garland and Jacobs, jointly, should be charged with the difference between the 11 dollars 15 cents per cwt. and the true value of the tobacco, with interest from the delivery thereof; such value to be fixed by ascertaining the current market price of such tobacco, on or about the 6th February 1816, taking into consideration its quality, and the time allowed for the delivery thereof.

Decree reversed, and cause remanded to be proceeded in according to the principles here declared.

(Absent BROOKE, P.†)

Bequest of Slaves in Trust for Maintenance of Testator's Daughter and Her Husband during Their Lives—Remainder to Children—Case at Bar.—E. C. bequeathed

*The court did not assign the reason on which it founded this resolution. It was that (it is presumed) which was suggested in Mr. Stanard's argument of the point.—Note in Original Edition. †He did not sit, because he was related to the appellees.

4 slaves to C. C. and F. T. trustees, in trust to apply the profits to maintenance of testator's daughter, J. B. and her husband, S. K. B. and their children, during lives of daughter and husband, and of survivor, remainder to the children of the daughter by that husband; both trustees declined the trust; no trustee was substituted; the ex'or delivered the slaves to Mrs. B. her husband being then in Europe, where he died; B. then married V. who, in 1798, sold R. all the trust slaves, for his wife's life, R. having notice of the trust; R. removed them from Fredericksburg to Augusta, held some there, gave away some, sold others: the second husband, V. died in 1806. Upon bill in chancery, by Mrs. V. and her children, by B. against R. praying discovery of names &c. of the slaves and their increase, restoration of them and account of profits, and (on a charge that R. would remove the property out of the state) an injunction to restrain him from doing so; and R. not pleading to the jurisdiction: Decreed.

Same—Right of Second Husband to Slaves.—1st. R. had no right to hold the slaves, even during Mrs. V.'s life, as they were a trust subject, and the profits applicable to maintenance of her and her children; though quære how far her interest passed by her second husband's sale to R.

Same—Discovery—Jurisdiction of Court of Equity.—2ndly. The court of chancery had jurisdiction of the case; because the charges in the bill of the necessity of a discovery, and of the design to remove the slaves out of reach, saved the bill from being demurrable, and if that charge were only colourable, R. should have pleaded to the jurisdiction; and (chiefly) because the slaves were a trust subject, represented by no trustee who could sue at law, and which equity alone could apply to the purposes of the trust.

Same—Statute of Limitations;—Application Where Party Buys with Notice of Trust.—3rdly. R. could not protect himself under statute of limitations; because he bought with notice of the trust, and so was charged with it; and because his removal of the slaves to a distant county, thus keeping owners in ignorance where they were, was an obstruction to the assertion of their rights by action, precluding him from pleading the statute, within § 14, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, p. 491.

Edward Carter, by his last will and testament, proved and recorded in June 1792, made the following bequest: "I give and bequeath to my son Charles Carter and Mr. Francis Thornton, four slaves, one male and three females, not under the age of ten nor over the age of thirty years, in trust for the purpose of applying the profits of the 164 said slaves *to the maintenance of my daughter Jane Bradford and her husband Major Samuel K. Bradford and their children, during the lives of my said daughter and Major Bradford, and the longest liver of them, and after their deaths to be equally divided among the children of my said daughter Jane by the said Bradford." Charles Carter, the executor of the will, and one of the trustees, in 1793, had the four slaves selected from his testator's estate; and, he and Thornton both declining to act as trustees, he delivered them to Mrs. Bradford, her husband being then in Europe, whence he never returned. He died there. The trust slaves remained in Mrs. Bradford's possession during her widowhood, which continued four or five years: she married John Verminet, and thus the property passed into his possession. Verminet, in November 1798, sold to Richard Rankin, for £190. all the trust slaves (then six in number) for the life of his wife; and she joined him in the bill of sale. After this, Verminet went to New Orleans, and there died about 1805 or 6. Rankin gave some of the slaves to his sons-in-law, J. A. Frayser and W. G. Dudley; and he and they sold the absolute property of some of them to Thomas Deverick and Thomas Johnson.

In 1819, Mrs. Verminet and her children by Bradford, brought this suit in the superior court of chancery of Staunton, against Rankin, Frayser, Dudley, Deverick and Johnson. They set forth in their bill the facts as above stated, with this difference, that the bill alleges that the trust slaves were delivered by the executor of Mr. Carter, to Major Bradford, whereas they were in truth delivered to Mrs. Bradford: and they stated, that at the time of Verminet's sale to Rankin, Mrs. Verminet was under the disability of coverture, and her children under that of infancy, and so remained for many years afterwards; that Rankin was apprised of the trust and every other circumstance affecting the property; that he removed the slaves from the neighbourhood of Fredericksburg to the county of Augusta, and thus concealed the locality of the subject from the real 165 owners *of it; that Deverick and Johnson also purchased of Rankin, the slaves held by them, with notice of the true state of the title, and that Rankin's sons-in-law were mere volunteers. They prayed a discovery of the names, ages and residence of the slaves; and, suggesting that Rankin and his sons-in-law would probably remove the property out of reach, they asked an order to restrain them from doing so. And they demanded the slaves and their increase, and an account of profits.

Rankin, in his answer, admitted that he had bought the slaves of Verminet, for the life of his wife; and he exhibited the bill of sale. He admitted also, that at the time of his purchase, he had notice that the slaves were held in right of the wife; but in what manner she acquired the right, he said, he had no information. He admitted, that he had removed the slaves to Augusta, but denied that he had taken any pains to conceal them.

Deverick and Johnson, in their answers, stated, that they purchased of Rankin the absolute property of the slaves held by them, without notice of any trust affecting them, or other defect in the title, and paid him full prices: and they relied on the statute of limitations.

As to Frayser and Dudley, the bill was taken for confessed.

The answers of Deverick and Johnson were fully supported by the proofs. The proofs also identified the slaves, and established all the material facts of the case, as above stated.

The chancellor dismissed the bill as to Deverick and Johnson; but, being of opinion, that Rankin was not entitled to hold the possession of the trust slaves or any of them, and reserving the question how far Verminet could convey a good right to such portion of the profits of the subject as were by Mr.

Equity Practice.—The principal case is cited in Sheppards v. Turpin, 3 Gratt. 395; Handly v. Snodgrass, 9 Leigh 493; Armstrong v. Pitts, 13 Gratt. 243.

Statute of Limitations—Trust Subjects—Purchase with Notice.—In Lamar v. Hale, 79 Va. 164, it is said: "The trust follows the property into the hands of a purchaser with notice of the trust, and on statutory bar of limitation applies thereto. Rankin v. Bradford, 1 Leigh 171; Hunter v. Spotswood, 1 Wash. 145; Redwood v. Riddick, 4 Munf. 228; Turner v. Campbell, 3 Gratt. 77; Rowe v. Bentley, 20 Gratt. 762; 2 Perry on Trusts, §§ 859, 864, 865; Hill on Trustees, 264, note 3; Angel on Limitations, §§ 183, 189; 2 Pomeroy's Eq., § 1052." See monographic note on "Limitation of Actions" appended to Herrington v. Harkins, 1 Rob. 591.

Carter's will properly applicable to the support of Mrs. Verminet, he decreed, that Rankin, Frayser and Dudley, should deliver all the trust slaves then held by them respectively, to the marshal of the court, to be 166 hired out by *him &c. And that these defendants should render accounts of the values of the slaves by them respectively sold, and also of the profits, as well of those which had been sold, as of those which remained in their possession. From this decree, Rankin appealed.

Stanard, for the appellant. The case presented by the record is not properly relievable in equity. The bill, indeed, prays a discovery of the names, ages and residence, of the slaves in question, and an order to restrain the defendants from carrying the slaves away: but, as it appears from the sequel, that no such discovery was in fact wanted, and as a demand of bail in an action of detinue, would have answered every purpose of the restraining order, it is apparent, that the prayer of the bill in these particulars, was only designed to give colour for the jurisdiction of the court. If the appellees have a rightful claim to the property, that claim is founded on a legal title. The legal estate must be in some one. It either abides in the executors of Mr. Carter; or, if by disavowing and declining the trust, as they did from the beginning, they divested themselves of the legal estate in the subject, that was done only by their transfer of the possession, and with it the legal estate, to Mrs. Verminet, during the life of her first husband Bradford; and the possession being thus vested in Bradford, jure mariti, time perfected the right in him, and he had a complete legal title, which yet remains in him or his representatives. And if Bradford held the subject clothed with the trust created by Mr. Carter's will, still he held the legal estate in it. The holder of the legal estate (whoever it was) had complete remedy at law by action of detinue.

But Rankin claimed and held adversely to the legal estate, wheresoever it abided; and the statute of limitations affords him a complete protection against the claim of the appellees. There is no direct proof, that he knew these slaves were a trust subject, or had any notice of the rights of the cestuis 167 que trust, so as to charge him with the trust, *and thus to deprive him of the protection of the statute. Nor can such notice be fairly inferred from the fact, that he purchased Mrs. Verminet's life estate in the property; for it is a very common case for a married woman to have a life estate in slaves, not subject to any trust; as, for instance, slaves held as her thirds of a former husband's estate.

Johnson, for appellees. The property in question is a trust subject: the executors of Mr. Carter did not, and could not, by renouncing the trust, extinguish it: and there is nothing to take this trust, more than any other trust, from the cognizance of a court of equity. If there was any remedy for the cestuis que trust at law, it was an inadequate one; for the property is now not only to be restored to them, but to be settled and disposed of to their use, according to the intention of the donor; and this a court of law could not do. But there was no remedy at law. When the executor of Mr. Carter assented to the legacy of the slaves in question, and delivered them to Mrs. Bradford, he divested himself of the legal title, as executor: when the trustees renounced the trust, they abandoned their legal title. The regular course would have been to apply to the court to substitute a trustee. As it was, the legal estate was and is wholly unrepresented. Mrs. Bradford, during the life of her first husband, during her widowhood, and after her marriage with Verminet, held the mere possession; the trust still subsisting, though a proper trustee was wanting. And if it can be supposed, that by the delivery of the property to Mrs. Verminet, during the life of her first husband Bradford, the legal estate vested in him, so as to pass at his death to his representatives, it does not appear, that there was ever any personal representative of his estate, and it is almost certain, from the circumstances disclosed, that there was none.

Then, as to the statute of limitations. If Rankin purchased with notice of the trust, he became himself a trustee, and cannot 168 avail himself of the statute. Now, he must be *charged with notice of the trust: he purchased only a qualified interest in the subject, the life estate of a feme covert, and required her to join her husband in the bill of sale, or rather required her husband to procure her to join in it; and it is not to be imagined, that he did not inquire into, and inform himself of, every circumstance affecting the title. Indeed, the very fact of a purchase of a qualified interest in such property, infers notice of the nature of the right, and the source from which it was derived to the vendor. Again; the trustees named in Mr. Carter's will having declined to act, and no trustee having been substituted in their stead, the legal estate was unrepresented: in which regard, the case is analogous to that of a decedent's estate remaining long unrepresented by any executor or administrator, which has been held to avoid the operation of the statute of limitations. Lastly, Rankin purchased this trust property, when all the beneficiaries were in a state of disability, (Mrs. Verminet under coverture, and all her children infants); and removed it to a distant part of the country, and thus kept them in ignorance of the locality of the property, without a knowledge of which they could not assert their claim to it: and the case falls within that saving of the statute of limitations, which prevents persons, who by any indirect ways or means, defeat or obstruct actions that lie against them, from pleading the statute in bar of such actions. 1 Rev. Code, c. 128, § 14, p. 491.

CARR, J. It seems to me, that the case is decidedly against the appellant.

Several objections to the decree. were taken in the argument. It was first contended, that this was not a fit case for equity. The bill being for a stock of negroes, which in the lapse of twenty years had increased very much, and were much scattered, the plaintiffs averred, that they could not without the aid of a discovery, ascertain the names, sexes and residence, of the slaves, so as to pursue their legal remedy. They also stated, 169 that the defendants were *about carrying them beyond the jurisdiction of the court. If this had been supposed by the defendants colourable merely, they should have pleaded to the jurisdiction of the court. This court has sustained the jurisdiction in several cases of this sort. These allegations certainly saved the bill from a demurrer.

There seems to me, however, a much surer ground for the jurisdiction of equity. The bequest of these slaves, created a trust for the support and maintenance of a feme covert and her infant children; a trust, not to be discharged by a single act of the trustees, but requiring their care and attention, during the lives of the husband and wife and the survivor. During all this time, the trustees were to apply the profits of the slaves to the support and maintenance of the testator's daughter, her husband and children; and then the slaves with their increase were to be divided among the children. To mark his anxiety to keep these negroes not only beyond the controul of the husband but the wife also, the legal title, and the whole management of them, are given to the trustees; and they are to apply the proceeds of their labour, at their discretion, to the support of the cestuis que trust. This appears to me a case peculiarly proper for the protection and superintendence of equity.

On the death of the testator, his executor selected the slaves. But the trustees, from the first, declined to have any concern with them, and they went into the hands of the feme covert, her husband being in Europe. Can it be doubted, that equity would instantly have interfered, if any one as next friend either of the wife or children, had filed a bill, stating the refusal of the trustees to act, and praying the court to set up the trust, and preserve the subject, either by compelling the trustees to act, or by substituting others? Can there be a subject more appropriate to equity, than to preserve to the feme covert and her infant children, the bounty of the testator, and cause it to flow in the channel he had marked out for it? And if equity would have interfered at first,

170 imperative *now? The trust fund continues; the purposes for which the trust was raised continue. Nor, under the will, can the slaves be divided among the children, till the mother's death. If the names and places of abode of all the slaves and their descendants could be discovered, so as to enable the plaintiffs, in the names of the trustees, to bring actions of detinue, and recover at law, the court of law could go no further. It could not execute the trust, or make one of the arrangements necessary to preserve the property, or appropriate the profits to the purposes intended by the testator. In equity, one suit embraces the whole subject; a decree for the recovery of the slaves; an account for the hires and profits; and, finally, when these points are adjusted, the whole trust fund may be committed to new trustees, with such directions as may ensure the due execution of the testator's intention, and with leave to the parties interested to apply to the court, in case any future negligence or abuse of the trust should render it necessary. There is no force in the objection to the jurisdiction.

It was next contended, that the statute of limitations was a bar to the recovery. I think not. Of this statute I have heretofore had occasion to declare my opinion. I consider it a wise and salutary law, tending to the security of titles, the discouragement of litigation, the repose of the community. I shall always be ready to give it a fair and full support: but to a case like this, I can never think that it does or ought to extend.

Courts of equity, not being within the words of the statute, apply it by analogy. In doing this, they must exercise a sound discretion. The defendant Rankin bought the slaves from Verminet, and bought them for the life of Mrs. Verminet only, as his bill of sale shews. He acknowledges too, in his answer, "that he was informed, at the time of his purchase, that the slaves, were held by the said Verminet, in right of his wife:" these are his words. Buying, then, with full knowledge, that Verminet had only a partial, qualified interest in the property, and 171 this in right of his *wife, he is chargeable with notice of that right, and bought subject to it, whatever it might be. It is hardly possible to believe, that he did not inform himself of the actual state of the property: that were a course which no man of common sense would pursue in such a purchase. The conclusion is proper and necessary, that he did know the true state of Verminet's interest. And on this ground, the law implies notice, and charges him with all the consequences. Can the statute apply to protect such a purchaser, and enable him to bar the very right under which and subject to which he bought? Can this be called adversary possession? Does not the trust, which attached to the slaves the moment they were selected by the testator, follow them? None will deny that it did, while Verminet held; and can a purchaser from him with notice, occupy higher ground? Nor is this one of those constructive trusts, to which the statute of limitations is applied: there, the party takes possession in his own right and as owner, and is afterwards turned into a trustee, by matter of evidence and construction merely; here, Rankin took possession in subordination to Mrs. Verminet's right, and is as much bound by the trust, and as incapable of protection by the statute, as trustees the most directly and formally appointed.

The removal of the slaves also to a distant part of the state, and the sale of some of them to persons residing at a still greater distance, rendered it difficult, to a woman and children especially, to discover the place of their abode, so as to sue for them sooner; and thus the case of the appellees is brought within the saving of the 14th section of the statute of limitations.

The chancellor has dismissed the bill as to the purchasers from Rankin, and directed an account to be taken of the values of the slaves sold to them, and of their hires and profits; intending, no doubt, to decree the full amount of their values and profits, at the final hearing. We think, that so much of this order, as directs the account to be taken of the profits of the slaves sold, after the sale of 172 them to the *purchasers, is wrong; the true mode being to decree the amount for which the property was sold, and interest thereon, from the date of the sale, and profits only before the sales were made. The decree must be corrected in this particular; but the appellant must pay the costs, the appellees being the parties substantially prevailing.

The court gives no opinion on the point which the chancellor reserved for future consideration.

The other judges concurred. The decree was corrected in the particular mentioned by judge Carr, and as to all things else affirmed.

Hunter, Pauper, v. Fulcher.*

Slaves—Suit for Freedom—Case at Bar.—By statute of Maryland of 1796, all slaves brought into that state to reside, are declared free: a Virginia born slave is carried by his master to Maryland: the master settles there, and keeps the slave there, in bondage, for 12 years, the statute in force all the time: then, he brings him as a slave to Virginia, and sells him here. Adjudged, in an action brought by the man against the purchaser, that he is free.

This was a suit brought, in the hustings court of Richmond, by the appellant against the appellee, to recover his freedom. It was once before in this court, and was sent back to the hustings court for a new trial. 5 Rand. 126. The case was then stated and agreed by the parties, and was, in substance, thus:

George Hunter, the plaintiff, was born in the county of Fairfax, in Virginia, the slave of Thomas W. Offutt, a resident citizen of that county; by whom he was given to his daughter, who married William M. Offutt, and after her marriage, removed with her husband, from Fairfax to the 173 *county of Montgomery in Maryland. And upon their removal to Maryland, they carried Hunter with them, as their slave; and he resided, with his master and mistress, in Maryland, about twelve years. After this residence in Maryland, he was brought back to Virginia, and was sold by his master William M. Offutt, in the county of Jefferson, Virginia, for valuable consideration, to one Hill; who afterwards brought him to Richmond, Virginia, as his slave, and there sold him to the defendant Fulcher, for 450 dollars. The sale to Hill, as well as the sale to Fulcher, was made after the year 1819. By an act of the general assembly of Maryland, passed at its session of November 1796, entitled an act relating to negroes, and to repeal the acts of assembly therein mentioned, it was, among other provisions, enacted as follows, viz. "That it shall not be lawful from and after the passing of this act, to import or bring into this state, by land or water, any negro, mulatto, or other slave, for sale, or to reside within this state; and any person brought into this state as a slave, contrary to this act, if a slave before, shall thereupon immediately cease to be the property of the person or persons, so importing or bringing such slave within this state, and shall be free." And this provision of the statute of Maryland was, at the time when Hunter was carried thither by W. M. Offutt, and during all the time of Hunter's residence there, and still is, in full force, as part of the statute law of that state.

The question was, Whether upon this state of facts, Hunter was entitled to his freedom?

The hustings court held, that he was not, and gave judgment for the defendant. Hunter appealed to the circuit court of Henrico, which affirmed the judgment. And then he appealed to this court.

Scott, assigned counsel for the pauper. The appellant was born a slave in Virginia. He did not himself break his bondage: his owner, who was or became a citizen of Maryland, carried him to that state, to reside there, and in fact kept him there for twelve 174 years: and by the positive *law of Maryland, the owner forfeited all right of property in his person, and he was free. His right to freedom was completely vested in Maryland. But he did not assert it there. He was afterwards brought back to Virginia without any exercise of his own will, and sold here as a slave. And the only question is, whether he can assert in Virginia, the vested right of freedom he acquired by the law of Maryland?

If he cannot, it is difficult to imagine any reason, why the owner of a slave in Virginia, carrying him of his own accord to Maryland to reside, and there voluntarily emancipating him in conformity with the laws of that state, may not, if he can at any time afterwards find or bring him here, resume the property which he formerly held in him under the laws of Virginia: for an act of manumission of the owner conferring freedom on his slave, by authority of the law of Maryland, cannot be more effectual to confer freedom, than the very law of Maryland itself, acting on persons and property to all intents and purposes subject to her jurisdiction. Neither is there any just reason, why this right to freedom acquired under the law of Maryland should not be enforced in Virginia, as well as any other personal right acquired under the laws of that or any other state.

In Lewis v. Fullerton, 1 Rand. 15, the pauper claimed a right to freedom, on the ground that his mother had, before his birth, sojourned in Ohio, and so had been made free by the law of that state, and had been there adjudged free, upon a writ of habeas corpus. The only residence of the mother in Ohio, proved in the case, was, that she was once seen on a Sunday, working in a sugar camp there, in her owner's absence, and without any evidence that it was with his permission: but the court said, that such an occupation as that, had it even been for the owner's benefit, and in his presence, could not operate an emancipation of his slave. As to the judgment on the habeas corpus, it had not affirmed the mother's right to freedom; and if it had, the court intimated a strong 175 doubt, whether the judgment would *have concluded the right of the owner, in that instance; that is, under the circumstances of that case. But the court indicated its opinion, clearly enough, that the effect of the residence of a Virginia slave in Ohio, for a great length of time, with the assent of the owner; the effect of that circumstance, in relation to that person who might thereby have become one of the permanent members of that state; would be to confer freedom upon him. Now, this is our case. And the previous adjudication in Griffith v. Fanny, Gilm. 143, is in point, and conclusive, that the pauper here is free. There, a slave was sold by Kincheloe her owner to Skinner a citizen and resident of Ohio, who held her there; the constitution of Ohio declared her free; and to avoid this her vested right to freedom, Skinner procured Kincheloe to make a bill of sale of her to Griffith; who finding her in Virginia, took possession of her, and claimed her as a slave. She asserted her right to freedom acquired in Ohio, under the constitution of Ohio: and this court adjudged her free.

Daniel, for the appellee. There are principles of peculiar interest involved in this case. Is it competent to the state of Maryland, by her laws, so to divest rights of property acquired under the laws of Virginia, and according to them never in any way divested, as not only to deprive, the owner of the property, while he and it are in Maryland, but also to deprive him of it, after he has returned and brought it back to Virginia? Can Maryland impose a forfeiture for the violation of her laws, of such universal efficacy, that, though it have never been exacted there, while the offender and the subject were within her jurisdiction, it may and must be exacted here, whenever the offender and subject come within our jurisdiction, though offending against no law or policy of our own? If it suit the policy of Maryland, to declare slaves imported into that state free, and to suffer slaves so emancipated to remain there, are our courts of justice to set them free in 176 Virginia, with liberty *to remain here, contrary to the policy of our own laws, which require slaves emancipated to leave the state? The appellant's counsel must be prepared to maintain the affirmative on all these points.

If Maryland may divest the right of property in a Virginia slave carried thither, every other state in the union may do the same; so, indeed, may any foreign nation; for, in respect to their own merely internal concerns, the U. States are foreign to each other. If Maryland may declare a slave carried thither to reside, immediately free; she, and every other state, may declare a slave free, if his owner wilfully carry or send him there, no matter for what purpose, or for how short a time. Her power is as competent to the one act of legislation, as to the other; for the constitution of the U. States (art. 4, § 2), only provides, that slaves escaping from one state into another, shall not, in consequence of any law therein, be discharged from bondage. The statute of Maryland under consideration, setting free all slaves brought there to reside, does not fix any term of residence, or allow any discrimination in respect of the citizenship or domicile of the owner; so that if the appellant be adjudged free upon the strength of that statute, he was equally free the first hour of his stay in Maryland, as at the expiration of his twelve years residence; and he would have been equally free, if his Virginia owner had never moved to Maryland himself, but had only sent his slave to his farm on the other side of the Potomac. The Maryland statute must be held effectual to this whole extent, if it be allowed to be effectual at all; that is, if it be allowed to operate in Virginia, it must be allowed to have the same effect here, as it had in Maryland.

It is not more the province of our courts of justice, to enforce this forfeiture, to inflict this punishment, denounced by Maryland against a person violating her laws in this particular, than any other punishment for any other act, which, having regard to her own condition, she may think it just and politic to prohibit and punish. The general proposition would be rejected at once.

177 *If Maryland thought it wise to promote partial emancipation in her territory, it is not perceived how it could further even her views, or how any comity towards her would require, that we should set slaves free in our territory; and surely, it is contrary to our policy to do so. This slave was brought back to Virginia since 1819, when the law of Virginia permitted emancipation under its own authority, only on condition, that the freedman should leave the state within twelve months (1 Rev. Code, ch. 111, § 61): but if this slave be set free, his right to freedom, being derived from the law of Maryland, that statute of Virginia will not embrace his case. He may remain here for life. Indeed, I do not perceive, how a person, who has been always held in slavery in another state, though he may be justly entitled to freedom in that state, by its laws, can therefore be set free in Virginia; for, though our laws respect the right of freedom actually enjoyed by persons belonging to any other state, they allow no emancipation of persons actually held in slavery, but such as is made under their own authority, and in conformity with their own provisions. When we say a person has a vested right of freedom, we use a phrase (for the want of one more appropriate) applicable, in its proper sense, only to rights of property. To say that a man is free, is not to say that he has a vested property in himself, but to describe his status of condition. This imperfection of language sometimes leads to fallacy of judgment: this court corrected a fallacy of the kind, in Maria v. Surbaugh, 2 Rand. 230, 246. It seems a solecism to say, that a man actually in bondage, has a vested right of freedom. If the appellant be set free, his right to freedom will vest by the judgment of the court.

The constitution of Ohio declares, that there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in that state, even for a moment. In Lewis v. Fullerton, it appeared that the mother of the plaintiff, before his birth, had been once seen at work in Ohio, in the absence of his master, indeed, and for

178 aught that appeared without his permission; but this court *said her working there for so short a time, for her owner's benefit, and in his presence, would not have altered the case. By the constitution of Ohio she was free: this court, administering the law of Virginia, adjudged her a slave. The mother had been taken possession of, by one claiming her as his slave, and upon habeas corpus in Ohio, she was set at liberty; she was then actually free in Ohio: but this court strongly questioned, whether, if the judgment on the habeas corpus had affirmed her right to freedom, that would have concluded the right of her owner. The mother had been emancipated by deed made in Ohio, though under an agreement that she should be brought to Virginia, and serve her master here two years: this court held the deed ineffectual to emancipate her; because it was not recorded according to our law; and because "the lex loci is to be taken, subject to the exception, that it is not to be enforced in another country, when it violates some moral duty, or the policy of that country, or is inconsistent with a positive right secured to a third person or party, by the laws of the country in which it is sought to be enforced. In such a case, we are told, magis jus nostrum quam jus alienum servemus. That third party in this case is the commonwealth of Virginia: and her policy and interest are also to be attended to. These turn the scale against the lex loci in this instance. For want of being emancipated agreeably to the provisions of our act, the duty of supporting the old and infirm slaves would devolve upon the commonwealth. That burthen is to be borne by the master in relation to slaves so emancipated; that is, emancipated agreeably to the provisions of the act." The decisions of Lewis v. Fullerton, then, and the reasoning it is founded on, sustain my view of the present case.

The court did not, in that case, decide upon the effect of a residence of a slave in Ohio, for a great length of time, and with the assent of the owner. It cautiously abstained from any decision upon it. And how can such a residence be material? It cannot vary the case in principle. It is not less competent to Ohio by her 179 constitution, to give freedom *to all slaves permitted by their owners to set foot on her soil, than it is to Maryland by statute, to set free all slaves brought there to reside without fixing any term of residence. One term of residence does not disprove the owner's animus revertendi more than another: Where is the line to be drawn? In this case the owner has done more than evince the animus revertendi: he has returned.

As to Griffith v. Fanny, it does not appear from the report, that Fanny had ever been a slave in Virginia, or that Kincheloe, her first owner, was a citizen of Virginia. The transaction was a mere fraud on the law of Ohio. The case was not argued on any general principle: the court gave no reasons for its judgment: and Lewis v. Fullerton, which was fully considered, was decided after it.

In England, it is now settled, that a person who is a slave by the laws of one country, cannot acquire freedom, by going or being carried into another country, by the laws of which he is free while there, so that if he return or be brought back (by whatever means) to his former country, he is exempt from his former bondage. Lord Mansfield's decision of the case of Somerset (Howell's state trials, vol. 20), seems to have made a general impression, that when once a slave got to England, he was thenceforth absolutely free. But Lord Mansfield decided nothing as to the operation of the laws of England beyond the limits of the realm: he only determined, that by the constitution of England, slavery could not exist there; and that, consequently, there was no authority in that kingdom, by which a slave, transported thither, could be compelled to return to a state of bondage in the country from which he was brought. Later decisions have corrected the false inferences deduced from Somerset's case. In Williams v. Brown, 3 Bos. & Pull. 69, it was held, that a fugitive slave, coming to England from Grenada, and afterwards returning to Grenada, was subject to his former bondage in Grenada. And in the case of The mongrel woman Grace (of which we have as yet only a newspaper report) Lord

Stowell decided, that a slave brought 180 by her owner from *Antigua to England, and then carried back by her owner to Antigua, was lawfully held in bondage there. So, in our case, the appellant, a slave by the law of Virginia, was carried to Maryland, where he could not be lawfully held in bondage, but was in fact held as a slave there, and then brought back as a slave to Virginia, where he was born a slave, and where he might be still lawfully held in bondage.

Scott, in his reply, said, that the english cases determined no more than this, that though the law of England afford no means of enforcing the rights of the owner of a slave over his person, while there, yet it does not emancipate the slave, because he comes or is brought to England. But, in this case, the law of Maryland did expressly emancipate the slave. The owner was domiciled in Maryland: he had voluntarily submitted his slave, and himself too, to her authority. Surely, it was a competent exercise of legislative authority in Maryland, to devert her own citizen's right of property in a slave imported in defiance of her laws, and to change the status of the slave from bond to free. In M'Michen v. Amos, 4 Rand. 142, this court held that a slave imported into and held in Virginia, contrary to our statute of 1792, acquired a perfect vested right of freedom, so that, though held in actual bondage till all penalties and forfeitures incurred under that statute, had been taken away by another statute, he was all the time free.

GREEN, J. The decision of this case in favour of the appellant, does not appear to me to involve the proposition, that in all cases and under all circumstances (except that of persons bound to service in one state, escaping to another, provided for by the constitution of the U. States), a slave born and owned in Virginia, and found in another state, may be emancipated by the laws of that state, so as to enable him to assert that right in our courts. If it did, I should wish the cause to be submitted to the consideration of a full court. My strong impression is, that such a proposition cannot be supported, and was rightly denied by this court in 181 Lewis v. Fullerton*, where it was held, that a slave temporarily employed in Ohio, for the benefit of her master, a resident citizen of Virginia, was not thereby entitled to be considered as free in the courts of Virginia, although she might be so considered in those of Ohio.

In this case, a slave born and owned in Virginia, was carried to Maryland to reside there, and he was kept there for twelve years, by one who acquired a title to him by marriage, then being a resident citizen of Maryland, or soon afterwards removing and domiciliating himself there; thus voluntarily becoming a permanent member of that community, and submitting himself and his property to the full force of the laws of Maryland, by which the slave was declared to be free; and thereby also (according to the opinion of judge Cabell, in Murray v. McCarty, 2 Munf. 393, in which I concur) becoming, upon the principles of natural law, and the spirit of our institutions, a citizen of that state. We are, therefore, called upon in this case, to enforce rights acquired in Maryland, under the laws of that state, against one claiming under a citizen of that state, after those rights were vested. And I see no objection, in principle, to giving full effect here, to those laws, operating on the rights of persons, who were to all intents and purposes justly subjected to them, and touching the rights of no others: in this respect, the case is like that of Griffith v. Fanny, where a citizen of Virginia carried a slave to Ohio, and there sold and delivered her to a resident citizen of that state, who, in fraud of the laws of Ohio, took a bill of sale to a resident citizen of Virginia, in trust for himself, and retained possession of the slave in Ohio for two years. The court there, enforced the laws of Ohio against a resident citizen of that state, without affecting the rights or interests of any other.

The English cases cited do not touch this, in any point. They were all collated and examined by lord Stowell in the case of The mongrel woman Grace, decided by him in 1827. And he declared their effect to be, that the laws of England did not emancipate slaves brought there, or annihilate the 182 *master's rights, but afforded no remedy for enforcing them, the relation of master and slave not being known to the common law; and that, upon the return of the slave to the country from whence he was brought, the subsisting rights of the master might be there enforced, according to the laws of that country.

CARR, J. Agreeing, as I do, with the general view taken of this case by my brother Green, I should not add a word, but to mark the exact extent to which I mean to go. The law of Maryland, having enacted, that slaves carried into that state for sale or to reside, shall be free; and the owner of the slave here, having carried him to Maryland, and resided there with him for twelve years, thus becoming himself a citizen of Maryland, and voluntarily subjecting himself and the slave to the operation of her laws; I think the right to freedom vested, and could not be divested, by the bringing him back afterwards to Virginia.

CABELL, J., concurred in the opinion, that the judgment should be reversed, and judgment entered for the appellant.

(Absent BROOKE, P., and COALTER, J.)

Contract for Sale of Land—Specific Performance*—Case at Bar.—A. by covenant in July 1779, contracts to sell land to B. for £3500. whereof B. pays £1754. in cash, and covenants to pay balance, on A.'s making him a conveyance; in September following, B. pays balance in full, to A. in person, and receives possession; but A. makes no conveyance; or, if he made one, it cannot be found: in July 1791, B. by assignment sealed and indorsed on A.'s covenant, assigns all his right &c. in the land to

C. for value received; and C. takes possession: in October 1797, C. contracts to sell the land to D. for £800, whereof £500. was to be paid in 1798, and £300. in 1799; and C. covenants to give D. possession on receiving the first payment in 1798, and to make him a lawful title on receiving the last payment: D. makes the first payment in 1798, and receives possession, which he and his heirs have ever since held: D. never makes or tenders the last payment; C. never makes or tenders the conveyance; and they both die. Upon a bill by C.'s adm'r and heirs, against D.'s adm'r and heirs, for specific execution of the contract of Oct. 1797, the chancellor decrees specific execution, and charges the balance of purchase money on the land; and decree affirmed.

Same—Same—Escheat—Case at Bar.—Pending the bill in the court of chancery, the escheator takes an inquisition on the land, whereby it is found that A. died seised thereof, without heirs, and without having disposed thereof, so that it has escheated: D.'s heirs make no opposition to this proceeding, and give C.'s heirs no notice thereof. HELD, this escheat is no obstacle to the specific execution claimed by C.'s heirs against D.'s heirs: but the commonwealth and her officers shall be enjoined from any farther proceeding on the escheat.

Same—Presumption as to Conveyance—Quære.—Whether, under the circumstances, a deed from A. to B. conformably with the contract of July 1779, must not be presumed?

The executors of William Johnson, by deed dated June 5, 1778, conveyed to James Nicholson in fee, a tract of land lying on the Mattapony in King William county.

Nicholson took possession immediately: and, by articles between him and Abraham Van Bibber, dated July 2, 1779, contracted to sell this land to Van Bibber, for £3500. Pennsylvania currency; of which sum the articles stated, that Van Bibber had paid £1734. in cash, and that he bound himself to pay the residue of £1766. on Nicholson's making a conveyance. On the 3d August following, Van Bibber paid Nicholson £1040. and on the 15th September, the balance, £726. in full of the purchase money, as appeared by Nicholson's receipts indorsed on the articles.

184 *Abraham Van Bibber was let into the possession, and held it till August 22, 1791, when he sold the land to Andrew Van Bibber. The evidence of this sale was a writing of that date, signed and sealed by Abraham, and indorsed on the articles between him and Nicholson of July 2, 1779. in these words: "I hereby assign all my right, title and interest, to the within mentioned tract of land, unto Andrew Van Bibber, his heirs and assigns, for value received in full therefor. Witness my hand and seal &c."

Andrew Van Bibber thenceforth held the possession, until October 27, 1797, when by articles between him and Charles Edwards, he contracted to sell the land to Edwards, for £800. whereof £500. was to be paid January 1, 1798; £150. October 27, 1798; and £150. October 27, 1799; with legal interest from the date of the contract, on the two last payments: and it was stipulated, that possession should be given to Edwards, so soon as he should make the first payment of £500. and that upon his making the last payment, Van Bibber should make him a lawful title.

Edwards made the first payment of £500. received possession, and held it during his own life and Van Bibber's; and after Edwards's death, his heirs continued to hold it, without disturbance from any quarter. The residue of the purchase money (£300.) was never paid. Neither did it appear, that

*The principal case is cited in foot-note to Griffin v. Cunningham, 19 Gratt. 574. See monographic note on "Specific Performance" appended to Hanna v. Wilson, 8 Gratt. 243.

Van Bibber had ever tendered Edwards a conveyance, and demanded this residue of the purchase money; or that Edwards had tendered him the money, and demanded a conveyance, or offered to rescind the contract on account of defect of title.

In February 1821, after the death of both the vendor and vendee, Sarah Van Bibber the administratrix, and Andrew and Hester Van Bibber the heirs, of the vendor, exhibited their bill, in the superiour court of chancery of Richmond, against Thomas Ware and Sarah his wife, who was relict and administratrix of the vendee, and Charles and Thomas Edwards, his heirs; wherein, after setting forth the facts above stated, they added, that Nicholson, who sold 185 the land *to Abraham Van Bibber in 1779, was dead, leaving no heirs known to them; that they were unable to say, whether he made a conveyance to Abraham Van Bibber, as by the contract of July 1779 he had agreed to do, before or upon the payment of the balance of the purchase money, but they believed he did make such conveyance, and that it had been lost by accident and never recorded; and that, if proof of the actual execution of such a conveyance by Nicholson could not be adduced, yet, under all the circumstances, a conveyance by him ought to be presumed. And they prayed a specific execution of the contract of October 1797, between Andrew Van Bibber and Edwards; that the heirs of Edwards should be compelled to accept a conveyance with general warranty from the heirs of Van Bibber; that the balance of the purchase money with interest should be decreed to the administratrix of Van Bibber; and that the land itself should, if necessary, be subjected to the debt; or, if specific execution could not be decreed, that the contract should be rescinded, the land restored to the heirs of the vendor, and that part of the purchase money which had been paid by the vendee, refunded with interest, after discounting therefrom the profits of the subject during the possession of the vendor and his heirs.

The administratrix and the heirs of Edwards, in their answers, admitted, that the balance of the purchase money (£300.) due by their ancestor to Van Bibber, had not been paid, because (they said) Van Bibber could never convey a legal title; and they insisted, that the Van Bibbers could not even yet convey a good title; and that, therefore, the contract ought to be rescinded, the purchase money refunded with interest, and compensation allowed them for improvements, they accounting for the profits. They added, that the only personal estate of Edwards, which had come to the hands of the administratrix de bonis non, was two slaves, of which distribution had been made before the commencement of this suit; but the first administrator of Edwards was David Smith, whose letters of admin- 186 istration had *been revoked, though he was still living, and had never rendered any account of his administration.

The plaintiffs did not make Smith a party defendant.

The chancellor, in March 1823, directed a commissioner to examine and report the state of the title. The commissioner reported, that, as by the contract of July 1779,

Abraham Van Bibber was not to pay the balance of the purchase money to Nicholson until Nicholson should make him a conveyance, and as it appeared that the whole balance was in fact paid to Nicholson in person, in September 1779, it was thence fairly to be inferred, that Nicholson had performed the covenant on his part, and made the conveyance to Van Bibber, and that the conveyance had been lost or destroyed. Upon the coming in of this report, the chancellor in January 1824, decreed a specific execution according to the prayer of the bill; but he set aside this decree, at the same term, because he thought that the fact of the actual execution of a conveyance by Nicholson, was not so distinctly averred in the bill, as to justify a decree for specific execution on that ground.

Hereupon, the plaintiffs obtained leave to amend their bill. But after this leave was obtained, and before the amended bill was filed, the escheator of King William proceeded to escheat the land in question to the commonwealth, by inquisition of escheat, in which it was found, that James Nicholson was seised thereof in his lifetime, and being so seised, died without heir, and without having made any disposition of it. The heirs of Edwards, residing in the county, and holding the land in possession, made no opposition to this proceeding, while it was pending, and no effort to avoid it after it was accomplished; nor did they give any notice of the proceeding, to the heirs of Van Bibber, who resided in the county of Mathews.

After this escheat, the plaintiffs filed an amended bill; in which they alleged, positively, that Nicholson executed a conveyance to Abraham Van Bibber, pursuant to the contract of July 1779, and that this 187 conveyance was lodged in *the clerk's office of King William, to be recorded, but the office was burnt in 1787, and thus the instrument was destroyed; and they prayed (in general terms) that the escheator might be made party defendant to the suit.

The answers to the amended bill, denied that any conveyance by Nicholson to Abraham Van Bibber, was deposited in the King William office, and there destroyed in the manner suggested, or that any such conveyance was ever executed. And the escheator moreover denied, that either Abraham or Andrew Van Bibber ever had any interest in the land, legal or equitable, or any possession thereof.

It was proved, that though the clerk's office of King William was destroyed by fire in 1787, yet all the deed-books from 1778 (inclusive) were preserved, and that no deed from Nicholson to Van Bibber could be found on record there; that the fee-books of the period, had also been preserved, and that no fee was there charged for the recording any such deed.

There was proof also, that the plaintiff Mrs. Van Bibber, administratrix of Andrew Van Bibber, had said, in 1818 or 1819, that she had not a right to the land, that the right lay in Mrs. Nicholson, that she had gone to Mrs. Nicholson to get a right (meaning, as the deponent supposed, a deed) but found her sick, blind and deaf.

Pending the proceedings, Mrs. Ware, the administratrix de bonis non of Edwards, the vendee, died, and no personal representative of that decedent was afterwards made a party.

The cause coming on again for hearing, in January, 1827, the chancellor decreed, that upon the heirs of Andrew Van Bibber, executing and tendering to the defendants, the heirs of Edwards, a deed conveying the land to them in fee simple, with general warranty, those defendants should pay to the administratrix of Van Bibber, the balance due of the purchase money, viz. £300. with interest from October 27, 1797, and the costs of suit; and if they failed to make such payments, within six months from the time when the 188 *deed should be tendered to them, the marshal should make sale of the land, and bring the proceeds of sale into court, to be applied to the satisfaction of the debt, interest and costs.

The heirs of Edwards appealed to this court.

The cause was argued by Johnson for the appellants, and by Schmidt and Leigh for the appellees.

1. The first objection taken to the decree by the appellants' counsel, was, that it not only subjected the land to the debt due on account of the balance of the purchase money thereof, but adjudged the heirs of the vendee Edwards, personally, to pay this debt of their ancestor. The counsel for the appellees acknowledged, that this objection was well founded, and that the decree ought to be corrected in this particular.

2. It was next objected, that the heirs of Edwards had a right to have his personal estate accounted for, and applied to the satisfaction of this debt; yet no account of the personal estate had been required, and at the time the decree was made, there was no personal representative of Edwards before the court. His first administrator, Smith, was never made a party, and called to account for the assets which came to his hands; and Mrs. Ware, the administratrix de bonis non, who was originally made a party defendant, died pending the suit; and thenceforth there was no proceeding against the personal estate or personal representative of the debtor.

To this it was answered, that the defendants had all stated in their answers, that the whole of the personal estate, which came to the hands of the administratrix de bonis non, had been regularly distributed: that fund was in their own hands. And as to the first administrator, Smith, the defendants, who were the distributees, had never thought it worth while to call him to account, and they could not complain, that the creditors had declined the trouble and expense of doing what they themselves deemed useless.

189 *3. It was earnestly contended, that the chancellor, instead of decreeing a specific execution of the contract of sale between Andrew Van Bibber and Edwards, ought to have rescinded the contract, and restored the land to the heirs of the vendor, and to the representatives of the vendee, that part of the purchase money which had been paid, with interest, holding the latter accountable for profits, and the former bound to make compensation for improvements. Specific execution ought not to have been decreed, because the Van Bibbers, even at the date of the decree, could not convey a good title. Equity never compels a purchaser to take a doubtful or an equitable title, or any title not free even from suspicion. Sugd. law of Vend. c. 7, § III., p. 243. Now, so far from there being any reason to infer, that Nicholson ever in fact executed a conveyance of the land to Abraham Van Bibber, in pursuance of the contract of July 1779, the circumstances lead to the opposite conclusion, that he never made such a conveyance. The suggestion, that the deed was made, and lodged in the clerk's office of King William to be recorded, and was destroyed when the office was burned in 1787, is refuted by the proof, that all the deed-books and all the fee-books of the period were preserved from the flames, and that no trace of such a deed can be found in either: had the deed been fully proved it would have been registered in the deed-book: had it been only partly proved, a charge for such probat would have been found in the fee-book. That Nicholson never made the conveyance, is manifest from the fact, that Abraham Van Bibber transferred his right in the land to Andrew Van Bibber, in 1790, by assignment indorsed on the executory contract between Nicholson and him: he did not convey the subject; he only assigned the right to demand a conveyance of Nicholson in pursuance of his contract. And Mrs. Van Bibber, as late as 1818 or 1819, acknowledged that she had not the right (meaning, that she had no deed) and that the right was in Mrs. Nicholson.

Neither is this a case in which the court 190 can presume a conveyance from *Nicholson. A purchaser has a right to require a title commencing at least fifty years before his purchase, because the statute of limitations cannot, in a shorter period, confer a title. Sugd. c. 7, § I., p. 237. But from the date of Nicholson's contract (July 1779) to the date of the decree (January 1827) is only forty-seven years, and six months; from which deducting about a year and a half, according to the proviso of the statute of limitations (1 Rev. Code, c. 128, § 11), only about forty-six years can be counted.

The appellees' counsel answered, that considering that by the terms of the contract in July 1779, Abraham Van Bibber was to pay Nicholson the balance of the purchase money, only upon Nicholson's making a conveyance of the land; that the balance was paid by Van Bibber in person, to Nicholson in person, in September 1779, when there could be no manner of obstacle to the complete performance of the contract on Nicholson's part, by making the conveyance; and that the vendee, and those claiming under him, had ever since held quiet and undisturbed possession; it was fair to infer, that Nicholson had in fact made a conveyance. The state of the country at the period, and the length of time that has since elapsed, sufficed to account for the loss of the instrument without shewing how it was lost. It might have been lodged in the clerk's office of King William, without any probat, complete or partial; and in that case, no trace of it could be expected, either in the deed-book or in the fee-book. So soon as Nicholson received full payment of the purchase money, he was a bare trustee of the legal title for Van Bibber, and bound immediately to convey it to him; and it is an inference of law, that he did in fact convey. Lade

v. Holford, Bull. N. P. 110; England v. Slade, 4 T. R. 682. And the court, under the circumstances, ought to presume the conveyance from Nicholson. Hillary v. Waller, 12 Ves. 239; Ricard v. Williams, 7 Wheat. 109. At all events, seeing that Edwards took possession of the land upon his purchase from Andrew Van Bibber, in 1797; that he and his heirs have ever since held and enjoyed it, "undisturbed; and that they never complained of defect of title, or offered to abandon the contract, or claimed to rescind it on that account, till they filed their answers in this suit; under such circumstances, they could not, with any colour of justice, at this late day, claim that the contract of their ancestor should be rescinded; and the chancellor was right in compelling them to accept a deed with general warranty from the heirs of Van Bibber.

4. It was objected, that the escheat was an insuperable bar to the specific execution decreed by the chancellor. That proceeding was, on the face of it, fair and regular: it established, that Nicholson died seised of the land, without heirs, and without having conveyed it away in his life-time: it vested the title in the commonwealth: it stands unimpeached: there is not only no proof, but there is no charge, of any collusion between the escheator and the heirs of Edwards.

It was answered, that the proceeding of the escheator, was procured by the heirs of Edwards themselves, and consummated by their connivance, in order to disappoint the apprehended decree for a specific execution of the contract of their father. The land had been held in undisturbed possession, by the Van Bibbers and by Edwards and his heirs, from July 1779 to January 1824, when the chancellor made a decree, which though afterwards set aside, sufficiently evinced his opinion on the merits, that the balance of the purchase money ought to be paid to the Van Bibbers. Then, for the first time, the escheator of King William discovered, that the land in question had been conveyed to Nicholson in 1778, that no conveyance of it by him was to be found on record, that he was dead without any known heirs: in short, he discovered all the facts unfavourable to the title, but none of those favourable to it, which the previous proceedings in this cause disclosed. From whom did he, at that critical period, derive the information on which he proceeded? From whom but the heirs of Edwards, whose interest alone it was that he should proceed? The escheator made his inquisition in the county in which they reside; they were in actual possession; they took no pains to shew the long possession of themselves and those under whom they claimed, and the payment of public taxes for near half a century; they made no resistance to the proceeding while it was pending, no effort to avoid it afterwards; they gave no notice of it to the Van Bibbers, made no call on them to defend the title. Res ipsa loquitur: the proceeding of the escheator was commenced and consummated by the procurement and collusion of the appellants themselves; and if any inconvenience result from it, they ought to bear it. But there was, in truth, no reason to apprehend any serious effect from this escheat.

5. The counsel for the appellants insisted, that if, under the circumstances of the case, it was right to decree a specific execution of the contract, the principal only of the purchase money yet remaining due, without interest, ought to have been decreed. The purchaser was in no default. He was not bound to pay the balance of the purchase money, till a conveyance of the title was made or tendered to him; it was the fault of the vendor, that no conveyance was made, or rather the vendor had no title to convey; nor does it appear that he ever offered to make a conveyance.

The counsel for the appellees said, that the purchaser and his heirs have enjoyed the profits of the land, and of the purchase money too; and they cited Sugd. c. 10, § 1, p. 353, 4, and Selden v. James, 6 Rand. 465.

CARR, J. The question is, whether, under all the circumstances of the case, it will be most conducive to justice, to execute or to rescind the contract between Andrew Van Bibber and Edwards?

It is insisted by the appellants, that we ought not 'to force upon them a purchase of land, to which they cannot get a perfect title. This might have been a very different question, if the vendee, who by the contract was to get a title on making the last payment, had, when that payment fell due or soon after, tendered it, and demanded his title: a bill to rescind, then, would in all probability (if the title proved 'materially defective) have been successful, though possession had been taken. But he and his heirs have held the land above thirty years; they made no effort to perfect their title or to rescind the contract; and it is only now, when pressed by the other side, that they resort to it as a defence. If, under such circumstances, they can be made reasonably secure in the title, justice seems to say, that they ought to be compelled to take it, and pay the residue of the purchase money. It appears, that Nicholson acquired the land in question, by conveyance from the Johnsons, in 1778, upwards of fifty years ago; that on 15th September 1779, Abraham Van Bibber had bought of Nicholson and fully paid for the land, and by the terms of the contract, had a perfect right to a deed; and that he was, in 1779, put into possession, which has, by him and those claiming under him, been held uninterruptedly to the present time, a period wanting but a few months of fifty years. In this state of things, it was strongly contended, that the court ought to presume that a deed had been made by Nicholson to Van Bibber: for, as Van Bibber was not bound to pay till a title was made, nor had Nicholson a right to call for payment till he made a conveyance; as Nicholson had a clear legal title, and there were no impediments to his conveying; as it was his duty to convey, and Van Bibber's interest to insist on a deed; and as Van Bibber's possession had been uninterrupted ever since; the necessary conclusion is, that a deed was made when the last payment was made, which by time or accident has since been destroyed. And this conclusion, it was insisted, rested upon the presumption, that Nicholson, who after the money paid was but a mere trustee, had done what he was bound to do; and also upon that more general ground of presumption, that, from the infirmity of our nature, and the difficulty of retaining or producing evidence of ancient transaction, it has been found convenient and necessary, for the preservation of property and rights, to have recourse to some general principle, to take place of individual and specific belief. There is, to my 194 understanding, *much weight in these considerations: but I shall not decide, whether in this case we ought to presume a deed. (The doctrine on this subject, is well treated of in the following cases: Hillary v. Waller, 12 Ves. 239; Prevost v. Gratz, 6 Wheat. 481; Cowp. 102, 217; 7 Wheat. 109; 8 East. 467; 3 Stark. Ev. part IV. 1200, 1228.*) The question with us, is, whether upon all the facts, it will be just and equitable to decree, that the appellants shall accept a deed with general warranty, from the heirs of Andrew Van Bibber, and pay up the residue of the purchase money?

I am clearly of that opinion, unless the escheat shall be found to present a difficulty. There is something in this proceeding, which I find it difficult to account for, on fair principles. This suit, in which the rights of the parties are set out, had been pending before the court three years, when the inquest was taken; and whatever might be the conclusion as to the legal title, it was most manifest, that Nicholson more than forty years before had sold the land, and received full payment; most clear also, that the Van Bibbers, and those holding under them, had been in possession, as purchasers for value, and as such had paid taxes to the commonwealth upwards of forty years. This, we all know, was a full answer to any claim the commonwealth could make. And yet, in the face of all this, an inquest was found, escheating this land to the commonwealth for defect of heirs of Nicholson. The jury was sworn to inquire, what lands Nicholson died seised of, and whether he left any heir, or made any disposition of the lands in his life-time; and they found that he died without heir, and made no disposition of this land. Why did not the appellants, by traverse, monstrans de droit, or petition of right, contest this finding? The answer cannot be doubted: they wished it to succeed, supposing that it would strengthen their case for a rescission of the contract. As to the escheator, it is charitable to suppose, that he has acted from misguided zeal to 195 be doing *something in his office. It is most clear to me that this proceeding ought not to present the slightest obstacle to the decree of the court.

The decree, however, is a personal one against the heirs of Edwards the vendee, and so far erroneous. It must, therefore, be reversed, and a decree entered, that unless the money be paid in six months the land be sold; and, in addition, that the commonwealth and her officers be perpetually enjoined from taking any proceeding on the escheat.

The other judges concurred. The decree was reversed with costs, for the errors mentioned by judge Carr, but approved in all other respects.

Ambler and Others v. D. Warwick & Co.

(Absent COALTER, J.)

Deeds of Trust—Remedy of Creditor Where Debtor Sells Property Conveyed—Case at Bar.—M. by deed of trust conveyed (inter alia) 20 slaves to a trustee, to secure a debt due to W. & Co. payable twelve months after date of the deed: Within the year, M. sold one of the slaves to A. two to B. one to C. and one to R. who alleged that M. sold at request and by authority of W. & Co. When the debt fell due, all the rest of trust subject was sold, and the proceeds fell far short of the debt due W. & Co. W. & Co. brought suit in chancery against M. the purchasers of the five slaves, and the trustee: denying M.'s authority to sell the five slaves: praying a foreclosure of the equity of redemption thereof and that the purchasers be decreed to deliver them up to be sold under the deed of trust. HELD, that though W. & Co. might have brought actions at law in the trustee's name, to recover the slaves of the respective purchasers, yet their case was properly relievable in equity.

The house of D. Warwick & Co. and D. Warwick individually, exhibited their bill in the superior court of chancery of Richmond, against Ambler, Robertson, Burton, Chilton, Winfree, Morris in his own right, and Morris & Mitchell, merchants and partners, setting forth this case:

196 *On the 12th November 1818, Warwick & Co. having made advances to Morris & Mitchell, to the amount of 8847 dollars, and agreeing to make farther advances to them, to an amount not exceeding 12000 dollars more, upon a stipulated security for re-payment of the sums so advanced and to be advanced, Morris executed a deed, dated the same day, conveying to Winfree, four tracts of land in Campbell, a lot in Lynchburg, and twenty slaves, upon trust, that if Morris & Mitchell should fail, on or before the 12th November 1819, to reimburse to Warwick & Co. all the money advanced, or to be advanced to them, in pursuance of the arrangement, the trustee should then, at the request of either party, proceed to sell the trust subject for cash, to satisfy the debt. Warwick & Co. made the additional advances to Morris & Mitchell, as they had agreed to do; and on the 12th November 1819, Morris & Mitchell were indebted to them, on that account, 19352 dollars, with some arrears of interest. Warwick & Co. thereupon, required the trustee, Winfree, to make sale of the trust subject, under the deed of trust; and he, accordingly, in December 1819, sold all of it (except five slaves) and D. Warwick was the purchaser. The net proceeds of the sales, amounted only to 11924 dollars, leaving a balance of 7428 dollars due Warwick & Co. D. Warwick accounted with the house of Warwick & Co. for the above sum of 11924 dollars, upon this understanding, that if the title of any part of the property he had bought at the trustee's sale, should fail, his partners should make restitution to him of the value of the property he should thus lose. No conveyance of the property bought by D. Warwick at the trustee's sale, had as yet been executed by the trustee; and it was doubtful whether it could properly be executed; Morris having hinted objections to the sale, sometimes denying the amount of the debt claimed by Warwick & Co. and insisting that their claim, if fairly liquidated, did not amount to as much as 11924 dollars, and sometimes questioning the regularity of the sale, as not having conformed with the provisions of the deed of trust; and,

197 therefore, *Winfree, the trustee, was reluctant to complete the execution of his trust, by conveying the subject to the purchaser, without the sanction of a court of equity. And thus the accounts between Warwick & Co. and Morris & Mitchell, remained to be adjusted, and the accounts between D. Warwick and Warwick & Co. in the actual state of things, could not be adjusted. As to the five slaves, not sold at the trustee's sale; they were in Morris's possession, and were his property, at the time he executed the deed of trust; but, at the date of the trustee's sale, one of them was in the possession of Ambler; one, in the possession of Robertson; and two, in the possession of Burton; and one, in the possession of Chilton: these slaves had been demanded by the trustee, of the respective holders of them, and they had refused to deliver them; sometimes pretending they purchased the property of Morris, (who had no right to sell them); and sometimes, that Warwick & Co. had no just claim on Morris & Mitchell, which the sale of these slaves was necessary to satisfy. Winfree, the trustee, who alone could maintain actions at law for the slaves, declined to bring such actions or meddle in the controversy. Morris and Mitchell were insolvent; and the slaves in question was the only subject, out of which Warwick & Co. could hope farther satisfaction of the balance due them. The bill, therefore, prayed, that Morris might disclose the particulars of the titles of the property he had mortgaged by the deed of trust, and which had been sold by the trustee, in order that the same might be examined and ascertained; that the accounts between Warwick & Co. and Morris & Mitchell (if the latter denied the balance claimed by the former, or if the proofs which should be adduced should not shew satisfactorily the true state of them) might be settled before a commissioner; that the sale made by the trustee might be confirmed, and he decreed to convey the property by him sold, to D. Warwick, the purchaser; that Ambler, Robertson, Burton and Chilton might, respectively, disclose the particulars of their claim to the slaves they held; when, how, from whom,

198 they acquired *possession of them, and if they purchased them, the prices they paid; render an account of the profits of them; be decreed to deliver them to the trustee, or to the proper officer of the court, to be sold under the deed of trust, and the proceeds applied to the debt thereby secured; and general relief.

Ambler, Robertson, Burton and Chilton, in their answers, stated, that they purchased the slaves, by them respectively held, of Robert Morris, early in the year 1819, and set forth the prices they gave for them: they alleged, that Morris was authorised and requested by Warwick & Co. to make sale of these slaves, and to remit the proceeds of sales to them; and that Morris did accordingly remit all the proceeds of the sales to them. And Chilton said, that he knew nothing of the state of accounts, between Warwick & Co. and Morris & Mitchell; and, so far as his rights were affected, he required full proof on that head.

Morris, in his answer, also affirmed, that Warwick & Co. authorised and requested him to make the sales of the slaves which he had sold, and to remit the proceeds of such sales to them; and that they were so remitted. He declared, that he never denied the justice of the debt claimed by Warwick & Co. or questioned the regularity of the sale, made by the trustee, Winfree; and as to the title of the property conveyed by the deed of trust, and sold by the trustee to D. Warwick, he said, the title papers were on record, and any one might procure copies of them who would pay the cost.

The trustee, Winfree, and the house of Morris & Mitchell, did not answer: as to them, the bill was taken pro confesso.

The trustee, Winfree, was examined as a witness. He did not say, and he was not asked, whether he declined (as is stated in the bill) to bring suits at law, or to allow such suits to be brought in his name, to recover the slaves held by Ambler, Robertson, Burton and Chilton.

199 *The chancellor's decree, (inter alia) directed Ambler, Robertson, Burton and Chilton, to deliver to the marshal of the court, the slaves which they had respectively bought of Morris, to be sold to satisfy the debt secured by the deed of trust to Warwick & Co. and to render accounts of the profits thereof. And those defendants appealed to this court.

The question, on the merits, was, Whether, in fact, Warwick & Co. authorised Morris to make sale of the five slaves which he sold to Ambler, Robertson, Burton and Chilton, and to remit the proceeds of sales to them, and whether Morris made such remittance? And upon this question of fact, there was a good deal of evidence; and it was earnestly argued by counsel. But the only question of law in the cause, was a question of jurisdiction: Whether this was a case properly relievable in equity?

Nicholas and Johnson for the appellants. The real object of the bill was, to try the title of the appellants to the slaves they had respectively purchased: and, obviously, the counsel, who drew the bill, felt the difficulty of the question of jurisdiction; and to sustain the jurisdiction of the court, carefully and skilfully introduced a variety of allegations, on subjects never controverted, and not material to the question of title in the appellants. The claim of the appellants is purely legal, and adversary, not merely to the equitable claim of Warwick & Co. but to the legal claim of their trustee: they claim several titles, by several purchases, each holding an adversary possession, the right whereof might and ought to have been tried in an action of detinue against each, in his own county. It was oppressive, to drag the appellants from distant parts of the state, into an inconvenient and expensive forum.

As to the refusal of the trustee to bring actions at law, there is no proof, and indeed, no attempt to prove, that he did refuse: he does not say so, in his deposition, and no question was asked him about it: nor was the taking of the *bill pro confesso as to him, an admission of the fact, so far as the other parties were concerned. And if he had refused, Warwick & Co. would have been justified in using his name in actions at law; or he would have been compelled, by a court of equity, to bring the actions.

There is no analogy between this case, and that of a mortgagee, who, seeking to foreclose, brings before the court the mortgagor and the purchasers of the equity of redemption; because, though the mortgagee have the legal title, and may recover in ejectment, that recovery will only be the foundation of a suit in equity to redeem. The mortgagee can never sell without the aid of a court of equity. His claim is substantially a claim for money, and can be asserted no where but in equity. So, the claim of the mortgagor and of those who purchase the equity of redemption is purely equitable. The matters in controversy, therefore, between the mortgagor, or those claiming the equity of redemption, and the mortgagee, can only be finally settled in a court of equity. But, in the case at bar, the whole question between Warwick & Co. and the purchasers of the slaves, might have been settled, without going into equity. The suits at law would have decided, whether the trustee, or the purchasers, were entitled to the slaves; if the purchasers, there was an end of the controversy; if the trustee, then he might have proceeded to sell, without the aid of the court of equity. The bare possibility that the purchasers might have gone into a court of equity to redeem, could not justify Warwick & Co. in going there, by anticipation, especially in a case where the purchasers never claimed an equity of redemption, and where it is manifest, that the value of all the slaves was not equal to one third of the remaining debt.

This is not a case, in which the court can take jurisdiction to prevent multiplicity of suits. For, though the title of Warwick & Co. to all the slaves be derived under one deed, yet the titles of the purchasers are derived under several purchases, and each depends in some degree on its own circumstances.

201 *And Johnson cited Bowyer v. Creigh, 3 Rand. 25; Randolph v. Kenney, Id. 394, and Stuart's heirs v. Coalter, 4 Rand. 74, as directly in point, and decisive of the question.

Stanard, for appellees. There are several grounds on which the jurisdiction of the court may be maintained.

The rights of Warwick & Co. were merely equitable; and, certainly, they could not, directly and in their own names, have asserted those rights any where but in equity. Creditors, claiming under a deed of trust conveying property to a trustee to secure debt, are so closely assimilated to creditors claiming under a mortgage, as to afford no just ground of discrimination as to their remedies. Their rights, to every substantial purpose, are exactly the same. The intervention of the trustee, indeed, exempts the creditor, in ordinary cases, from the necessity of asking the chancellor's aid; but it does not deprive him of the right to ask such aid, if convenience dictate, or if his interest require, that course. The creditor secured by deed of trust, ought to be allowed to treat his security as a mere mortgage, if he will: no party, howsoever concerned, can be injured by his so treating it. There is no reason to apprehend, that such a cestui que trust will ever, unnecessarily and wantonly, incur the expense and delay of a suit in chancery: if he should do so, the chancellor has it in his discretion to refuse him costs. And surely, they who purchase the subject pledged by a deed of trust, from the grantor, purchase only an equity of redemption; an interest, of which equity alone can examine and determine the right and the extent, secure the enjoyment of it, or take it away, in whole or in part, according to circumstances. Had Ambler and the other purchasers from Morris, exhibited, against Warwick & Co. and their trustee, a bill to redeem, equity would doubtless have entertained that bill; and the converse of the proposition seems undeniable, that the bill exhibited by Warwick & Co. against them, to foreclose, ought to be entertained; the bill of the one to foreclose, and of the other 202 to redeem, *properly presenting the same matters for adjudication, and matters peculiarly of equitable cognizance.

Warwick & Co. allege, in their bill, that Winfree, the trustee, declined to bring suits at law for the slaves in question; and the fact was not controverted by any of the defendants. Upon this ground, Warwick & Co. had a right to go into a court of equity, and claim, directly for themselves, their right to satisfaction out of the trust subject.

But, if the legal title of the subject had been vested in Warwick & Co. (as it would have been, had their security been, in its form, a mortgage instead of a deed of trust); or, if the trustee had been ready to bring suits at law; or, if Warwick & Co. might, without his consent, have brought such suits, in his name; still they had a right to resort at once directly to a court of equity. They were incumbrancers, whose recovery of the subject in actions at law, would have left them exposed to the equities of the other parties, and to their suits in chancery to assert those equities. Their rights depended essentially on the state of their accounts with Morris & Mitchell, which the defendants, each and all, had a right to have examined and settled, and without the settlement of which their rights could not be concluded: no admission of Morris & Mitchell, as to the state of the accounts, could have bound the defendants who had purchased the slaves from Morris. And Warwick & Co. had a right to have the proceedings of the trustee under the deed of trust, fortified by permanent evidence of the regularity of them; to have those proceedings, if regular, confirmed by the chancellor; and thus to avoid the hazard of trusting to fugitive and precarious evidence of acts in pais, essential to the regularity of the proceedings, and the validity of the title acquired under them.

Warwick & Co.'s resort to a court of equity, was proper, especially as against the appellants, to avoid circuity and multiplicity of suits. If they had resorted to the courts of law, they must have instituted, in the trustee's name, four several actions of detinue or trover, against the four purchasers, 203 *Ambler, Robertson, Burton and Chilton. In those actions, the defense now set up in equity, by the purchasers of the slaves, (for they all take exactly the same ground,) could not have availed them: I apprehend it is quite clear, that they could not, in the actions at law, have resisted the legal title of the trustee, on the ground, that the grantor had sold the slaves to them, at the request and by authority of the cestuis que trust. The recovery at law would have been as certain, as it would have been merely formal. And, then, each of the purchasers must either have abandoned his claim, or have exhibited his separate bill in equity, alleging his purchase from Morris, with all its circumstances, praying an examination thereof, and the protection of his equitable rights against the trustee's judgment at law. The purchasers, might, too, in these bills, each, severally, have claimed to redeem that part of the trust subject which they had bought : and to that end, they might, each, have contested the justice or the amount of Warwick & Co.'s claim against Morris & Mitchell ; they might, each, have contested the fairness or regularity of the trustee's sale; they might, each, have insisted on a fair settlement of accounts, whereby Morris & Mitchell's debt to Warwick & Co. might have been reduced, and on a re-sale of the trust subject which had been sold by the trustee, whereby the proceeds thereof might have been enhanced. Thus, after four suits at law, (which would have determined no real point in controversy, since the legal title of the trustee would not have been more certain after judgment than before), there would have been four suits in chancery ; and, in each of the latter, exactly the same matters would have been presented for examination and decision, which have been presented by the bill exhibited by Warwick & Co. and in each of those suits in chancery, too, all the parties whom Warwick & Co. have now convened before the court, might and ought regularly to be made parties. Warwick & Co. therefore, had a right to bring all parties, by one suit, into that forum to which each and every party, if he persisted in his claim, 204 must at last have *resorted, convening there every other party, in four suits at the least.

BROOKE, President. Several objections were made to the decree. The first, which meets us at the threshold of the cause, is the objection to the jurisdiction of the court : and, after a critical examination of the bill, I have not been able to perceive how it can be obviated.

Without inquiring, whether a foundation is well laid for the jurisdiction of the court, as regards the other defendants than the purchasers of the slaves (who alone have appealed from the decree), it may be remarked, that upon the evidence in the record, it appears to be merely colourable. The pretexts for the jurisdiction of the court, as regards the appellants, is still less to be countenanced.

One is, that the trustee declined suing at law ; that is, he was willing, that the appellees should proceed, either at law or in equity, as they should be advised. It is neither alleged in the bill, that he refused to sue at law, nor that he refused to permit the appellees to use his name. Such an allegation would have laid a better foundation for the jurisdiction of a court of equity, though it may be questioned, whether it would have been sufficient, as the appellees might have used the name of the trustee, and a court of law would not have permitted him to dismiss the suit, upon the plaintiffs' indemnifying him against all costs.

Another ground is, that this is a proper case for a court of equity, to prevent a multiplicity of suits. But this is not tenable. The case does not come within the principle, on which courts of equity take jurisdiction to prevent the multiplicity of suits at law : it does not rest upon a right, which is in common, objected to by many persons whose pretensions are in all respects similar, and in controverting which, the decision for or against any of them, must turn on the same evidence ; as in the case of an exclusive claim to fish in a particular water ; a claim affecting the pretensions of many who may controvert it. For, though the 205 appellants *are all purchasers from Morris, mediately or immediately, they are so under variant circumstances, and at different times : they hold possession of the slaves severally, independently of, and adversely to, the claim both of Morris and of the appellees under the deed of trust.

Nor can the case be likened to the case of mortgagor and mortgagee. The appellants holding adversely to the deed of trust, occupy an entirely different ground from that of a purchaser of mortgaged property. In the case of mortgagor and mortgagee, in whom ever the legal title and possession of the mortgaged subject may be, the equity of redemption in the mortgagor or his assignee, follows it, and can only be foreclosed in a court of equity. Not so in the case of a sale of property under a deed of trust, in pursuance of the deed. In such case, there remains no equity of redemption any where. But the claim of the appellants is not under but against the deed of trust : it is strictly legal, as is that of the trustee under the deed of trust ; and it ought only to be controverted in a court of law.

The suggestion, that the appellants after a decision at law against them, might come into a court of equity, and shew that, though the slaves purchased by them were subject to the deed of trust, yet that there was other property to satisfy the claim of the appellees, exclusive of the slaves so purchased, is not countenanced by the evidence in the record ; and, if it were, it would be no ground, on which to compel the appellants to relinquish their right to a trial by jury and viva voce testimony, and to submit to the delays and costs of a court of equity. Nor have they lost their right to controvert the claim of the appellees in a court of law, by failing to insist on it by plea or in their answers ; it being the settled rule of the court, that if it appear from the face of the bill, that the matter thereof is not proper for a court of equity, it should be dismissed, even after answer filed, and though there be no plea to the jurisdiction. Pollard v. Patterson, 3 Hen. & Munf. 67.

206 *In this opinion of the President, the other judges at first concurred; and an order was accordingly entered, reversing the decree as to the appellants, dismissing the bill as to them, for defect of jurisdiction, and remanding the cause as to the other defendants. But, afterwards, Stanard moved the court to correct the decree, by adding, 1. that the dismissal of the bill should be without prejudice to any actions at law, which should be brought to recover the slaves of the appellants, which Johnson agreed to; and 2. a provision inhibiting the appellants from pleading the act of limitations in bar of such actions at law (he cited Anon. 1 Vern. 73; 4 Bac. Abr. 481,) which Johnson earnestly resisted. And in the course of the conversation on this point, the court expressed its willingness to re-consider the question of jurisdiction, and directed another argument of that point. It was accordingly argued again, by the same counsel, more elaborately than before, but the general topics of argument, advanced and insisted on, by the counsel on both sides, were essentially the same. The judges then delivered their opinions seriatim:

CARR, J. My experience in courts, has convinced me, that much mischief is done, by stretching the jurisdiction of equity beyond its proper limits, to take in particular cases, which seem to address themselves to our feelings of compassion, or sense of justice. I have found too, that this jurisdiction will encroach, unless it be steadily watched; for, in our anxiety to attain exact justice in the case immediately before us, we are apt to overlook remoter consequences, and to forget, that no decision which conforms to settled rules, can do so much mischief, as one which, though it may seem to fit the special case, violates and unsettles fixed rules and principles. This being the bent of my mind, I am sometimes, no doubt, carried too far the other way, by my anxiety to avoid this mischief: and this, I incline to think, was the fact in the case before us.

207 *To the proposition, that the creditor has the same right to the aid of equity, to execute a deed of trust, as to foreclose a mortgage, I can by no means assent. They are both securities for money: but the law of the contract, by which the parties have agreed to be governed, is materially different. The mortgagee must come into equity; no other mode is given: but the cestui que trust has no such need. The parties have appointed a disinterested agent, who representing them both, is, in case of non-payment, empowered to act definitively on the subject; to sell the property, pay the debt, and return the excess to the debtor. His deed (if the proceeding has been fair) gives a perfect and irredeemable title to the purchaser. To hold, that, notwithstanding this contract, the creditor may, at will, and though no obstacle is raised to the execution by the trustee, draw the debtor into litigation, were to violate the agreement of the parties, and force a man to incur costs and charges, who is willing and anxious to comply with his undertaking, and deliver the property into the hands of the trustee. I cannot, therefore, on this ground, entertain the plaintiffs' bill.

I consider the case made by the bill (so far as relates to the appellants) to be substantially this: that Morris executed to the plaintiffs a deed of trust of these slaves (inter alia) and that the appellants have, since the date of that deed, acquired possession of the slaves, in some way, from Morris; and they are called on to say, how and when they acquired such possession. In answer, they state, that they purchased from Morris; give the particular dates of their purchases, which are after the execution of the deed; and put their defence on the ground, that Morris was authorised by the plaintiffs to sell the slaves, provided the proceeds were sent to them, and that they were so sent. If the bill had stated, that the defendants held the slaves by a claim paramount the deed of trust, I have no doubt it might have been demurred to: and, though not so stated by the bill, if it had appeared by plea or answer, that the defendants did not claim under Morris, but by adverse legal title, I think 208 it would have shewn a *case not proper for relief in equity. Of this kind was the case of Stuart v. Coalter. But it appears here, that the defendants all bought after Morris had executed the deed, and departed with the legal title. Of course, they acquired nothing but an equity; no title, which they could in any way vindicate at law. In the first argument, these features of the cause did not strike me; especially, that this is not a claim adverse to the title of Morris, but an equity derived from him, after the execution of the deed. In this aspect of the case, I incline to think the jurisdiction of equity may be sustained; particularly, when we consider the multiplicity of suits which will be saved by it; for if the plaintiffs be dismissed from this court, the trustee must bring four actions of detinue against the holders of the slaves, and each of these holders, may then file his bill against the other parties. Upon these grounds I am content to entertain the cause.

GREEN, J. Upon the first hearing of this cause, I concurred, without hesitation, in the opinion, that it did not present a fit case for the jurisdiction of a court of equity; principally upon the grounds, that the parties had, by their contract, provided the means by which the appellees might enforce their rights, without a resort to that tribunal; and that there was no circumstance in the case, which presented such an obstacle to the assertion of those rights in the stipulated mode, as to make such a resort necessary or proper, particularly as against the purchasers under Morris, as to whom they might, even if the trustee was unwilling, have proceeded in his name at law, or if not, could have coerced him in equity, to the performance of his trust, without making those purchasers parties.

The second argument upon the point of jurisdiction has changed my opinion. Although I am not prepared to say, that every creditor by deed of trust, has, like every mortgagee, a right, at his pleasure, to call his debtor into a court of equity, the latter being under a necessity to resort

 209 there *for the purpose of foreclosing the equity of redemption, and enforcing a sale, while the former, in general, is under no such necessity for the attainment of either of those objects; yet, I think, there are circumstances in this case, which support the jurisdiction. The deed of trust was made to secure a large debt then due, and farther advances stipulated to be made by the appellees to Morris & Mitchell. All the property (except the five slaves in question) had been sold by the trustee, and its proceeds exceeded considerably the debt due at the date of the deed, but left a large balance on the account including the subsequent advances; the amount of which had been adjusted between the appellees and Morris. The bill, after stating these facts, charges, that four of the slaves in question, were in the possession of Ambler, Burton, and Chilton, respectively, and that the other was obtained from Morris, by the defendant Robertson; that the plaintiffs are ignorant of the manner or terms, on which they acquired possession of the slaves, or the title under which they claim; but that Morris was possessed of and entitled to the slaves, when he conveyed them by the deed of trust, and that the rights of those defendants are subordinate to those of the plaintiffs. All of those defendants rely upon the same defence in one particular: admitting, that they claimed under sales made by Morris, after the date of the deed, and before the settlement of the accounts between Morris and the plaintiffs, they insist, that the sales were made by Morris under the authority of one of the plaintiffs, and that he had remitted the proceeds to them. I pass by the suggestion in the bill, of a doubt as to the possible invalidity of Morris's title to the property, sold and purchased by one of the plaintiffs, and the claim that, in such event, Morris & Mitchell would not be entitled to a credit for the amount of the sales, and thus the balance due to the plaintiffs would be increased: for the trustee sold only such title as was vested in him by the deed; and, consequently, the debtors are entitled to full credit for the amount of sales, whether the title was good or not. I pass by, also, the suggestion, 210 that the trustee declined *to sue at law for the recovery of the slaves. These suggestions, if well founded, afford no ground of jurisdiction against the purchasers from Morris. The other matter, is, I think, sufficient for that purpose.

The bill does not, indeed, expressly affirm, that the defendants, Ambler, Burton, Chilton and Robertson, claim under Morris, subsequent to the execution of the deed. If it had alleged, that they claimed paramount to Morris, that would of itself have put an end to the jurisdiction: or, if it had been totally silent as to the character of their claim, and they had demurred, it might have presented a doubtful question. But it virtually affirms, that they claimed title, (if they claimed any) under Morris, subsequent to the date of the deed, by alleging, that he possessed and was entitled to the slaves at that time. And it appears, from their answers, not only that such was really the character of their claims, but that they were of such a nature, that they could only be asserted in a court of equity, and also that they purchased under Morris, before the settlement of the accounts between him and the plaintiffs, which therefore (they say) did not bind them. The consequence of which is, that, if this bill was dismissed for want of jurisdiction, the plaintiffs would be driven to prosecute four several suits at law, in the name of the trustee, in which they would upon the matter in this record inevitably recover: and, then, each of the defendants claiming the slaves, would have a right to resort to a court of equity, to assert the equitable titles insisted on in their defence here, and also to call for a settlement of the accounts between the appellees and Morris & Mitchell, without being bound by the settlement already made between them. One of the defendants claims such a settlement in this cause: To prevent this multiplicity of suits, all depending upon the same facts, is, I think, a sufficient foundation for the jurisdiction of the court of chancery.

The only objection to this, is, that this ground of jurisdiction appears (in part) only from the answers; and that according to the former decisions of this court (*Pollard v. Patterson, 3 Hen. & Munf. 67), if the bill do not shew sufficient matter to sustain the jurisdiction, it is not saved by the provision of our statute, that "after answer filed, and no plea in abatement to the jurisdiction of the court, no exception for want of jurisdiction shall ever afterwards be made." 1 Rev. Code, ch. 66, § 86. This statute was certainly intended to strengthen the jurisdiction of the courts of chancery, so that, if a bill state a case fit for that jurisdiction, and the facts be not denied, but some other matter which would destroy the jurisdiction appear after answer, in the course of the proceedings in the cause, it shall not abate the bill. And, upon the fair construction of the act, I think it may be said, that, if the bill do not present a case for the jurisdiction of the court, and other matter appear in the progress of the cause, which supplies the defect, the defendant, not having demurred to the bill, cannot object to the jurisdiction at the hearing: as, if the bill was for an account, without shewing that the accounts were of such a character as to give jurisdiction, and that appeared from the answer or proof.

It was insisted, that to maintain the jurisdiction in this case, would be in opposition to some of the former decisions of this court; Stuart v. Coalter, Bowyer v. Creigh, and Randolph v. Kinney.

In the first of those cases, a party having an equitable title to an undivided part of a tract of land, in common with another who had a legal title to a part, filed a bill against several coterminous tenants, claiming adverse titles against the plaintiff, and those under whom he claimed, for the purpose of adjusting the boundaries, not in respect to one line only common to all, and depending upon the same evidence, but as to several depending upon different evidence. Here, all the parties claim under the same title, and their rights depend upon the same evidence. There, the defendants had legal rights which they could vindicate at law, and which they had a right to try there and there only. Here the defendants claim equitable rights, which cannot be discussed in a court of law.

212 *In Bowyer v. Creigh, also, the defendants claimed against the trustee and cestui que trust, and asserted a legal right against the deed, which they also were entitled to vindicate exclusively in a court of law. And, besides, the interference of a court of equity in such a case, would have counteracted the policy of the statute of frauds, and of the statute authorising a creditor to enforce the sale of property taken in execution of which the title is contested, by indemnifying the sheriff.

And, in Randolph v. Kinney, the plaintiff sought to reach parties upon the principle of substitution, through a long series, when the rights were intirely distinct, in a case in which there was no right of substitution whatever.

I do not see, that the principles of any of those cases have any application to that under consideration.

CABELL, J., concurred.

BROOKE, President. On the merits of this case, I concur in the decree, which has been agreed upon by my brother judges. But I am not satisfied, that there is error in the former opinion of the court on the point of jurisdiction. If it were admitted, that a proper foundation is laid in the bill, for the jurisdiction of the court, as against those defendants who have not appealed from the decree of the chancellor, it would not follow, that a proper ground is also laid for the jurisdiction, as regards the appellants. But, as that point has been argued, for the purpose (as was said) of laying a foundation for the jurisdiction as to the appellants also, I shall make some general remarks on it.

If (as was insisted) a deed of trust was, in all respects, as regards the jurisdiction of the court, nothing more than a mortgage, it would be admitted, that, in every case, resort might be had to a court of equity, to adjust the rights of the parties under it. But they are essentially different. A mortgage is only an equitable security for the payment of money; and the moment the property in it is forfeited to the mortgagee, 213 *by a failure to pay the money, and to comply with its terms, it exclusively belongs to equity, to relieve against it upon a bill to redeem, or to adjust the rights of the parties on a bill to foreclose. The mortgagor has an inherent equity in the contract itself, which it belongs to the court of equity, exclusively, to take cognizance of; an equity, which follows the mortgage in whosever hands it may be. But it is not so in the case of a deed of trust. That is a legal security for the payment of money &c. recognized as such by statute law. The property in it, is not liable to forfeiture, in any event, as in the case of a mortgage. There is nothing in it against conscience, to give a court of equity jurisdiction. The trustee may sell the property in it, and execute the trust confided to him by the parties to it; and having done so, in pursuance of the deed, there is nothing for a court of equity to act on. Neither the debtor nor the creditor can come into the court, on the contract in the deed alone, as in the case of the mortgage. If either come into the court, it must be on ground foreign to the deed. Each party has a right to insist on the execution of the trust by the trustee. Having the legal title to the property, under the deed, his remedy to get possession of it is adequate at law; or, on his declining to sue there, the cestui que trust may, in his name, recover the property at law, in order that it may be administered by the trustee, according to the terms of the deed.

Whether, independently of the deed of trust, a proper ground for the jurisdiction of the court, be alleged in the bill, as to those defendants who have not appealed, it is not necessary, for the reason before stated, to examine: the inquiry is, have the appellees stated in their bill, any ground of jurisdiction as against the appellants? As regards them, the appellees come into the court of equity, to assert their legal right under the deed of trust, to the slaves in their possession; that is, they come into the court of equity, to assert the legal rights of the trustee; which is the same thing, since they might 214 assert the legal right of the trustee*at law. There is nothing in the bill, which shews that the remedy at law was inadequate: for if it were admitted, that on the contract contained in the deed of trust, there is ground for the jurisdiction of the court of equity, as to the parties to it and those claiming under it, the appellants cannot be affected by it; they are strangers to the deed, had no notice of it, and do not claim under it. This is conceded in the admission, that if the appellees be not relieved in a court of equity, on their bill in this case, they will be barred by the act of limitations at law, unless there be a reservation in the decree.

The allegation in the bill, that the appellants purchased the slaves in question of Morris the debtor, and that he had possession of them and title to them when he executed the deed of trust, lays no foundation for the jurisdiction of a court of equity; as, if true, it might have been proved at law, as well as in equity. And if this be the only ground, a demurrer would have been fatal to the bill. The inference from these facts, that the appellants, after judgments at law against them would have an equity which they might assert in a court of equity, is not enough: it ought to have been directly charged in the bill, as the court will not take jurisdiction by inference. And if it were, the answer is, that such an equity is not under the deed of trust, but is founded on the general principles of the court, and might or might not be asserted, according to circumstances: it ought not to deprive the appellants of a trial at law on viva voce testimony: it ought to have no influence on the question of jurisdiction. Nor will the answers of the appellants help the case stated in the bill, though a part of the defence relied on, be only proper in a court of equity. The jurisdiction of the court depends on the character of the bill, and on the construction of the provision of the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 66, § 86. The construction of the statute has been given by this court in the case of Pollard v. Patterson. In that case, the jurisdiction was held to depend on the bill only; nothing was said of 215 the answers; and, *though Pollard, in his answer, virtually admitted the jurisdiction, by offering to substitute other seventy-five thousand acres of land, for the lands of the plaintiff, which he had sold to Morris by mistake, the court took no notice of the answer, and dismissed the bill for the want of jurisdiction.

The other ground taken in the argument, that the court will take jurisdiction to avoid a multiplicity of suits, I think more questionable. Though it is virtually alleged in the bill, that the appellants claim title to the slaves in question under Morris, by purchase subsequent to the execution of the deed of trust, that is no part of their title, but belongs to the pretensions of the appellees. Possession stands for the right, both at law and in equity, until a better right be shewn: so emphatically, indeed, that five years adversary possession of slaves will prevail over the right of the true owner, even though he again get possession. Property in slaves passes by delivery of possession only, except in the cases of deeds of gift, mortgages, deeds of trust and wills, under neither of which do the appellants claim. The possession of each of the appellants is foreign to the possession of the others: they have no common interest in any respect: the trial of the right of one, cannot affect the right of the others: not claiming under the deed of trust, they do not claim from one common source. Their case, then, does not fall within the principle, on which courts of equity take jurisdiction to avoid a multiplicity of suits.

Looking to the bill only, (as was done in the case of Pollard v. Patterson) there is nothing in it to warrant the jurisdiction of the court. In that case, Pollard, in his answer, offered an equitable compromise for the injury he had done the plaintiff, by selling his lands to Morris by mistake: but the court disregarded it. If the answer is to come in, before the question of jurisdiction arises, no demurrer to the bill can be sustained. To put the jurisdiction of the court, on the ground of a failure to demur to the bill before answer filed, were to abandon the correct construction of the 86th section of the chancery law, and to overrule the case of Pollard v. Patterson.

216 *I am still, therefore, of the opinion, that the bill ought to be dismissed as to the appellants, and the cause remanded as to the parties who have not appealed.

The majority of the court, sustaining the jurisdiction, proceeded to consider the proofs, touching the controverted questions of fact, and reversed the chancellor's decree upon the merits: dismissed the bill, as to the appellants, Ambler, Burton and Robertson: and remanded the cause to the court of chancery, as to the appellant Chilton, and the defendants who had not appealed from the decree; as to these, for further proceedings generally; and, as to Chilton, that an issue might be directed to ascertain the true state of his case, in one particular, which the proofs then in the cause left in doubt.

Such comparison of hand-writings is not proper evidence. Judgments—Reversal for Exclusion of Evidence—What Record Must Show.†—The judgment of a court shall not be reversed for excluding evidence, unless the case stated on the record shew the relevancy of the evidence excluded.

This case had been here before; when this court reversed a judgment of the circuit court of Frederick for the appellee against the appellant, and directed a new trial. See Gilm. 202. It was a suit brought by the administrator of Fanny Kile against the administratrix of John Rowt, upon an instrument bearing date January 3, 1807, signed and sealed by John Rowt, and attested by Robert Kile, Richard Stage, and William Rowt. The material plea was

217 non est factum. At the second trial, Rowt's adm'x filed a bill of exception to opinions of the circuit court; which stated,

1. That, after she had introduced witnesses for the purposes of proving, that the signatures of John Rowt and of the subscribing witnesses to the instrument in question were not genuine, and that Richard Rowt, a bastard son of John Rowt by Fanny Kile, and after her death (in 1813) one of her distributees, was capable of counterfeiting John Rowt's signature very exactly, and had been seen to write it so like his own signature, as not to be distinguishable from it, and was a man of infamous character; and after the plaintiff had introduced witnesses to prove that John Rowt's signature was genuine, some of whom had not seen him write more than once or twice, and that many years ago, and none of whom (as the defendant's counsel alleged, though the plaintiff's counsel denied this) were skilled in the knowledge of hand-writing: the defendant offered in evidence a book of accounts kept by John Rowt, which she proved to be in his hand-writing, and another paper proved to be in his hand-writing by a witness who saw him write it, in order that the jury might, by comparison of the hand-writing of these papers with that of the signature to the instrument in question, judge whether this was genuine or not. But the court would not suffer the book of accounts and paper so proved to be written by John Rowt, to be given in evidence to the jury; and told the jury, it was not permitted by the law, that a question of this kind should be determined by a comparison of hand-writing, and that such comparison the genuine signature of the party whose name is alleged to have been forged, it is inadmissible to give in evidence to the jury the genuine signature of such party, although written in the presence of the jury, that they may judge by comparing the same in whole or in part with any part of the alleged forged signature, whether the party who made the forged signature tried to imitate any part of the genuine signature of the party whose name is alleged to have been forged. was not proper evidence for it to act upon.

2. That the defendant offered in evidence the fragment of an old deed, proved to have been executed by Richard Staige (one of the subscribing witnesses to the instrument in question) for the purpose of proving, that he wrote his name Staig, without the final e; and the court permitted that paper to go in evidence to the jury, for that purpose; but told the jury, they ought not to compare the signature of Staige to that paper with his attestation of the instrument in

3. That the defendant offered to prove by a witness, "that after the first trial of the cause, the before-mentioned Richard Rowt, in conversation with the witness about it, said, his pen had not forgot to write:" but this testimony was objected to, and the court would not permit it to be given to the jury.

There was another verdict and judgment for Kile's adm'r, and Rowt's adm'r again appealed to this court.

Johnson, for the appellant. The first two exceptions present the same question. It seems to be the received doctrine, that evidence by comparison of hands, that is, comparison by the juxtaposition of two writings, in order thereby to ascertain whether both were written by the same person, is not admissible. Stark. Ev. part iv. 654-9; * 1 Phil. Ev. ch. 8, § 2, [428],† where all the cases are collected. Both those writers, while they state the rule, intimate, that its reasonableness has been doubted. And it will be found, that such evidence has not been rejected in any of the cases; and in one case at nisi prius, it was received by lord Kenyon. Allesbrook v. Roach, 1 Esp. Ca. 351. The question was argued at the bar, in Gardner v. Vidal, 6 Rand. 106, and Redford v. Peggy, Id. 316, but, in truth, it was not presented in either case. It may be considered as still open here. When a witness acquainted with the hand of a party, from having seen him write, testifies as to the genuineness of a particular writing attributed to him, he compares the writing in question with the image of the party's writing in his own mind, and his testimony is only the result of that comparison; and it makes no odds, how faint this mental image may be, from the unfrequency of the 219 impression, or *remoteness of time; there is no question, now, but such evidence is admissible. When the genuineness of an instrument is tried, by the comparison of it with known specimens of the party's writing, the writing in question is compared with what is more certain and exact than the strongest image on the mind of a witness; with the actual hand-writing of the party.

But if it be right, as a general rule, to exclude comparison of hands, it is not right to apply such a rule, inflexibly and universally. Exceptions have been allowed. In Roe v. Rawlings, 7 East, 282, note (a), where, from the antiquity of the writing, no living witness could have seen the party write, comparison of the writing in question, with documents known to be in his hand, was admitted. Bull. N. P. 236. The case before the court may well form another exception. The witnesses had testified, on the one side, that the writing was genuine; on the other, that it was not; and the paper was of some antiquity; it bore date in 1807. The direct evidence, thus hanging in balance, and the instrument being of such age, as to abate much from the confidence which the testimony on either side might challenge, a comparison of the writing in question with the proved specimens of the party's writing, was the best means of ascertaining the truth; and ought, therefore, to have been received.

The circuit court ought not to have excluded the evidence of Richard Rowt's remark, in conversation touching the former trial of the same question, that his pen had not forgot to write. It is quite obvious, that the real question was, whether that man had not forged the instrument; and it was in proof that he could imitate the obligor's signature with great exactness. It was this imputation, and this ground of it, which he most probably alluded to, when he said his pen had not forgot to write; and the remark might well be given in evidence, in aid of other proof, that he had forged the instrument. The evidence should have been admitted on the same principle, on which this court admitted evidence to impeach his general character; as forming

Leigh, for the appellee. The question before the jury, was, whether or no, a party's signature to a deed was genuine. There was direct testimony on both sides, of witnesses professing to be acquainted with his hand-writing; and their testimony was contradictory. Now, the only province of the jury was to decide which was the more worthy of credit; and that depended on the characters of the witnesses, their manner of testifying, their opportunities of becoming acquainted with the party's writing, their skill in judging of the genuineness of hand-writing. Instead of leaving it to the jury to weigh the evidence, it was proposed, that it should compare the signature to the deed in question, with the party's book of accounts and another paper, of the genuineness of which proof was adduced. Many men habitually sign their names in a peculiar hand, very different from their hand-writing in the body of papers written by them. Many men early adopt and persevere in a particular form of signature, while their general hand is constantly changing. The comparison proposed in this case, therefore, was likely enough to throw doubts upon the paper in question, while hardly any like comparison could have added to the proof of its genuineness. There is nothing, then, to induce a departure from the general rule, which rejects such evidence; the case rather exemplifies the propriety of the rule.

It is said, the specimens offered were proved: but they were proved by witnesses; and the weight of that proof could only be decided by the jury. Other specimens might have been offered on the other side, and multiplied without end: all must be proved, and the proof of each weighed by the jury. Thus, instead of trying the point in issue only, the genuineness of the writing in question, the jury would have had to try as many questions as there were specimens, and to perform the same duty in regard to 221 each specimen, *as they had to perform in regard to the principal writing; to judge which set of witnesses, all circumstances considered, was the more worthy of credit. To that, all such collateral questions, as well as the main question, must come at last.

Evidence by comparison of hands, must always lead to like consequences. The general rule which excludes it, is dictated by convenience, almost by necessity. And, on close examination, the rule will appear to have its foundation laid in the very nature of jury trial. Each and every juror ought to have exactly the same evidence before him to inform his judgment: and all have the same materials before them, to estimate the weight of oral testimony as to the genuineness of a paper in question: but all cannot have equal means of judging of its genuineness by comparison of hands; for there is nothing, in which peculiar skill is more the effect of particular practice and habit; and, thus, comparison of hands may communicate knowledge to one juror, which it cannot communicate to another.

As to the exclusion of the evidence of Richard Rowl's remark, that his pen had not forgot to write: it was not the conversation in which that remark was made, that was offered in evidence, but only that single detached expression. Without the context, its meaning was unintelligible; nor could the court judge of its relevancy. It could afford no proof; it could, at most, only raise vague and groundless suspicion. For, whatever was the meaning of the expression, as used by Richard Rowt, we may be quite sure, that he did not mean by it to avow the forgery of the instrument in question. If not the sense of guilt and shame, his interest and the fear of punishment would have prevented any such avowal.

CARR, J. The first point presented to and decided by the circuit court, was this simple and general proposition, Whether on the plea of non est factum, it be proper to submit to the jury, papers proved to 222 have been written by the *party whose hand-writing is in contest, that the jury, by a comparison of those papers with the instrument before it, may decide whether it be genuine or forged? It was indeed attempted in the argument here, to found some reliance on the antiquity of the paper; but that wholly fails; for the paper bears date January 3d 1807, and the suit was brought in 1815: and the decisions on this point, go no farther than that where the antiquity of the writing makes it impossible for any living witness to swear that he ever saw the party write, comparison with documents known to be in his hand-writing has been admitted.

In the case of Redford v. Peggy, the general question, whether evidence by comparison of hands be admissible, was not directly before the court; yet the very nature of that case seemed to bring the point under review; and it will be found, that out of the four judges who sat, two expressly say that such evidence is inadmissible, and the same conclusion may be fairly drawn from the opinion of a third. The writers on evidence, Peake, Phillips and Starkie, concur in saying, that though there has been formerly considerable diversity, it is now settled law, that evidence by comparison of hands is not admissible; and the cases they refer to support (I think) the position. It may be remarked, that what is now meant by comparison of hands, is not exactly what was formerly meant. The case of Algernon Sydney, and that of the seven bishops, shew the ancient meaning. By comparison is now meant the juxtaposition of two or more writings before the jury, that it may, from its own inspection and comparison of the paper in contest, with others admitted or proved to be genuine, decide the question. The cases collected by the writers before referred to, shew, that this is not permitted. There is also a case (Eagleton v. Kingston, 8 Ves. 438), in which lord Eldon discusses this question with much ability and learning. He says, "When I first came into the profession, the rule as to hand-writing in Westminster hall, in all the courts, was this: You called a witness, and asked him whether he had ever seen the party 223 *write. If he said he had, whether more or less frequently, if ever, that was enough to introduce the subsequent question, whether he believed the paper to be his hand-writing. If he answered, that he believed it to be so, that was evidence to go to the jury. If he refused to answer to his belief, he was pressed, perhaps too much, to form a belief: but if he would not go the length of belief, his evidence went for nothing. Or you might ask a witness, who had not seen him write for a length of time, if you could not get a witness of a subsequent date. You might call one who had not seen him write for twenty years; and if he said he believed it was the writing of the person, that evidence might go to the jury; but to be affected by all the rest of the evidence; as it is the nature of all evidence to be more or less convincing"—"This rule was laid down with so much clearness, that till very lately, I never heard of evidence in Westminster hall, of comparison of hand-writing by those who had never seen the party write; though such evidence had been frequently received in the ecclesiastical court." Lord Eldon then reviews the cases on the question of the admissibility of comparison of hand-writing, as evidence before a jury, and concludes with saying, that "the later cases appear to have brought back the law to the state in which it stood twenty-five years before;" namely, that comparison of hands is not evidence. His discussion of the rule seems to me very sensible and sound; and, I think, we had better suffer it to rest on the ground it now occupies, especially as it is said to work well in practice.

Then, as to the exclusion of the evidence of the remark of Richard Rowt, that his pen had not forgot to write: it is certain, the jury ought to have all the evidence which is relevant: of its weight it is to judge. But, when we are called on to reverse the decision of a judge, it is incumbent on the party seeking this, to shew that there is error; and to this end, he ought to present to us such a case as shews the relevancy of the evidence rejected. I cannot see it here. The issue was, whether John Rowt had executed 224 the deed, *which bears date in 1807.

Twelve or thirteen years after this, in a conversation about the cause, Richard Rowt, (no party) says, "my pen has not forgot to write." There is no ground laid connecting this with the issue; no conversation stated, which led to or followed the remark; nothing to shew how it could possibly bear on the case. I cannot think, that so light and trivial and unconnected a remark should induce us to send back a case, where there have been two trials, in both of which the jury has found the same way.

GREEN, J., concurred.

COALTER, J. As to the evidence offered by the appellant to prove, that after the last trial of this cause, Richard Rowt, in a conversation with the witness about it, said that his pen had not forgot to write; the rest of the conversation, if any was detailed, not being stated, so as to shew the relevancy or irrelevancy of that remark, I am unable to perceive why evidence of such a remark was offered, or indeed why it was objected to. Richard Rowt may have said many things, which, according to circumstances, or other expressions, might be either relevant or irrelevant; and if the latter, surely the court would not be bound to hear all of his irrelevant conversations and declarations. Indeed, I am not clear, that conversations of his tending to impugn his own character in this, or any other transaction, ought to be admitted, from the difficulty thrown thereby on the other party, to meet such particular matter, of which he could have no notice. But at present, it suffices to say, that no grounds are given, on which we can say, that the court erred in rejecting this evidence.

The other question, if it involved the whole doctrine of the proof of hand-writing, would be one concerning which the decisions, so far as I have examined them, are not, I think, very consistent with the general rules of evidence, or with each other, or with 225 the principles by which they profess *to be governed: nor, indeed, have I as yet been fully able to comprehend those principles.

The reason why a witness must see another write in order to form an opinion of the character of his hand-writing, is not, I apprehend, because seeing the party write gives you a knowledge of the character of his hand: he must see the hand-writing itself, after the act of writing is performed, in order to acquire that knowledge. But when he sees the manual operation himself, he knows that the hand-writing, which he at the same time or afterwards inspects, is the hand-writing of the party. He thus acquires a knowledge (more or less perfect, according to frequency and opportunity, and his skill in such matters) of a hand-writing, which he knows to be that of a certain individual; and having this knowledge within his mind, as he has of the human countenance, he compares with it a writing, alleged to be the act of the same individual but which he has not seen him write, in order to decide, whether it does or does not possess the same characteristic marks. This kind of evidence was formerly called comparison of hand-writing, in as much as it was, in fact, a comparison thus made in the mind of a witness, in contradistinction to his witnessing the manual operation itself.

But the character of a hand-writing, may be as well or even better known, by one who never saw another write, as by one who has. Cases of this kind occur in a course of a long correspondence, on business, between parties who never saw each other write. The perfect knowledge of hand-writing arises from frequently seeing the writing itself, not the manual operation, from which, without looking at the writing itself, you can form no opinion. Being accustomed to see the operation, is only full evidence, that the writing which you have thus seen, and the character of which is more or less distinctly impressed on your mind, according to circumstances, is the character of the manual writing of that individual. In the course of business and correspondence, you acquire an equally 226 perfect knowledge of the *hand-writing of the individual; you equally recognise it as an individual hand, which you can distinguish (as you can the human countenance) from any other hand, with as much certainty as you would the hand-writing of one you are accustomed to see write; and yet, if you should meet your correspondent in the street, you would not know him. But this writing may have been performed by the clerk of the person in whose name it is, and if so, you have no knowledge of the hand-writing of that person, though you have of that of his clerk: yet all the correspondence being in one hand, and it being usual for the party himself to carry it on, such witness has been admitted to prove the hand-writing to be his. This would be intirely defeated by proof that the letters were written by the clerk; and is weakened in proportion to any doubts that may exist, whether the party, whose hand-writing is to be proved, wrote the letters or not. As to the character of the hand itself, the proof is much stronger than that of a witness who has seen him write but seldom. The weight of all human testimony must depend on the credibility of the witness, and his opportunity of acquiring knowledge of the facts to which he deposes. Here, one witness has a better knowledge as to the character of the hand-writing; but whether it be the hand of him in whose name the writings are, he knows not; that is to be presumed or not, according to circumstances; and, so far, his evidence is weaker than that of him who has seen, though but in a few instances, the manual operation, from which he has derived a less perfect knowledge of the character of the hand. But, suppose the person who has received these letters, is not in being, or (like myself) is so bad a judge of the character of hand-writing, that he could hardly swear to his own, and this correspondence is placed in the hands of one skilled in this art, who thus becomes acquainted with the character of the hand-writing, will he not be equally or more competent to decide, whether the writing in controversy is by the same hand or not? And if he can thus acquire a knowledge of a hand-writing to-day, and may to-morrow, *compare it in his mind with the hand-writing in controversy, may he not, when examined as a witness, first inspect the one, so as to possess himself of the character of the hand, and then the other, so as to compare it in his mind with the knowledge so acquired, and say whether he think it the same or not? If he may, why may he not examine them together, by juxtaposition? If knowledge of the character of the hand-writing, so as to be able to form an opinion, whether certain writings are or are not written by the same hand that wrote the paper in controversy, may thus be acquired, perhaps with as much or more certainty than by distant comparisons in the mind; and if the legality or weight of the testimony depends on the knowledge of the witness; why may he not, in this way, qualify himself to depose, that the character of the hand-writing is or is not the same? Whether the first was written by the person charged with writing the last, he may not know, any more than he who received the letters or other writings: unless that be satisfactorily established, his evidence of course goes for nothing. It frequently happens, that one piece of evidence is good for nothing unless something else is proved. Thus, in the case of Burr v. Harper, 1 Holt's Ni. Pri. Rep. 420; 3 Com. Law Rep. 147, the witness testified, that he once saw the party sign his name, but the fact made so slight an impression on his mind, that, judging from that simple occurrence, he was unable to say whether the hand-writing to the agreement was the defendant's or not; yet he was permitted to compare the signature with the one which he had seen him sign, and on that comparison to give evidence that it was the party's hand-writing. If this was right, I presume there could have been no doubt, but that the defendant might have called witnesses to examine the same papers, and give their opinions that the hand-writing was not the same, and that the plaintiff might fortify his witness, by the examination of others agreeing with him. His evidence was nothing, though he saw the defendant sign the paper he produced: he had nothing in his mind to 228 compare *by, any more than other witnesses, who never saw him write, until he compared them: and why should he be more capable of making a correct juxtaposition comparison than they? Probably (as I should have been) he was less capable than many of the by-standers of forming a correct opinion. Other cases of a like kind are referred to in the notes of the late editor of Phillips's law of evidence, which tend to shew, that the doctrine on this subject is not yet fully settled. The legislature of Massachusetts is said to have settled it there, in favour of comparison, by express enactment. Phillips lays down the general doctrine to be, that the proof of the hand-writing is founded on the knowledge of the general character. The witness is supposed to have found a standard in his own mind, and with that standard to compare the writing in question. But, he says, no other kind of comparison will be allowed: that it is an established rule of evidence, that hand-writing cannot be proved by comparing the paper in dispute, with any other papers acknowledged to be genuine; that one reason usually assigned is, that unless a jury can read, they would be unable to institute a comparison, or judge of the supposed resemblance, (a reason, he thinks, too narrow for a rule of such general application); that another reason is, that the writings intended as specimens, would be presented by a party interested to select such writings only as may suit his purpose, and not likely to exhibit a fair specimen of the character of the hand-writing. He adds, that it has been thought by some, an inconsistency in the rules of evidence, to allow a witness to compare, in his mind, the disputed paper with the impression which a short and transient view of writings may have made upon his memory; and yet, on the other hand, not to permit the jury to compare it with writings proved to be authentic, present in court, and open for inspection: and, he says, the only answer which occurs, is that suggested, namely, that the writings which are produced as specimens, having been selected by an interested party, to serve a present purpose, are open to suspicion, and liable 229 to the imputation *of contrivance.

The comparison here spoken of, is evidently one to be made by the jury themselves, not by witnesses examining the papers, either separately or in juxtaposition, in the manner I have above supposed. These may be very different questions. And as the first, viz. a comparison to be made by the jury themselves, is the question presented by this record; and as, from the hasty examination I have given it, I am not prepared to decide on the other; I must be considered as confining myself to the precise question, presented by this case. And, I think, there may be reasons to support the opinion and judgment of the circuit court, which might not apply to the other proposition above stated, and which will enable us to leave that point open and undecided, until it shall come fairly before us. With due deference, I think that mentioned by Phillips, a very strong reason, why the jury should not enter into the comparison. Those of them who cannot write, would have no evidence before them of which they could judge; for the opinions of their fellow jurors, they not being on oath, would not be evidence for them to act on; they must, consequently, decide on a part of the evidence, the testimony of witnesses to the hand-writing, if any; and so may be unable to unite in the verdict with the others. Other jurors, though able to write their names, and perhaps to read plain writing, may be so unskilled in the art, as not to be competent witnesses, or entitled to any weight were they examined, touching the character of a hand writing. The result would be, that the jurors, capable of forming an opinion of the hand-writing, must each severally for himself examine the writings, and then be sworn and examined as witnesses; for a juror or jurors, possessing a knowledge of a matter of fact pertinent to the issue, cannot impart that knowledge to his fellow jurors, so as to weigh with them, except on oath, and an examination in court in presence of the parties. A juror, for instance, has seen the party write, and has a knowledge more or less perfect, of the character of his individual hand: he compares the paper in question in his mind, with this *knowledge, and thinks it is, or is not the same: but he cannot give this in evidence to his fellows, except on oath as aforesaid. So here, he examines the specimens, and fixes in his mind the character of the hand-writing of the person who wrote them, and then compares that with the paper in controversy, and comes to a conclusion, one way or another; another examines also, and comes to a contrary conclusion: how are they to impart this knowledge to their fellows? One may yield his opinion to the other, believing him to be a better judge, and thus, in reality, they give evidence to each other not on oath. The specimens are not evidence, properly so called; they decide nothing; it is the result of the comparison, that is the evidence; and that depends for its weight on the superior knowledge, skill or veracity of some jurors over others. The motion to the court here, was not that such of the jurors, or by-standers who were skilled in writing and judges of the character of hands, should examine the specimens, and give evidence of the result of that examination (concerning which I mean to give no opinion), but to give the specimens as evidence to the jury for it to weigh in its retirement. This motion, I think, was properly overruled; and, consequently, that the judgment should be affirmed.

The other judges concurred in the opinion, that the judgment should be affirmed.

After this, on the 27th August 1800, Sims, being in embarrassed circumstances, conveyed this land, among other property, to John and Peter Wise, trustees, for the benefit of his creditors, with a provision, that any of his creditors might elect to take any parcel of the trust subject, at the valuation contained in a schedule attached to the deed, in satisfaction of their claims. This deed conveyed the trust subject to the trustees and 232 their heirs, but it only authorised *the trustees personally to act in disposing of the subject; and it made provision only for Sims's debts contracted for his own use and benefit. Sims became insolvent, and not long after died insolvent. The appellee was a creditor of Sims, and elected to take this tract of 100,000 acres of land in Randolph, in satisfaction of the debt due him; and, thereupon, the heirs of John Wise, the surviving trustee, conveyed the same to him, by deed dated September 25th 1821. That Morgan, who died in 1802, by his will gave all the residuum of his estate to his daughter, Mrs. Neville wife of Pressley Neville of the state of Ohio; and she, after her husband's death, by deed dated November 4th 1823, conveyed the legal estate of the land in Randolph, to the appellee, and revoked as far as she could, a previous conveyance of her right in the land, made by her husband and herself, in 1818, to the agents of Peter Allen and others. The appellee found Peter Allen and others in possession of the land, claiming title, 1. Under the conveyance of Neville and wife; and 2. Under a sale of the land to them, on the 27th December 1802, by the collector of the U. States' direct tax, for the amount of tax due thereon, and a conveyance of the marshal of the district of Virginia, in consequence of that sale, dated December 11th 1805. As to the conveyance of Neville and wife to the agents of Allen and others, it was accompanied by an agreement, on their part, executed at the same time with the conveyance, that if and when they should use the deed of Neville and wife, to defend their title to the land, they should his claim for relief against the parties not before the court, but leave should be given to amend, the principal case is cited in Kincheloe v. Kincheloe, 11 Leigh 406 (see note).

Same—Order for Account.—The principal case is cited in foot-note to Watkins v. Young, 31 Gratt. 84; Bank v. Parsons, 42 W. Va. 144, 24 S. E. Rep. 556.

pay Neville and wife, a consideration equivalent to the advantage the deed should thus give them, to be fixed by arbitrators; and if they should never make such use of the deed, they should re-convey to Neville and wife: and Mrs. Neville, being informed that her father had sold the land to Sims, gave notice to Allen and others, that she considered the conveyance made by her husband and her to them, in 1818, null and void; and that she had therefore, so far as it lay in her power, conveyed the legal title to the plaintiff claiming *the equitable title under Sims. And, as the sale of the lands for U. States' taxes, it was irregular, illegal and void; and, moreover, the land was sold as the property of Tidball, the original locator, instead of Morgan, the grantee, or his heirs. The bill made Peter Allen and others, tenants in possession of the land, and their agents, who had obtained the conveyance from Mr. Neville, and Mrs. Neville, defendants; and prayed that the defendants might be decreed to release the legal title of the land to the plaintiff, and account for rents and profits; and general relief.

Peter Allen and others, the tenants in possession, answered, that in 1795 several persons residing in New England formed themselves into a company for the purchase and settlement of lands in Randolph county, and obtained a grant of 100,000 acres there, by patent dated November 17th 1796, and under this New England company, the defendants claimed. In 1798, one Peebles, himself a member of the company, and agent for the rest, entered into possession of the 100,000 acre tract, and began to clear and build upon it; others shortly after followed; and the New England company, and others claiming under them, have continued to hold the possession ever since, making settlements and improvements, paying all public dues, and defending the lands against conflicting claims; and so incurring great expense. The New England company soon discovered, that their survey of 100,000 acres, interfered with the survey of 100,000 acres, then called Tidball's, it not being known, that this tract had been granted to Morgan. The tract included in Tidball's survey and Morgan's patent, was assessed for the direct tax of the U. States, as the property of Tidball; the tax was not paid; the land was advertised for sale by the collector; and the New England company, finding a part of the land, which they claimed and had settled, thus offered for sale as Tidball's, bought 95,000 acres of his survey, paid the price, and on the 11th December 1805, received from the marshal a conveyance thereof, in pursuance of the laws of the U. States. That by the laws

234 *of the U. States, the selling of the land as Tidball's, when it was not his property in fact, did not at all affect the regularity of the sale. That the New England company then brought a suit in chancery, to perpetuate the evidence of the regularity of the collector's sale; pending which they heard, for the first time, that Tidball's survey had been assigned, and the land therein included, granted to Morgan; upon which, determined if possible to purchase peace, they procured a conveyance from Neville and wife, to whom the title of Morgan had, as they were informed, been devised; and thinking their title now secure, they ceased to prosecute their suit to perpetuate the evidence of the regularity of the collector's sale. Of Sims's claim, they had, at the time, no knowledge. They relied on the lapse of time, as a bar to inquiry into the regularity of the collector's sale for taxes: they called in question the fairness of Sims's deed of trust, under which the plaintiff claimed: they called for proof, that the plaintiff was a creditor of Sims: they denied his right, if a creditor, under Sims's deed of trust, to elect to take this land at a valuation, after the lapse of twenty-one years: they denied the right of Sims, or of the plaintiff claiming under him, to a specific execution of Morgan's alleged contract for the sale of the land to Sims, no written contract between Morgan and Sims being produced, and no evidence of the payment of the purchase money by Sims to Morgan: they relied on the act of limitations as a bar to the assertion of such an equity as that set up in the bill: and they denied the efficacy of Mrs. Neville's conveyance of the legal title to the plaintiff.

As against Mrs. Neville, the bill was regularly taken pro confesso.

The plaintiff exhibited the patent to general Morgan of March 9, 1796; a receipt of general Morgan to John B. Armistead, dated January 5, 1797, for 18,000 dollars in Morris and Nicholson's notes, in part payment of the price of the 100,000 acres of land in Randolph; Sims's deed of trust to John and Peter

Wise, trustees, for the benefit of his 235 *creditors, of August 27, 1800, and the schedule therein referred to, containing the valuation of the trust subject; the deed from the heirs of John Wise, the surviving trustee, to the plaintiff, of September 25, 1821; general Morgan's will proved in 1802, whereby his daughter Mrs. Neville is made his residuary devisee and legatee; Mrs. Neville's deed to the plaintiff, of November 4, 1823; the agreement between the agents of the New England company and Presley Neville and wife, dated March 17, 1818, which was made contemporarily with the conveyance of the land by the latter to the former; and a written notice from Mrs. Neville to the agents of the New England company, dated November 4, 1823, and duly served on them, that she considered the conveyance made in 1818, by her husband and her to them, null and void, and that she had conveyed the legal title to the plaintiff, who claimed the equitable title under Sims, to whom general Morgan had sold the land in 1796 or 7. The substance of these documents is set forth in the above state of the allegations of the bill.

The defendants exhibited the patent to the New England company of November 17, 1796, granting them 100,000 acres of land in Randolph: The deed of the marshal of the district of Virginia to the New England company, of December 11, 1805, which recites the acts of Congress concerning the direct tax, the assessment of the tax on the land claimed by the plaintiff, as the property of Tidball, the proceedings of the collector and his sale of the land, all stated to be in strict pursuance of the acts of congress, the purchase of 95,000 acres thereof at that sale by the New England company, the expiration of the time allowed the owner for redemption, and the payment of the purchase money, by the purchasers to the collector; and conveys the 95,000 acres to them: And the receipt of the collector of the U. States, dated December 30, 1802, for 54 dollars 24 cents, in full of the purchase money of this land, paid by the New England company. But the defendants did not exhibit the conveyance made by Neville and wife to their agents in 1818.

236 *It appeared, that Sims became insolvent, August 30, 1800.

The plaintiff filed the depositions, 1. Of John B. Armistead; who deposed, that he, as the agent of general Morgan, sold the tract of 100,000 acres of land in Randolph, to Sims: the purchase money was to be paid in Morris and Nicholson's notes; Sims paid him 18,000 dollars in such notes, and he paid it over to general M. who thereupon gave the receipt of January 5, 1797, and executed a bond binding himself to convey the land to Sims, which he put, with the patent, into the deponent's hands to deliver to Sims: he believed the balance of the purchase money was paid by S. to general M. for general M. was in the habit of conversing very freely with the deponent about his affairs, and of complaining of his debtors if they failed to make due payment; and he never complained that S. owed him anything. 2. John Summerton, general M's clerk; whose deposition was to the same effect as Armistead's. 3. Edmund J. Lee; who deposed, that he was retained to prosecute a suit on a bond, assigned by Sims to the plaintiff Smith, for about 17,500 dollars, against the obligor; the money was not recovered; and thus Smith became the creditor of Sims for the amount, and was so at the time when Sims executed his deed of trust for the benefit of his creditors. This deposition was the only evidence in the cause, shewing that Smith was a creditor of Sims.

The defendants, on their part, filed sundry depositions, proving, that in 1798, the New England company laid off 20,000 acres of the land granted to them, in lots: in November 1799, they and persons claiming under them commenced clearing, improving, and building upon it: in 1802, the company to perfect their title, purchased at the collector's sale for U. States' taxes, the lands included in Tidball's survey, intending to take possession of all not claimed under prior grants, and have ever since claimed the title and the possession under that purchase, as well as under their own patent.

On the hearing of the cause, chancellor Tucker declared, in substance:

237 *That it was important to decide, whether either party had the legal advantage?

"That the institution of this suit by Smith, excluded the idea that he had the legal title, since if he had, he should have exhibited his claim in another forum: and, in fact, Mrs. Neville's deed to him, being confessedly subsequent and actually referring to a prior deed to the defendants, the legal title could not have passed to him by her deed; and there was no other way, in which it could be pretended that he had the legal title.

"That, as to the defendants, they claimed, first, under the New England company's patents; but that being overreached by Morgan's, they rested their pretensions to the legal title upon Mr. and Mrs. Neville's deed, and upon their purchase under the sale for the U. States' direct tax. To their title under that sale, it was objected, that the sale was made in the name of Tidball, though Morgan's patent on Tidball's survey, had issued several years before such sale: and such objection would prevail, without more saying, if the act of congress had not authorized the sale of the land, in the name of a person not the owner. Bioren's Laws U. S. vol. III., ch. 272, § 5, p. 459. Still, the title claimed under that sale, could not prevail, unless the requisitions of the law (Id. ch. 92, § 11, p. 103), were proved to have been complied with, or unless such compliance was to be presumed (as was contended) in favour of possession after such a length of time. No such proof was offered. And such a presumption ought not to be raised, to defeat a legal title (Morgan's) upon a mere possession of twenty-two years, counting from the date of the sale to the date of the suit: it should be more cautiously admitted, in a case, where a party's rights have been sold in the name of another, and where, from the nature of the requisition of the law, the presumption of compliance with them might so easily be fortified, by the evidence of one at least of the many numbers of the four gazettes, in which the notification required by law, must 238 have appeared. The requisition of all such *statutes must be strictly pursued; and no purchaser is blameless, who buys without seeing that they have been so, or who has failed to preserve so essential a muniment of his title. The defendants themselves tacitly admitted the insufficiency of their title under the collector's sale, when they fortified it by a release or conveyance from Morgan's devisee; and thus afforded decisive evidence against the presumption on which they would rely, as late as 1818, about sixteen years after the sale. Therefore, the collector's sale and the marshal's deed did not convey the legal title to them. Nor did the deed of Neville and wife place them in a better situation. If that deed was executed by Mrs. Neville, in whom the title was, (which was left in doubt, as the deed was not filed) yet it was not such a deed, as would give to the defendants, the advantage of purchasers of the legal title without notice of a precedent equity; because it was expressly stipulated, that when the legal use should be made of the deed, the value of the transfer should be ascertained and paid to Neville and wife, and if no use should be made of it, the company should re-convey to Neville and wife; whence it is not only obvious, that there was no payment of any purchase money, (which is necessary to make a complete purchaser without notice, who will be protected,) but there was no transfer which the New England company may not at any time re-transfer. Such a transfer could not be forced within the influence of those principles, which govern the case of a purchaser without notice. Under the plaintiff's contract with Mrs. Neville, he would have title to all her interest in the contract with the company: for, if the company should pay Neville any thing, the plaintiff would have a right to receive it, both as claiming through Sims under Morgan, and under Mrs. Neville's own deed to him. The company, by their contract with Neville, were to pay Neville in proportion to the advantage to be gained by the transfer; and should they succeed upon the strength of this title of Neville's, the advantage gained must be measured by the value of 239 the land: *if they should succeed against the plaintiff upon Neville's title, they must pay Neville, or the plaintiff, her assignee, for the land. And thus it was obvious, that Neville's deed to the company could not serve as any protection to them.

"That, as the plaintiff claimed an equitable title under Morgan, and as the defendants could only claim under him with any prospect of success, this was, in effect, a contest between equities under Morgan or his heirs; and as the plaintiff's equity was prior to the defendants', it must prevail, unless it was inferior.

"That the defendants' equity was, 1st, that arising from payment of taxes and from improvements; but this created an equitable charge, not an equitable title: 2dly, an equity arising from their contract with Neville; but that was an executory contract, for which no consideration had been paid.

"That the plaintiff, however, must succeed by the strength of his own equity, not merely by the weakness of his adversary's. The equity of Sims against Morgan, was sufficiently proved by the depositions, and Morgan's receipt, filed in the cause; and though it was not shewn, what he was to pay, or what he had paid, the conveyance of Mrs. Neville, the heir and owner of the estate, was the best evidence, that nothing was due, and concluded all inquiry on the subject. The validity of Sims's deed of trust could not be a matter of inquiry here, where no creditors of Sims were parties: as between him and the trustees claiming under him, it was valid. Though the proceedings of the plaintiff had been dilatory, in claiming under Sims's deed of trust, yet the evidence, that he was a creditor of Sims, sufficiently appeared to entertain him here, as standing in Sims's shoes, claiming the legal title derived from Morgan, who had sold to Sims.

"That the equity of Sims against Morgan's heirs, was better than that of the defendants, and must prevail over them, because it was proved, that he had paid part of the purchase money, and was admitted by the heir, against her own interest in every respect, to have paid the whole;
240 *whereas the defendants have as yet paid nothing, and by losing their contract with Neville would only be replaced in statu quo.

"But that although the plaintiff be permitted to assert this equity to preserve it, yet his case was too defective to entitle him to a final decree, at that time. A conveyance from the heirs of the trustees, on whom indeed the title but not the confidence descended, ought not to be held sufficient. Sims's heirs should be made parties in the cause, in order to a final decree.

"That the New England company having paid the taxes on the land in dispute, to the collectors of the U. States, were entitled to a lien on the lands for the amount, with interest thereon from the date of such payment, and were in like manner entitled to a lien on the said lands for all taxes paid since; and, moreover, having settled on the lands many years ago, and made valuable improvements thereon, under the faith, first of their patent, and afterwards of the sale for taxes, and on the supposition, that Tidball's was the best right, and that they had acquired it; and Morgan, and those claiming under him, having quietly looked on; the defendants were entitled to a full and liberal allowance for permanent improvements, so far as they exceeded the rents and profits."

Therefore, the chancellor gave the plaintiff leave to amend his bill, by making the heirs of Sims party defendants: and he appointed a commissioner to ascertain and state the amount of taxes paid by the defendants to the U. States, and the taxes paid by them to the state of Virginia, on account of the land in the bill mentioned, and also to state and report the value of the permanent improvements made by the defendants on the land, and an account of the rents and profits thereof, during the time that they or those claiming under them have had the same in possession; and remanded the cause to the rules for further proceedings to be had therein as to the heirs of Sims, and continued it as to the other defendants.

241 *From this order, the defendants appealed to this court.

The cause was argued here, by Johnson for the appellants, and Leigh for the appellee.

I. Johnson took several objections to the appellee's claim to relief, upon his own case, as stated in the bill, and the proofs adduced in support of it.

1. He insisted, that Smith had shewn no right in himself to assert Sims's equitable title under Morgan to the land in question. The only evidence adduced to shew that he was a creditor of Sims, was the deposition of Lee; and that deposition shewed, that the evidence of the debt consisted in the record of a proceeding and judgment in a court of law; it was indispensable to produce the record: no parol evidence of its contents ought to have been heard. If he was a creditor of Sims at all, he was not a creditor entitled to claim the benefit of Sims's deed of trust of August 1800; for the deed provided only for Sims's own proper debts; but his debt to the plaintiff, arose out of the assignment of the bond of another person to him; and the assignor of a bond is, in reality, only a surety for the obligor, bound to pay the debt to the assignee, if he cannot recover it of the obligor. And if he was a creditor, whose claim was provided for by the deed of trust, he was bound, if he claimed the benefit of that deed, to have elected to take the trust subject, at the valuation, within some reasonable time: he ought not to be allowed to wait, as he did, twenty-one years, and then elect to take, at a valuation made in 1800, a parcel of land, the value of which might now, in all probability, be quadrupled. Had this deed of trust been a mortgage of this land, for the security of this very debt to Smith, after the lapse of twenty years, payment of the debt would have been presumed, and his bill to foreclose would have been dismissed. He went into equity to disturb an adverse claim in the highest degree meritorious; a claim asserted under a patent, to lands, which the grantees had taken early possession of, defended against conflicting claims, settled, im-

242 proved, *and preserved from forfeiture by the payment of public dues: and there was no such merits in Smith's claim, as should have induced the chancellor to shew it any favour or indulgence. He presented his cause for a hearing; and, not having shewn and proved a case entitling him to a decree, his bill should have been dismissed.

Leigh denied, that these objections had any good foundation: but supposing they had, the questions they presented, were questions between Smith and the heirs of Sims; questions, in which the New England company had no interest. The chancellor had not decided them: in requiring that Sims's heirs should be made parties, he left them open to be litigated by them, and to be considered by the court, after they should be heard. Enough appeared to shew, that Smith's claim, as against them, had very strong colour of justice, to say the least; and it would have been unprecedented and unjust, to dismiss his bill absolutely, merely because it had not made all the proper parties. There could be nothing meritorious in the case of either party, distinct from the law and equity on which his claim was founded.

2. Johnson objected, that Smith had shown no case, entitling himself, claiming under Sims, to ask a specific execution of Morgan's contract to sell the land to Sims. He had not proved, that the title bond, given by Morgan to Sims, was lost or mislaid; and without proof of that, the court ought not to listen to parol evidence of its contents. The parol evidence only proved, that there was a contract; it did not prove what were the terms of it, or that Sims so complied with its terms, as to have entitled him to demand a specific execution of Morgan. And Sims had never had possession under the contract.

It was answered, that this was a question between Smith claiming under Sims, and Morgan's heir or devisee. Mrs. Neville was the residuary devisee and legatee of Morgan; entitled to the land, if Morgan was not bound to convey it; entitled to any balance of the purchase money, which Sims might have left unpaid. She admitted her father's sale 243 to *Sims, and that he had entitled himself, and those claiming under him, to a conveyance.

3. It was urged, as an objection against giving any relief in the case, in whatever shape it might be presented, and however it might be sustained by proofs, that, at the time Morgan contracted to sell to Sims, or at least when Sims conveyed the land in question to trustees for the benefit of his creditors, the New England company, and those claiming under them, were in actual possession, claiming adverse title under their patents; and, at the time the heirs of the surviving trustee conveyed the land to Smith, and when Mrs. Neville conveyed her legal estate to him, the company were in possession, claiming under their patent, under the marshal's deed, and under the deed of Neville and wife. And thus, Smith's claim stood condemned by the statute against conveying or taking pretended titles; 1 Rev. Code, ch. 103.

The answer was, that Morgan's sale to Sims was made before the New England company had taken possession; and, for the rest, the statute inhibits the purchase of pretended legal estate, not of equitable interests in lands.

II. Johnson made two objections to the details of the chancellor's order: 1. That in requiring new parties, he had not required all the proper parties; for, not only Sims's heirs but his personal representatives, and Morgan's personal representative too, as well as Mrs. Neville his devisee, were proper and necessary parties: 2. That the decree was premature in directing an account of rents and profits, at the suit of Smith, while it was yet uncertain, whether he had any just right to the land.

In answer to the first objection, Leigh denied, that Sims's personal representative could be a necessary party in any possible state of the case: And, as to Morgan's personal representative, if it were proper to make him a party, it could be so only and merely for form sake; for it was apparent, that Mrs. Neville, the residuary legatee as well as devisee of Morgan, was entitled 244 not only to the legal estate *in the land, but to any balance of the purchase money, which might possibly have been left unpaid by Sims to her father; she was a party; and far from setting up any such claim, she had disclaimed it. As to the account directed, it was hard to say, to which of the parties the decree, in that particular, was most beneficial: it was an account of permanent improvements made, taxes paid, and expenses incurred, by the appellants, as well as of rents and profits; and it was probably more convenient to them, than to the appellee, thus to expedite the accounts.

III. Johnson strenuously contended, that the New England company had acquired a good title under their purchase at the collector's sale for U. States' taxes, and the marshal's deed of December 1805. That which would strike one as the principal objection to the regularity of the sale, and to the efficacy of the marshal's deed to pass the title, namely, that the land was assessed for the taxes, and sold, as the property of Tidball, was cured by the express provision of the act of congress. He admitted, that it had been settled by the decisions both of this court and of the supreme court of the U. States, that in sales of land by a collector for taxes, he acts under a naked power, and must strictly comply with all the requisitions of the law, as to all the steps preceding the sale; that a purchaser claiming under such a sale, is bound to preserve and adduce evidence of the exact regularity of it; and that the marshal's conveyance to him, is not even prima facie evidence, that the provisions of the law have been complied with. Christy v. Minor, 4 Munf. 431; Nalle v. Fenwick, 4 Rand. 585; Stead v. Course, 4 Cranch, 403; Parker v. Rule, 9 Cranch, 64; Williams v. Peyton, 4 Wheat. 77. But, he said, though the purchaser be bound to prove the collector's exact compliance with the provisions of the law, in the steps preparatory to the sale, he could not justly be held to strict proof at any distance of time: and this was admitted in Williams v. Peyton: for C. J. Marshall, after referring to the provisions of the act of congress they will be found to be susceptible of complete proof on the part of the officer, and consequently on the part of the purchaser, who ought to preserve the evidence of them, at least for a reasonable time." The purchaser at such a sale, ought not to be held to preserve fugitive evidence of acts in pais, longer than twenty years: after such a lapse of time, the regularity of the collector's proceedings ought to be presumed. Such presumption was allowed to supply the place of direct proof, in a stronger case. Abraham v. Matthews, 6 Munf. 159. There, a slave claimed his freedom, on the ground that he had been imported into Virginia contrary to law: whether he was illegally imported or no, depended on the question of fact, whether the master had, within ten days after his removal to the state, taken a particular oath, prescribed by law to justify the holding him as a slave here: and it was held, that the taking of the oath would be presumed from the lapse of twenty years' possession without claim of freedom on the part of the slave.

Leigh remarked, that the appellants had supplied evidence enough to rebut the presumption now insisted on. For, in the first place, they had alleged and proved, that they commenced the settling and improving the lands as early as 1799; and it was hardly possible, that there was not personal property enough on the lands, out of which 54 dollars (the amount of tax) could have been made by distress; and if there was, the collector's sale of the lands for the taxes was contrary to law. 3 Bioren's Laws U. S. ch. 92, § 10, 11, p. 102, 3. And, in the next place, the appellants had deemed it necessary to procure a conveyance of the legal title from Neville and wife, as late as 1818, to fortify the title they claimed under the marshal's deed. But there was no ground on which the court should allow any such presumption. The collector's sale was made December 27, 1802; the term for redemption allowed by law, two years (Id. § 13), expired December 27, 1804; the marshal's deed was made in December 1805.

246 This *suit was brought in November 1824. Twenty years had not elapsed from the time when the title under the sale for taxes accrued. And if they had, the court would hardly indulge a presumption, on the mere strength of which a purchase of 95,000 acres of land for 54 dollars, was to be upheld. The expression of the chief justice, in Williams v. Peyton, that the purchaser is bound to preserve the evidence of the regularity of the collector's proceedings preparatory to his sale, "at least for a reasonable time," must be taken with due regard to the nature of the facts of which the evidence is required to be preserved: and the chief justice, in the sequel of his opinion, said, that the purchaser ought to preserve the gazettes (in which the collector's advertisements were published); and that "it was imposing no greater hardship on him to require it, than it would be to require him to prove, that a power of attorney, in a case in which his deed had been executed by an attorney, was really given by the principal." Surely, the execution of a power of attorney, in such a case, could not be presumed from a possession of twenty years, or any time short of the period prescribed by the act of limitations in regard to land titles.

CARR, J. Many objections to the decree, were urged in the argument.

The first was, that Smith did not shew himself possessed of the equitable claim of Sims upon Morgan: because, 1. he had not proved himself a creditor of Sims, since the evidence of Lee was secondary, speaking of a suit on a bond assigned by Sims to Smith, of which suit there must be a record, which being the highest evidence, was alone admissible: but, 2. if Smith had been a creditor in 1800, this debt must be presumed to have been paid before 1821, when he elected to take the land: or if not, 3. after such a lapse of time, and especially the death of the trustees, he had no right to take the land, nor had the heirs of the surviving trustee any power to 247 make a deed to him, the confidence *as to that being personal: and 4. their deed was utterly ineffectual, both because there was adverse possession, and it was a contract for a pretended title. It was denied on the other side, that there was weight in these objections: but the answer to them mainly relied on, was, that they were points, not one of which had been decided by the chancellor; that, when he directed the heirs of Sims to be made parties, he meant to give them an opportunity to contest the claim against their ancestor, on every ground which might avail them, and of course, could not intend to forestall them, by deciding any point of their case in their absence; that when they should appear and answer, if they admitted the claim of the plaintiff, there would need no further proof; if they contested it, the whole case, as to those parties, would be open; new evidence might be taken on either side; and whether it was or not, the chancellor would decide upon the claim of Smith against Sims, as a part of the case untouched before. I think there is great force in these remarks, and that they dispose, for the present, of these objections, unless it be true, that the chancellor instead of directing new parties, ought at once, to have dismissed the bill, either for defect of proof of the claim against Sims; or, because that claim was attempted to be satisfied, by taking a pretended title, which the court was called on to assist.

As to the first, the language of the chancellor is, "that although the plaintiff may be permitted to assert this equity, to preserve it, yet his case was too defective, to entitle him to a final decree at that time." I think the distinction here taken a very sound one. There may not be proof sufficient to establish a claim, nor exactly of that kind which is the best evidence the case will admit of; yet it may be such as to create a strong belief, and also to shew, that better and full evidence can be produced. In the case before us, the plaintiff had the deed of the heirs of the trustee, stating that he was a creditor of Sims; and he had the evidence of Lee, stating that he was a creditor; but Lee adds, 248 that he *had prosecuted a suit to judgment, on a bond assigned by Sims to Smith. The chancellor could not properly decide against the heirs of Sims, when they were not before him. But was not here enough to prevent him from dismissing the bill at once? Did not this proof go pretty strongly to shew a debt from Sims to Smith, at the same time, that it pointed to a source (the record) from whence indubitable evidence could be obtained? And was it not likely to be most conducive to equity, to call those before the court, who could properly discuss this matter, and at the same time, give opportunity to the plaintiff to produce this record-evidence, if the heirs of Sims should dispute his claim? I think so. It was an equity, with which the defendants had no connection.

Neither can I see, that the taking this deed from the heirs of Sims's trustee, was a transaction within the letter or the spirit of the statute against buying and selling pretended titles. That law, as I have always understood it, means the buying and selling legal, not equitable titles. In Wood v. Griffith, 1 Swanat. 43, lord Eldon says, "It is extremely clear, that an equitable interest, under a contract of purchase, may be the subject of sale;" and after some further remarks, he adds, "If I were to suffer this doctrine to be shaken, by any reference to the law of champerty or maintenance, I should violate the established habits of this court." In our case, Sims's original purchase from Morgan, was in 1797, before there was any adverse possession: but he did not get the legal title: he conveyed this equity in trust to pay his debts; and the plaintiff, a creditor, takes the deed from the heirs of the trustee, in order to carry into effect, the deed of his debtor, and obtain payment of his debt. Whether this effort be successful or not, there was surely nothing criminal in it.

The counsel for the appellants also objected, that, though there was no doubt of a contract for the land between Sims and Morgan, yet there is not such evidence of it, as equity will deem sufficient on a bill for specific execution: for Sims *never had possession of the land; neither is there any such written evidence of the contract, as discloses the terms; the contents of the title bond are not proved; and the receipt, though it acknowledges 18,000 dollars paid in Morris and Nicholson's notes, in part payment for 100,000 acres of land in Randolph, does not give us the particulars of the contract: that thus we do not know what was the price to be given: that the depositions of Armistead and Summerton merely state their belief, that all the purchase money was paid, which is not full proof, and if it were, payment is not such part performance, as will authorise a decree for specific execution. There is no doubt with me, that Armistead sold this land for Morgan to Sims; and I think we may also fairly conclude from the evidence, that full payment has been made. Armistead swears, "that Morgan put into his possession, a title bond for a conveyance of the land to Sims, and the patent, both to be delivered by him to Sims, in virtue of that contract." What he did with them, he does not say. It is probable, that he delivered them to Sims; and the subsequent insolvency of Sims, together with his death, and that of both his trustees, and the lapse of so many years, may well support the assertion in the bill, that the bond is lost. I do not say, that these circumstances are such, as clearly to authorise equity to decree a specific execution, if the heirs of Morgan were resisting it: but I do say, confidently, that, when the residuary devisee of Morgan, (Mrs. Neville) having the sole right under him, releases all that right to the plaintiff as representing Sims, and thereby acknowledges the contract, and satisfaction for it, equity will feel itself fully authorised, so far as Morgan's right is concerned, to decree in favour of the plaintiff. It was said, that this deed of Mrs. Neville could have no operation whatever, both because she had before passed the legal right to the defendants, and because of their adversary possession. Whether Mrs. Neville, who was then a feme covert, was privily examined in the execution of the deed to the defendants, we do not know, as the defendants, though they refer *to this deed in their answer, have not filed it. But, however this may be, and however inoperative the deed of Mrs. Neville may be in the way of conveying title to the plaintiff, it would certainly be conclusive against her, to shew that she admitted the contract between Morgan and Sims, and was willing to do all she could in execution of it.

It was also objected, that the chancellor erred in deciding that the marshal's deed was not effectual to pass the title. The counsel admitted the general rule, that he who claims under one of these sales, founded on a forfeiture, must shew that the law had been strictly pursued; and that such titles, where (as in this case) 100,000 acres of land are bought for 54 dollars (the mere tax due on it) ought not to be encouraged: but yet he insisted, that the same presumptions from length of time, which govern other cases, would apply here also; and that, the defendants having been in possession under the sale for twenty years, it ought to be presumed, that every pre-requisite of the law had been complied with. It has been decided, in several cases, both in the federal court and in this, that an officer, who acts under a naked power, especially if by the exercise of that power the rights and property of others may be lost, must pursue his authority to the very letter, and that those claiming under his acts must shew this, as nothing will be presumed. In Williams v. Peyton, the deed of the marshal made under this very act of congress, was decided not even to furnish prima facie evidence, that the advertisements &c. required by the law, had been set up in the country, and published in the papers; and from the manner in which the question is treated there, it seems clear to me, that the court would have permitted no other presumption, than such as would be received as to any other link in the chain of title to real property. The chief justice, who delivered the opinion, says, "It is a general principle, that the party who sets up a title must furnish the evidence necessary to support it. If the validity of a deed depends on an act in pais, the party claiming under that deed is as much bound to prove the performance *of the act, as he would be bound to prove any matter of record on which its validity might depend. It forms a part of his title; it is a link in the chain which is essential to its continuity, and which it is incumbent on him to preserve. These facts should be examined by him before he becomes a purchaser, and the evidence of them should be preserved as a necessary muniment of title." He then goes on to shew, that these general principles apply, with peculiar force, to the marshal's proceeding to sell lands under the law of congress for non-payment of taxes; where the officer's duties are clearly pointed out, and his compliance with them easy of proof, and where, for the opposite party to prove that they had not been complied with, would be always difficult, often impossible. Now, if the validity of the marshal's deed depends on these acts in pais (the publishing advertisements of the sale in the gazette, and setting them up in public places); if the party claiming under such deed, is as much bound to prove their performance, as he would be to prove any matter of record, on which the validity of the deed might depend: how can it be supposed, that he would be permitted to supply evidence of these acts, by presumption from time, sooner than he might supply the want of the deed itself, by such evidence? The very nature of such titles, it seems to me, ought to warn the purchasers, to see that all the prerequisites of the law are complied with ad unguem. They buy often large and valuable tracts of land for a mere trifle; and they ought always to expect, that the owner will attempt to recover them. This is notice, intrinsic in the transaction, that they must be ready for defence; and they ought, at once, to collect the proper evidences of compliance with the law; and these documents, being written, can be just as easily preserved as their deed. My opinion, then, is, that the time which has elapsed, did not release the appellants from the necessity of strict proof; and that, failing altogether in producing it, the chancellor was right in saying, that the marshal's deed did not help their case at all.

252 *He was equally correct, I think, in saying that the deed from Mr. and Mrs. Neville (even if she was privily examined), did not give the appellants the position of purchasers without notice, against the plaintiff; because nothing was paid by them, and it was in their option, at any time, to reconvey.

With respect to the order of account made by the chancellor, I think it neither incorrect nor premature. Its object was to ascertain, for the benefit of the defendants, principally, the amount of taxes they have paid, and the value of their improvements, as well as the rents and profits. It cannot, therefore, be said to disturb them; for it is not probable, that a step will be taken in it, unless at their instance; and if the plaintiff should unnecessarily be the means of incurring costs in the case, the chancellor will have it in his power to make him pay all such costs, however he may decide the cause.

Upon every ground, therefore, I am for affirming the decree.

CABELL, J. I concur in the opinion of judge Carr, as to the correctness of the decree, in all respects, excepting the requiring an account of rents and profits. In my opinion, it was premature, in the actual state of the cause, to order such an account to be rendered; since it may hereafter appear, upon the amended bill, that the plaintiff has not acquired any just right to Sims's equitable title to the land; and it is wrong to put the defendants to the trouble of rendering an account of rents and profits, till it be ascertained, that the plaintiff has a right to demand it. I am, therefore, for correcting the decree in this respect, and reversing it for this cause, and affirming it as to all things else.

BROOKE, President. As respects some of the objections taken to the decree, in the argument, the appeal to this court was certainly premature.

The chancellor having rightly decided, that the legal title to the land in controversy, was in neither of the parties, the 253 *next question was, which of them had the better equitable right. Morgan's patent being older than the patent under which the defendants claimed, the legal title was in his devisee, Mrs. Neville. Sims under whom the plaintiff claimed, there can be no doubt, purchased the land of Morgan, and paid for it. The evidence of Armistead, corroborated by that of Summertown, might not be conclusive of that fact; but the release of Mrs. Neville, the devisee of Morgan, to the plaintiff, though it conveyed nothing, was conclusive evidence that she claimed no title to it. And the plaintiff having shewn by Lee's evidence, enough to give colour to his claim under Sims, the chancellor was correct in not dismissing his bill, until an opportunity was afforded him to make Sims's representatives parties, and then to prove, if he could, by the record of the suit spoken of by Lee, that he was a creditor of Sims, and by other evidence, that he had a right to elect to take the land in question, in discharge of his claim. It might have been more regular to have made Sims's representatives parties before; but a court of equity will not dismiss a bill for the want of parties only, especially in this case, in which the plaintiff could not be sure that his title under Sims would be controverted by the defendants.

The objections, that the claim upon Sims, accruing in 1800, ought to have been presumed paid in 1822, and to the title of the plaintiff under the deed of trust for the benefit of Sims's creditors, the confidence in the trustees being personal, and not devolving on the heirs of the surviving trustee, from whom the plaintiff obtained his deed; are objections of the same character, and ought not to have been discussed until Sims's heirs were made parties.

The other objections are of a different character and deserve more consideration.

The objection, that the purchase of the land, either by Sims from Morgan, or by the plaintiff from the trustees of Sims, was the purchase of a pretended title, is not sustainable upon the facts in the case. At the 254 time of the purchase*by Sims of Morgan, there was no adverse possession of the land in question; and the purchase by the plaintiff of Sims's equitable title, under its circumstances, was no violation of the letter or spirit of the act against the purchase of pretended titles. That act imposes a penalty, but does not avoid the conveyance (Tabb v. Baird, 3 Call, 441), even where the legal estate is conveyed; and cannot affect the conveyance of equitable rights. And, though equity will not enforce an equitable title, purchased by a party under circumstances, which if it were a legal title, would subject him to the penalty of the act against the purchase of pretended titles, that is not the case before us. The plaintiff elected to take the land under the deed of trust, in discharge of a prior debt. He violated neither the letter nor the spirit of the act. The opinion of lord Eldon in Wood v. Griffith, is directly in point. There can be nothing clearer, I think, than that this objection to the decree of the chancellor has nothing in it.

Another objection was, that though there was a contract between Morgan and Sims, for the land, yet there is not such evidence of it, as equity will deem sufficient on a bill for specific execution, Sims never having been put into possession, and there being no written evidence of the terms of the contract, as to price &c. If Morgan's representatives were resisting this contract, I think this objection would be entitled to great weight. The title bond spoken of by Armistead from Morgan to Sims, ought to be produced, or its loss accounted for, and its contents proved. But the proof, I think, is full enough of the payment of the whole of the purchase money by Sims. Armistead swears, that Morgan put into his hands the patent and title bond to be delivered to Sims, in virtue of that contract. The insolvency of Sims, his death, and that of his trustees, and the lapse of so many years, might, with other circumstances, account for the nonproduction of the bond, even if Morgan's representative was contesting the claim, and Sims's representatives were also parties: but in the present state of the cause, the release of 255 *the representative of Morgan to the plaintiff, must be considered a full acknowledgment of the contract alleged in the bill.

The last objection to the decree was, that the deed from the marshal to the defendants, in virtue of the sale for taxes, was pronounced to be invalid. It was admitted, that, by the decisions both of the supreme court of the U. States, and of this court, a purchaser claiming under these deeds, must shew that all the requirements of the act of congress have been complied with; but it was insisted, that after the lapse of twenty years, compliance with the requirements of the act may be presumed, though the party be unable to prove it. If such a presumption were applicable to a case like this, the defendants could not avail themselves of it. When they purchased the land under the sale for the nonpayment of the taxes, they had full notice of the rights of Morgan; indeed, the purchase was made, to evade the title of Morgan, and to fortify their own. They were put on their guard, and ought to have preserved all the documents and proofs of their title under the deed. When an officer acts under a naked power, and the property of others is to be affected by his acts, it must be shewn, that he has acted in pursuance of his authority to the very letter. In Williams v. Peyton, the deed of the marshal under this same act of congress, was held not to be even prima facie evidence, that the requirements of the act, previous to the sale, had been complied with: and from the manner, in which the question is treated in that case, it is pretty clear, that the court would have permitted no other presumption, than such as would be received as to any other link in the chain of title to real property. [This the judge shewed, by several parts of the opinion, which he quoted.] Neither is it fairly inferrible, from any part of the opinion of the court in that case, that if presumption in such a case were admissible, it would be allowed on a shorter lapse of time, than is required to found such presumption, where any other link in the chain of title to real property, may be presumed, in the absence of proof otherwise indispensable. And that is a *case at law, where forfeitures may be strictly insisted on. But courts of equity rather favour presumptions to relieve against forfeitures, than to sustain them. In the case of Abraham v. Matthews, the presumption after the lapse of twenty years, that a party bringing a slave into this state, had taken the oath before a magistrate, prescribed by statute, was allowed to save the forfeiture under the statute. Whether, in any case, a court of equity will allow presumption to sustain a forfeiture, where the party claims immediately under it, it is not necessary to decide. The case of Christy v. Minor, and other cases, in this court, concur in the principle of Williams v. Peyton.

Upon the whole, as the object of the decree was to preserve the equity of the plaintiff under Sims, until it could be properly controverted by his representatives, the order that they be made parties was correct.

But I concur with judge Cabell, that the decree is wrong in the particular mentioned by him, and must for that cause be reversed.

The day after these opinions were delivered, the president mentioned, that the objection taken by the appellants, in their answer, that their twenty years possession was a bar to the assertion of the equitable right to the land claimed by the bill, if it had been presented in the argument, had not been considered by the court; and that the point might now be argued.

It was spoken to accordingly. The case of Elmendorf v. Taylor, 10 Wheat. 152, was referred to; in which it was held, that twenty years adverse possession is a bar in chancery to the assertion of an equitable title, whenever it would bar an ejectment, if the plaintiff claimed the legal title. The principle was not contested: the only debate was, whether it was applicable to this case.

The president afterwards announced, that the court saw no reason to alter its decree. The reporter was afterwards informed, that the court did not think it necessary, in the present state of the case, to decide the point.

Judgments—Ca. Sa.—Subsequent Judgment by Commonwealth—Fl. Fa.—Priority.*—H. obtains judgment against J. and sues out a ca. sa. on which the debtor is taken in execution: while he is in custody, the commonwealth obtains a judgment against him, and sues out a fl. fa. under which

Judgments—Ca. Sa.—Subsequent Fl. Fa. by Another Creditor—Priority.—In the principal case it is held, that where a judgment is obtained against a debtor and a ca. sa. is sued out and the debtor is taken in execution and while in custody the commonwealth obtains a judgment against him and sues out a fl. fa. under which his lands are sold, and the debtor then takes the oath of insolvency and is discharged from custody, the lien of the judgment creditor his lands are sold: and then the debtor takes the oath of insolvency, and is discharged from custody under H.'s ca. sa.

HELD. the line of H.'s ca. sa. executed, given by the statute 1 R. C. ch. 134, § 10, overreaches the lien of the commonwealth's judgment, and gives the priority to H.

In a suit brought in the superiour court of chancery of Clarksburg, in June 1825, by the appellee, Heiskell, against Thompson, Willson, and the appellant, Jackson, the case alleged proved to the satisfaction of the chancellor and of this court, was thus:

Thompson bought of Willson, a lot in Clarksburg, for 150 dollars. The contract was merely verbal: but Thompson immediately took possession of the lot, according to the bargain, with Willson's knowledge; paid him the greater part of the purchase money; and built a dwelling-house and out-houses upon it. Willson, however, never made him any conveyance.

After this, Heiskell recovered a judgment against Thompson for debt, in the circuit court of Harrison, at its fall term 1822, and sued out a ca. sa. upon which Thompson was arrested and committed to jail, December 2, 1822. He gave a prison-bonds bond, which he broke; and afterwards, December 2, 1823, he took the oath of insolvency, and was discharged from custody. In the schedule he gave in, he mentioned three debts due to him, as the only effects he owned: no mention was made of the lot he had bought of Willson, or of any right he had in it. Nevertheless, whatever estate, right, or interest the insolvent debtor had in that property, was vested in the sheriff, for the benefit of the creditor, by force of the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 134, § 34.

In the general court, June term 1823, the commonwealth recovered judgment against Thompson and others, for 258 debt *due on account of revenue collected; and sued out a fi. fa. under the statute concerning the recovery of debts due to the public. 2 Rev. Code, ch. 189, § 8, 9, 10, p. 51. This process being delivered to the sheriff of Harrison, he levied it on the tenement in Clarksburg, which Thompson had bought of Willson. The tenement was appraised by the valuers, at 1000 dollars. Thompson's interest in this tenement was offered for sale by the sheriff, to satisfy the commonwealth's execution, October 21, 1823. At that sale, Willson declared, that Thompson had never bought the lot of him; that he had built upon it without his leave; and that he had no right to it whatever: but all Thompson's interest in it was purchased by Jackson (who was Willson's son-in-law) for 180 dollars.

under his ca. sa. has priority over the commonwealth's A. fa. This case was cited and overruled in Foreman v. Loyd, 2 Leigh 285. To the same effect the principal case is cited in Evans v. Greenhow, 15 Gratt. 159; Charron v. Boswell, 18 Gratt. 226.

In Rogers v. Marshall, 4 Leigh 425, where it is held that by the actual service of a ca. sa. the judgment lien is destroyed, it is said at page 432 in reference to the principal case, in that case, too, the judges who were inclined to give the ca. sa. lien the greatest extent admitted, that no creditor, after taking out a ca. sa. and getting it executed could stand upon the lien of the judgment.

The principal case is cited in Stuart v. Hamilton, 8 Leigh 508, in a note by the president to the point that while the debtor remains in custody, he is not liable to be proceeded against in equity. See monographic note on "Judgments" appended to Smith v. Charlton, 7 Gratt. 428.

The sheriff, by deed dated October 30, 1823, conveyed Thompson's interest in the tenement to Jackson: and afterwards, by deed dated July 16, 1824, Willson also conveyed the tenement to him.

At the time Willson made the conveyance to Jackson, and at the time of the sheriff's sale under the commonwealth's execution, Jackson had actual and full notice, of the service of Heiskell's ca. sa. on Thompson in December 1822, and that his claim remained yet unsatisfied.

The claim asserted in Heiskell's bill, was, that Thompson, before the service of Heiskell's ca. sa. on him in December 1822, had a complete right to demand of Willson a specific execution of his contract for the sale of the lot to him; that this equitable title of Thompson in the tenement, was bound by the service of Heiskell's ca. sa. on him; that that process, having been served before the commonwealth's judgment was obtained, gave Heiskell priority over the commonwealth, to have satisfaction out of the subject; that Jackson's purchase of the tenement at the sheriff's sale under the commonwealth's execution, was subject to Heiskell's prior lien; and that, notwithstanding Willson's conveyance of the legal title to Jackson in July 1824, the property was liable to Heiskell's claim, in like manner as if it had 259 been *conveyed by Willson to Thompson, before he was arrested under Heiskell's execution.

Willson, in his answer, denied that he had ever made any contract with Thompson, written or verbal, to sell him the lot.

Thompson averred, that the contract was made; that he had paid Willson the greater part of the purchase money; that possession of the lot was given him; and that he put valuable improvements upon it under Willson's eyes. And the facts were proved.

Jackson insisted, that Heiskell acquired by the service of his ca. sa. on Thompson, no such lien on his equitable title in the lot in question, as gave him priority over the commonwealth's fieri facias; and that he himself having fairly acquired the legal title from Willson, in addition to the right acquired under the sheriff's sale, was entitled to hold the subject exempt from the alleged lien of Heiskell.

Chancellor Tucker held, that Thompson had acquired a right to demand of Willson a specific execution of the contract for the sale of the lot, before the service of Heiskell's ca. sa.; that Heiskell's judgment having been obtained, and his ca. sa. having been served, before the judgment rendered for the commonwealth, he acquired a lien on the tenement in Thompson's hands, prior and preferable to the lien of the commonwealth's judgment; and that Jackson had purchased with actual and full notice of this lien; therefore, he decreed, that the tenement should be sold by his marshal, and the proceeds applied to the payment, first of any balance of the purchase money that might remain due from Thompson to Willson for the lot (of which he directed an account), and then to the payment of the debt (289 dollars with interest) due to Heiskell, and the costs.

From this decree Jackson appealed to this court.

The cause was argued here, by Schmidt, and on one point by Leigh* also, for the appellants, and by Johnson for the *appellee. There were several questions discussed, which arose out of the peculiar circumstances and details of the case: but the argument turned chiefly on a question of general interest, which Schmidt and Leigh stated to be, Whether Heiskell's ca. sa. executed on Thompson in December 1822, gave him such a lien on Thompson's real estate, as anticipated the lien of the commonwealth's judgment against him of June 1823, and, upon his availing himself of the act of insolvency in December 1823, overreached and avoided the sale of the land under the commonwealth's execution in October 1823? A question presenting for the consideration of this court, for the first time, the construction and effect of the provision of the statute concerning executions, introduced at the late revisal, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 134, § 10, p. 528.† They held the negative.

The rule (they said) is settled and certain, in England, that, if an elegit be sued out on a judgment, and the debtor's lands be actually extended in virtue of it, the creditor can have no other execution afterwards, and especially he cannot have a ca. sa. and if a capias be sued out, and the debtor be actually taken and charged in execution on that process, the creditor can have no other execution, and especially he cannot have an elegit. There are, indeed, exceptions to the rule in both its branches; but those exceptions are founded on after circumstances, which defeat the effect of the process, and disappoint the creditor of that satisfaction, *which the law supposes such process to afford: as, the rescue, escape or death of the debtor in execution; the eviction of the tenant by elegit &c. But the creditor can never take and hold both body and lands for the same debt: either process, if it take effect, works complete satisfaction. 3 Black. Comm. 414, 419; 11 Vin. Abr. Execution, X. a. Y. a. p. 37, 42; 2 Wils. Bac. Abr. Execution, D. 718, 719; 2 Wms. Saund. 68, a., note 1. The law of Virginia is exactly the same. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 134, § 3, 4, 8, 9, the provisions of which are partly taken from english statutes in pari materia, and partly embodied from judicial decisions.

In the present case, then, Heiskell having taken, and holding, his debtor's body in execution, never could have a right to sue out an elegit to extend his lands. And, as the only reason why a judgment constitutes a lien on the debtor's lands, is, that the creditor has a right to sue out an elegit upon it,

*Leigh was not retained in this case; but the same point was involved in another case, in which he was retained.—Note in Original Edition.

†The section is in these words: "And it is hereby declared and enacted, That every sale, conveyance and transfer of any lands or tenements, made by any person charged in execution for any debt or damages, shall be absolutely null and void, as to the creditor or creditors at whose suit he is so charged in execution; unless such sale, transfer or conveyance, be absolute and bona fide, and be made for the payment of the debt and damages due to such creditor or creditors, and the proceeds of such sale, conveyance or transfer, be paid, or be secured to be paid within a reasonable time, to such creditor or creditors: and that all executions of capias ad satisfaciendum, levied after the commencement of this act, shall bind the real estate of the defendant, from the time when they shall be levied."—Note in Original Edition.

so that the instant the right to sue out that process is gone, the lien of the judgment on the debtor's real estate is gone too; therefore, certainly, Heiskell, at the date of the commonwealth's judgment against Thompson, of the levy of her fieri facias, on his tenement in Clarksburg, or of the sale of it to Jackson, had no subsisting lien on Thompson's real estate, by force of his prior judgment. He must rely wholly on the lien, with which the statute endues his ca. sa. from the date of its execution.

If this lien be an absolute one, to all purposes, and as against all persons, and all rights whether conferred by act of the debtor or by act of law, it is fraught with some very odd consequences. 1. It changes intirely the character of the ca. sa. which, in its own nature and direct object, does not affect lands at all, though it may ultimately compel the surrender of them. 2. It makes the service of the capias a lien on the debtor's lands, at the same time that the service of the process destroys the creditor's right to sue out an elegit on his judgment, and thus destroys the lien of the judgment itself on the debtor's land. 3. It makes the capias executed a lien on the debtor's land, to double the extent of the lien given by the judgment which the process is sued out to enforce: it is a lien on all the debtor's lands, whereas the judgment is a lien on the moiety only, since no more is extendible on an elegit. 4. The capias executed will put an end to all questions among creditors, concerning priority of satisfaction out of the debtor's lands, according to priority of judgment and right. If there be two contemporary judgments, and an elegit be sued out upon one, and a capias on the other, and the body of the debtor be taken on the capias, before his land is extended on the elegit, the capias will certainly sweep all. But more; it is to be supposed, that the express positive lien, given to the ca. sa. by the legislature, must prevail over the lien of the judgment, which is only an implication of the judges from the right to sue out an elegit; in other words, that express legislation is paramount to judicial inference. And then, if there be two judgment creditors, and the younger sue out a capias, and this process be executed, he gets an indefeasible advantage over the elder judgment creditor, though he resort to an elegit within the year. Or if there be two judgment creditors, and both sue out writs of ca. sa. but the younger resorts to that process first, and has it executed; nay, if the elder first sue out his capias, but the younger has his first executed; the younger gets priority over the elder.

The sweeping construction of this new and untried provision, which leads to consequences like these, ought not to be upheld by the court, unless it be unavoidable. Happily, it is not so. The lien with which the provision endues the capias from the date of its execution, must be viewed, in connexion with the previous provisions of the section which gives it, with the mischiefs the lien was given to prevent, and with the laws of insolvency, by means of which the debtor taken in execution, may discharge himself.

Considering the context, one would think it obvious, that the lien given to the ca. sa. executed, in the last sentence of the section, was given only to avoid, more effectually, those acts of the debtor while in execution that are prohibited by *the first sentence of the section (namely, alienations of his land, made by the debtor himself to defraud or disappoint the creditor at whose suit he is in execution) not to avoid the action of the law upon his property, at the suit of other creditors.

Before this new enactment, a debtor charged in execution at the suit of several creditors, might (often very conscientiously, as he might always lawfully) devote his whole property to the satisfaction of some of those creditors, to the exclusion of the rest; and, with or without reason, he was apt to exercise this right of preference, before he availed himself of the laws of insolvency. Very few left much to be administered by the sheriff. The first part of the new section avoided all conveyances of his lands by a debtor in execution, but such as might be made to pay or secure the creditor or creditors at whose suit he should be in execution; and if the provision had stopt there, it would have left him the right of giving preference among them, before he surrendered his effects, in order to his discharge as an insolvent. And, perhaps, the additional provision, which gives a lien to the ca. sa. from the time it is levied, might have been only designed to deprive the debtor of this right of preference among the creditors at whose suit he was in execution, and to prefer each, according to his diligence in having his ca. sa. served.

But the legislature, probably, looked deeper. Before this enactment, a debtor charged in execution, might and frequently did sell his lands to a favoured and indulgent creditor, who had not even brought suit, and thus give him preference to the more diligent creditor, at whose suit he was in execution; and then resorted to the laws of insolvency for a discharge, leaving the land so sold out of his schedule. And this he might lawfully do; Bullock v. Irvine, 4 Munnf. 450. Sometimes, a debtor in execution would convey his land for a feigned debt, or for a fair debt inadequate to the value of the subject, and then resort to the laws of insolvency for relief, without (of course) inserting the land so sold *in his schedule: thus disappointing the creditor at whose suit he was in execution; absolutely, if his conveyance was for a fair debt; if for a feigned debt, unless the creditor could eviscerate the fraud (a work of time and difficulty): while the debtor relied on his confederate, or his favourite, for the restoration of the property, or of the surplus value of it, at a future day, to himself or his family. Nay, as the creditor who sued out a ca. sa. and took his debtor's body in execution, thereby abandoned his right to an elegit, and consequently, the lien of his judgment on the debtor's lands; it was not impossible, in fact or in law, for the debtor to make a fair and valid sale of his lands to a purchaser for the full value; in which case the mischief to the creditor was, that money, easily concealed and dissipated, was substituted for land, a subject fixed, tangible, and incapable of diminution or destruction. Such conveyances by the debtor were preparatory steps to a discharge under the laws for relief of insolvents. They were designed to elude the full surrender of his effects. And perjury was generally necessary to the consummation of the purpose. It was to prevent such practices, frauds and evasions of justice, that this amendment to the law of executions, made the ca. sa. a lien on the debtor's land, from the date of its service. It requires, in effect, that, in order to entitle a debtor to a discharge under the laws of insolvency, all lands sold and conveyed by him while in execution, under whatever pretext, shall be put in his schedule, so that the creditor may have the benefit of them. It gave the creditor a lien on the debtor's land from the date of the service of his ca. sa. to avoid alienations of the debtor while charged in execution, by his own acts, not to avoid transfers of the property made by act of law; to prevent the debtor from contriving and doing injustice to the creditor at whose suit he is in execution, not to hinder the law from doing justice to other creditors, diligently and honestly availing themselves of regular means of coercion. The lien should be held co-extensive with the mischief it was created to remedy, and no more.

265 *It is certain, that this lien can never enure to the benefit of the creditor, until and unless the debtor resort to the laws of insolvency for a discharge. If the debtor die in execution, his lands descend immediately to his heir: the creditor's lien under his capias executed, is gone to the grave with the debtor: not even the saving power of a court of equity can reanimate it. The creditor must resort to a new execution, as provided by the 8th section of the statute of executions; and if he now elect to have satisfaction out of the lands of his deceased debtor, he must begin with a scire facias against the heir or terre-tenant, and can have execution only of a moiety of the lands, which belonged to the debtor at the time of the judgment and subsequent to it. 2 Wms. Saund. 6, 7, notes 1, 4. Thus the lien of the ca. sa. executed, depends at last upon the act of the debtor; upon his obtaining a discharge, as an insolvent debtor. He may defeat the lien by omitting to obtain such a discharge.

It should be considered, that whatever extent the court shall allow to this statutory lien of a ca. sa. executed as to the debtor's lands, that same extent it must allow to the lien with which a subsequent statute endues a ca. sa. in regard to the debtor's personal property. The act of 1820, ch. 34, § 4, provides, that every writ of ca. sa. shall bind the property of the goods of the debtors, from the time such writ shall be levied. So that, now, no one can purchase the most trivial chattel, any more than the land, of a person in execution for debt, without being bound to account for the subject and the profits to the creditor, whenever the debtor shall be discharged as an insolvent; and no one can sell him food or raiment while he is in custody, without being bound to account for the price with interest. The debtor is laid, in a manner, under sentence of excommunication. This severity may serve the purpose of compelling him to a prompt surrender of his effects to his creditor. But it is hard to imagine any rational purpose which the legislature could have had in view, if it really intended to provide, that the lien of a ca. sa. executed, at the suit of one creditor, 266 *shall not only suspend the debtor's dealings, but suspend too all other process of execution against him; for this will be the effect of giving this lien the extent contended for. If another creditor sue out a fieri facias, levy it on the debtor's chattels, and make his money, he will have to account for the amount with interest, to the creditor who has previously taken the body, whenever the debtor shall be discharged as an insolvent: or, the purchaser under the fieri facias, will be bound to surrender the property, and account for the profits. So, if another creditor sue out an elegit, and extend the lands of the debtor in execution, he will be bound, whenever the debtor shall be discharged as insolvent, to restore the land and account for the profits. For if the lien extend to the subject, it must extend to the profits likewise. This will place a debtor in execution, in a situation the reverse of an outlawry: all others will be in a state of outlawry as to him. Some debtors may choose, and even contrive, to be taken under a ca. sa. and instead of fraudulent alienations of debtors in execution, we may expect collusive judgments and collusive writs of ca. sa. No prudent creditor can give his debtor a moment's indulgence, if he be at all embarrassed with other debts. No creditor, who shall regard only his own interest, will ever resort to any other process of execution but the ca. sa. And this process will, in practice, so soon as its effect shall be understood, supersede all other kinds of execution. Whatever the legislature intended by these provisions, it never could have intended this.

Johnson, for the appellee, agreed that the question was fairly stated by the appellant's counsel; and he maintained the affirmative of it.

The 10th section of the statute of executions, on the construction of which the question depends, arose from a doubt which had attended the interpretation of the 8th and 9th sections, as I happen to know personally, and as, indeed, is plainly to be inferred from the language of the 10th section,

267 *and from the place it holds in relation to the two former. The 8th section had given new process of execution against the lands of a debtor dying in execution; and the 9th had provided, that such execution should not be levied on those lands which the debtor, after the date of the judgment against him, had sold bona fide for the payment of any creditor at whose suit he was in execution. It had been thought that, as this proviso exempted from execution, those lands only, which were sold for the satisfaction of the creditors at whose suit the debtor was in execution, all other sales and alienations, made while he was in execution, were void as to those creditors. This opinion had been adopted by the late chancellor Brown of Staunton, and had been the basis of one of his early decrees. He acted on it again, in the case of Bullock v. Irvine; and, in that case, extended it further, perhaps, than its reason would warrant; for though Bailey (the debtor there), while in execution at the suit of several creditors, sold his lands in satisfaction of one who had never sued him, yet the plaintiff Irvine was not one of the creditors at whose suit he was in execution, had no judgment against him at the time, and brought his suit, upon a judgment rendered afterwards, impeaching Bailey's sale as fraudulent. This court reversed the chancellor's decree; and though it did not, in terms, overrule his construction of the 8th and 9th sections of the statute, the principles of its decree were thought by many to be in conflict with the chancellor's opinion. Very soon after this case was reported, the reversal furnished the occasion to settle the law on this subject; and this 10th section declared and enacted it accordingly.

The purpose of the first clause of this section, was to avoid alienations of land made by a debtor in execution, unless made for the benefit of the creditor; that of the second, to make the execution a lien on the land, and fix the time when that lien should commence. There is no question as to the construction of the first clause: it clearly makes void, as to the creditor at whose suit the debtor is in execution, 268 tion, *every sale, conveyance and transfer of lands made by the debtor while in execution, unless it be bona fide, absolute, and for the benefit of such creditor. The second clause declares, with equal clearness, that the execution "shall bind the real estate of the defendant, from the time when it shall be levied." And the question upon this clause, is not as to the existence of the lien, or the time of its commencement, but as to its character: does it overreach voluntary alienations only? or has it preference also to alienations by act of the law?

I concede, that the lien of the prior judgment does not aid the lien of the execution; and that he who claims under a levied ca. sa. must rely wholly on the lien with which the statute has endowed it.

The language of the statute is general, not importing a restricted lien, and is appropriate to create a lien giving preference as well over judgment creditors as over purchasers. The lien of the judgment, so long known to the english law, is a mere implication from the statute of Westminster giving the elegit, and that lien gives preference to one judgment creditor over another judgment creditor, as well as over a subsequent purchaser. The express lien given by our statute to the ca. sa. executed, cannot in reason be less efficacious than the implied lien given to the judgment by the english statute. Judges and jurists, in speaking of the effect of the english statute, tell us, habitually, that the judgment binds the land of the debtor from its date. The law of England and the law of Virginia employ the same language in describing the effect of judgments and executions on the property of the defendants: the judgment binds the lands, the delivery of a fi. fa. binds the personal property. Our statute adopting this language, so familiar to the profession, declares that the ca. sa. executed shall bind the real estate from the time of the levy. Bind it to what extent? The plain answer is, to the same extent to which the lands of debtors are bound by other judicial process; so bind it as to give the creditor preference 269 over subsequent purchasers, *and subsequent liens of every kind. No good reason can be perceived for departing from the plain import of the provision, or for restraining its generality. Neither will the strange and mischievous consequences that have been anticipated, follow from our construction.

There is nothing strange or mischievous in the change it makes in the remedy by execution against the body. That remedy, unknown to the common law, was introduced by an ancient english statute, in a form of great severity : when the debtor's body was taken under it, he must die in prison or pay the debt. But, in our law, this execution against the body had been long used, not to punish or oppress, but to compel an unjust debtor to surrender his property for the payment of his debts. He might at any time discharge himself from confinement, by the surrender of all his property. In the mean time, to give an opportunity of bringing that property into fair market, he might take his own time, and was indulged with the privilege of the prison rules. If he surrendered it, it was sold for the payment of his debt, and the surplus, if any, restored to him. If he died in execution, without surrendering his effects, the lien of the judgment was revived, and a new execution might go against his property, with a proviso, that his lands bona fide sold to pay the debt for which he was imprisoned, should not be liable to such execution. When it was found that debtors abused the privilege of the prison rules, by often establishing their home within them, enjoying their property during life, and unjustly delaying the creditor, this privilege was curtailed, and they were required to pay the debt within twelve months after the arrest, surrender their property, or go into close jail. The legislature having gone thus far, to enable the creditor, by means of an execution against the body, to obtain satisfaction from the property of his debtor, and having found these means habitually evaded, by fraudulent sales, by unjust and often feigned preferences, given to indulgent, favourite, or fictitious creditors, it was not strange, that it should go a step farther ; that it should forbid alienations *after the levy of a ca. sa. unless for the purpose of paying the debt, and give to the creditor, whose execution was levied, a preference, from that time, over all creditors having then no lien on the property of the debtor. It was a consistent and rational advance in that path of policy, which led to the single end of subjecting the debtor's whole estate, within a reasonable time, to the payments of his debts.

It is not a consequence of our construction, that the ca. sa. executed will put an end to all questions of priority among judgment creditors, or that the junior judgment creditor may by the levy of a ca. sa. displace the lien of a prior judgment, or that the lands of a debtor in execution, will be locked up from the process of other creditors.

The judgment creditor, who sues out an execution against the body of his debtor, and levies it, surrenders thereby the lien of his judgment, by having elected this process of execution ; and that lien can never be revived, but by the death of the debtor in execution, or his escape, or rescue. In lieu of the lien so surrendered, he obtains the statutory lien of the execution, commencing at the date of the levy. This lien has no relation back ; it affects no prior right of creditor or purchaser ; every fair purchaser and judgment creditor, whose rights are prior in time, have preference by law. 'Every judgment creditor, therefore, whose judgment is prior to the levy of the capias, may sue out his elegit, which will have preference to the capias. So, too, a judgment rendered after the levy of the ca. sa. will sustain an elegit levied upon the lands of the debtor in custody. The levy of such elegit will be valid, till the lien of the capias be consummated by the oath of insolvency, or till it be superseded by an elegit issued after the death of the debtor in custody. Meantime, the tenant by elegit will be entitled to the rents and profits in satisfaction of his debt ; and whenever evicted, will have the same remedies upon his judgment for the recovery of the balance, as are given to every other evicted tenant by elegit. The lien given by the statute to the capias levied, does not bind the meane profits. It binds the land 271 *only, and the profits can no more be sequestered, under this lien, prior to its consummation by the oath of insolvency, than they would be under the lien of a judgment before its consummation by an elegit, or under the lien of a mortgage before its forfeiture. The statutory lien of the execution, was intended to preserve the lands of the debtor in custody, so that when surrendered under the oath of insolvency, they might be delivered up for the benefit of the creditor with no other incumbrance than that which bound them on the day of the arrest.

Encountering, then, none of the anticipated mischiefs in our construction of the law, why should we depart from the plain import of its words, and hold, that the lien was given only to avoid those acts of the debtor, that are prohibited by the first sentence of the section, or to regulate the preference between several creditors, at whose suit the debtor was in execution ?

If it be admitted, that the legislature meant to give one creditor a preference over another creditor, the admission surrenders the argument, that the second clause in the sentence is to be limited by the first. What reason can there be, why the legislature would prefer a creditor whose execution is levied to-day, over one whose execution is levied to-morrow, and that without reference to the dates of their respective judgments, and yet allow a subsequent creditor to obtain a judgment, while the lien of both executions is in full force, and by an elegit gain a preference over them both ?

Again, nothing would be easier than to evade the restrain upon alienations imposed on the debtor, if a subsequent judgment creditor were allowed to have a preferable lien. The debtor in execution, who could not sell, might nevertheless contract debts, confess judgments, suffer his whole real estate to be extended by elegits, and then discharge himself by the oath of insolvency. There is, in truth, no safety, in the interpretation of this statute, but by following its plain letter and obvious spirit.

272 *It will be time enough to interpret the subsequent act of 1820, declaring the lien of the ca. sa. on the personal property of the defendant, when a case shall arise under it. It does not follow, however, that the two statutes must necessarily receive the same interpretation, though they should be found to employ the same words. Nothing is more usual than to construe the same words differently, when applied to different subjects; and, especially, when these subjects are real and personal property. When the statute of 1819 declares, that the capias shall bind the lands, from the time of its levy, it is manifestly proper to interpret this lien, by analogy, to other liens on real estate: and when the act of 1820, declares, that the capias shall bind the personal estate, from the time of its levy, it may be equally proper to interpret this lien, by analogy to other liens on personalty. The act which declares, that the fi. fa. shall bind the personal property, from the time of its delivery, may furnish that analogy, and, with many reasons ab inconvenienti, may justify the opinion, that the lien of the capias levied will not save the personal property of the debtor, from seizure and sale under a subsequent fi. fa.

CARR, J. Though several questions were raised and discussed, in the argument of this cause, there is but one which seems to me worthy of consideration by the court. That is a question wholly new, and very important. I sincerely wish, therefore, that it had been heard by a full court. It was said at the bar, that there is another case in court involving the same point: and, so far as I am concerned, I shall be perfectly willing, when that shall come before us, to hear the point again argued.

The question arises upon the 10th section of the statute concerning executions; a provision first introduced at the revision of 1819. As the law stood, up to that date, when a debtor charged in execution died, the party at whose suit he was so charged, might sue out new execution against his lands and goods: but such new execution could 273 not be taken *against any lands, tenements or hereditaments, which the person dying in execution, should, at any time after the judgment or judgments on which he was so charged, have sold bona fide for the payment of any of his creditors, at whose suit he should have been in execution, and the money paid; or secured to be paid, to any such creditors with their privity, in discharge of his or their debts, or some part thereof. These provisions of the former law were retained at the revision, and from the 8th and 9th sections of the revised act. And then follows the new section.

In the case before us, Heiskell had a ca. sa. levied on Thompson: and while he was in execution upon it, the commonwealth obtained judgment against him, took out a fi. fa. and under it sold his tenement in Clarkeburg to the defendant Jackson. Thompson afterwards swore out. And the question arising under this new provision of the law, is, whether the lien of Heiskell's ca. sa. do not overreach the sale of the commonwealth and the title of Jackson?

If we take the literal meaning of the words, it would seem to decide the question at once: for they say that the ca. sa. shall bind the estate of the debtor, from the time of the levy; and here the levy was before the judgment of the commonwealth, and the ca. sa. in full force, when the sale took place. It was strongly contended, however, at the bar, that this would be giving the law a meaning much too large, and going far beyond the mischief intended to be cured. That mischief was said to be this, that a debtor in jail might give preference to some ca. sa. creditors over others; and the object of this clause was to take away such power, and give the ca. sa. creditors priority according to the levy of their executions. If a judge might be permitted the expression, I should say, I wish this were the true construction: for, it seems to me, that there is a harshness in the other, not in harmony with the general humanity of the law. It seems to hold out an invitation to creditors to take the bodies of their debtors. But such considerations can have no weight with the judge, where the 274 words of the law are *plain, and the meaning clear: and to me it seems that they are so here. The "ca. sa. shall bind the real estate from the time it shall be levied:" bind the real estate, how? not sub modo, but without exception. I can only understand it to mean, that from the moment the ca. sa. is levied, there is a lien which attaches to the real estate, and which, when the state of things happens that shall give it activity, will overreach every subsequent lien, incumbrance or sale. A creditor gets his judgment and levies his ca. sa. So long as the debtor chooses to remain in execution, the lien is dormant. When he swears out, it is awakened into life and activity, and vests in the sheriff a right to recover for the creditors (each in his turn) all land, to which the debtor had title on the date of the levy. But it looks not beyond the levy. If A. and B. have judgments, A.'s being prior, and B. levies a ca. sa. and then A. takes an elegit, he can never be disturbed by the lien of B.'s ca. sa. because his judgment was before it.

It was said this construction changes wholly the nature and effects of the ca. sa. And this is most true. But the legislature had the right to do this; and its words are so plain, that I am compelled to believe it meant to do it. If inconveniences are found to follow, the same hand which gave the wound, must administer the cure.

GREEN, J. Of the various objections taken to this decree, only one requires serious examination; that which presents the question, Whether a ca. sa. executed, and the discharge of the debtor afterwards under the act for the relief of insolvent debtors, so binds the debtor's lands, as to give the creditor a right to satisfaction out of them, against a purchaser of the same lands, before the discharge of the debtor, under a writ of fieri facias upon a judgment of the commonwealth, obtained after the service of the ca. sa.?

This depends upon the true construction of our act of 1819, declaring that all executions of ca. sa. shall bind the defendant's real estate, from the time when they shall be *levied; a provision extended 275 to personal property by an act of 1820-21. These provisions seem, at first view, very odd, and almost unintelligible.

Before they were enacted, a ca. sa. whether executed or not, neither bound nor in any way affected the debtor's property, real or personal: and these new enactments provide no means, by which to render the binding force given to a ca. sa. executed, available to the creditor. We can readily understand, how a judgment binds a moiety of the debtor's land; because it may be taken by elegit: how a fiel facias bound the debtor's goods, from its date at the common law, and from its delivery to the sheriff by statute; because they might be taken under it, notwithstanding an alienation after the date in the one case, and after the delivery of the writ to the sheriff in the other: and how a writ of warrantia chartæ, or a writ against an heir upon the obligation of his ancestor, binds all the lands of the defendant in the one case, and all the assets descended in the other, from their dates; because upon the judgments in such suits, the land itself may be taken. But there is some difficulty in comprehending how any proceeding, under which no property can be taken, without the assent of the debtor, can bind it, or in what way, or to what purpose or extent. Yet these provisions certainly meant to give some new capacity to the ca. sa. when executed; and it is our duty, to inquire into the true object of the law, and to carry it into effect by the means intended, if that can be ascertained, or otherwise, by means most convenient and conformable to the general spirit of our legislation. To this end, an attention to the state of the law, when these provisions were introduced, is necessary.

Before the statute of 21 Jac. 1, ch. 24, after a ca. sa. executed, the creditor had no further remedy upon his judgment, even if the debtor died in execution, except perhaps in the case of an escape. That statute authorized the creditor, in case the debtor died in execution, to resort to new executions against the debtor's lands and goods, as if he had never been taken in execution, with a proviso exempting *all lands, which the debtor might have sold bona fide for the payment of any of his creditors, and the money so applied. The provisions of that statute were incorporated into our code in 1726, with slight verbal variations, not varying the effect. And so the law continued until the revival of 1792, when it was so changed, as to exempt only such lands as the debtor might have sold bona fide for the payment of any of his creditors at whose suit he was in execution, and the money so applied with their privity.

This was the state of the law, when the provision in question, in respect to lands, was introduced at the revival of 1819. Still, as at the common law, a creditor, at whose suit the debtor was taken or charged in execution, could have no further remedy upon his original judgment, unless the debtor died in execution, or perhaps in the case of an escape; and then, he was remitted to his remedies upon his original judgment, in no degree strengthened by the circumstance that the debtor had been in execution. But, if the debtor was discharged from custody under the acts for the relief of insolvent debtors, these statutes did not apply to the case; and while in custody he might dispose as he pleased, provided it were done bona fide, of all his property, real and personal, which the creditor could not in any way reach or subject to his demand. Bullock v. Irvine, 4 Munf. 450. Again, one of the effects of our acts for the relief of insolvent debtors, was to distribute all the effects of such a debtor, amongst all his creditors, at whose suit he was in execution, pari passu, without regard to the dates of their judgments or executions, or of the levying of them.

At the revival of 1819, the former provisions, in respect to the case of debtor's dying in execution, were retained unaltered; and two new provisions introduced, 1. that every conveyance, &c. of lands made by a debtor charged in execution shall be void as to the creditors at whose suit he is in execution, unless it be absolute and bona fide and made to pay or secure the debts of such creditors, and the proceeds paid or secured to be paid to them (dropping 277 the *words, "with their privity," found in the preceding section). 2. "And that all executions of ca. sa. shall bind the real estate of the defendant, from the time when they shall be levied."

These provisions were certainly not intended to apply to the case of a debtor dying in execution; for that had been provided for in the sections immediately preceding, in a different way: in some respects more beneficial to the creditor, remitting him to the original lien of his judgment, and overreaching all alienations since its date, unless made for his satisfaction, whereas the section in question affected no lands alienated in any way before the levying of the capias: in some particulars less beneficial, the ca. sa. binding all, the original judgment only a moiety, of the debtor's land. Nor were they intended to apply to the case of an escape; in which case, the creditor might perhaps resort to other executions on his judgment; or if not, there are no means in that case, by which any effect can be given to the binding force of the ca. sa., and, especially, those provisions cannot apply to the case of an escape, if there be any other case, to which they can be applied with effect, in the ordinary course prescribed by law. And that, I think, is the case of a discharge of the debtor under the acts for the relief of insolvent debtors, in which case, all his alienations, unless made for the payment of the creditors at whose suit he is in execution being avoided by the provision under consideration, the lands so alienated would vest in the sheriff for the benefit of those creditors, to be distributed among them pari passu, but for the provision declaring that each execution binds the property from the time it was levied, which establishes the priorities amongst them, according to the dates of the levies. And this, I think, was one of the purposes of that provision; whilst the other was, to deprive the debtor in execution, of the privilege which he before had of giving a preference amongst his creditors and disposing of his property ad libitum, if it was done bona fide, and their swearing out of jail, and thus wholly frustrating the cred-

278 *But then comes the question, which this case presents, Whether these provisions affect the rights of third persons, obtaining judgments against the debtor, and taking his property in execution while he is in custody? I doubt, whether this consequence was in the contemplation or design of the legislature; but it seems to be necessary and unavoidable; for the same quality given to the ca. sa. executed, which, by binding the property, establishes priorities amongst the creditors at whose suit the debtor is in execution, must, from its very nature, and being given in general terms, operate throughout, and affect alike the rights of all persons indiscriminately.

I am sensible of the great harshness, and (in its practical application) inconveniences, of this new law: but those considerations belong to the legislature, and not to the courts of justice. There are, however, many palliating circumstances, and such as may prevent the consequence anticipated in the argument of his cause, that the execution of ca. sa. will be universally resorted to. In the first place, the law is totally unavailing, unless the debtor be discharged under the insolvent debtor's acts; for, in no other case, is there any means of enforcing it. And the debtor's lands may be extended under any judgment, rendered in favour of any other creditor, at any time before the levying of the ca. sa. and the extent cannot be disturbed, if the debtor be discharged as an insolvent, even though the judgment, under which he was in execution be anterior in date to that extended. So, an extent may be levied upon any judgment obtained while the debtor is in execution, and the property enjoyed as long as he remains in custody; and, unless he is discharged as an insolvent, the tenant by elegit cannot be affected, otherwise than he would have been liable to be affected if the ca. sa. had never issued, that is, by an extent on the prior judgment. And the whole of the personal property of the debtor in custody, may be taken in execution under any judgment no matter when obtained, or sold by him; and unless he avail himself of the acts for the relief of in-

279 solvent debtors, dying in execution or escaping, the creditor at whose suit he was in execution, can never, by any means, subject the property or its proceeds so sold or taken in execution.

In strictness, Thompson's interest in the lot in question, could not be taken in execution nor transferred to Jackson, by the sheriff's sale under the execution, it not being such a trust as is subjected to execution by our statute. Yet the execution delivered to the sheriff, bound his right in equity, as it would have bound it at law, if his title had been legal, or such a trust as is subjected by the statute to execution. And Jackson's purchase entitles him to be substituted to the rights of the commonwealth, to the extent of the price paid by him; and if the execution of the commonwealth had a priority over the rights of Heiskell, he might have availed himself thereof. In a court of equity, therefore, the rights of the parties, such as they are, have the same effect as if they had been legal.

CABELL, J., said he concurred in the opinion of his brethren: but the point was one which ought to be argued before a full court, and whenever it should arise again, he should be ready to re-consider it.

The decree was affirmed.

Same v. Sehon.

(Absent CARR. J.)*

Court of Chancery—Marshal—Failure to Reappoint after Three Years—Liability of Sureties.—A marshal of the court of chancery (an officer appointed by and holding during the pleasure of the court, required to give bond with surety for due discharge of his office, which the court is required to have renewed from time to time at intervals not exceeding three years) on being appointed gives bond with sureties; but no new bond is required within three years; and he continues in his office. HELD, the sureties are answerable for his misconduct after the expiration of three years.

When Officers Must Account for Clerk's Tickets.—If a clerk's tickets be delivered after 1st June in any year, to sheriff or marshal for collection, he is not bound to account for them on 1st November following, nor before 1st November in the next year.

Isaac Heiskell was appointed by the chancellor marshal of the court of chancery of Clarksburg, May 22, 1817; and with the appellants, Coplin and others, his sureties, executed an official bond, on the same day, conditioned according to law, for the payment of all moneys which he might receive by virtue of his office, and for the faithful discharge of all the other duties thereof. The court did not cause this bond to be renewed, at any time within three years from its date, or after the expiration of three years, as the statute directs. See 1 Rev. Code, ch. 66, § 62, 3, p. 209, 10.

Heiskell, in his official character, under a decree of the court of chancery, collected 254 dollars due to M'Calley, October 18, 1822. He failed to pay the money to M'Calley: who thereupon made a motion against him and Coplin and others, his sureties, in the court of chancery, for a judgment for the money, so collected and withheld, and damages at the rate of 15 per cent. per ann. thereon. The chancellor gave judgment for the principal sum of 254 dollars, with damages at the rate of 6 per cent. per ann. and costs. The sureties, Coplin and others, appealed to this court.

281 *On the 5th June 1821, Sehon, the clerk of the court of chancery, put into Heiskell's hands sundry accounts or tickets (as they are commonly called) for fees accruing for his official services, to be collected by him as marshal. See 1 Rev. Code, ch. 85, § 21, 24, 29, p. 319, 321. Heiskell failing to account for and pay the amount of fees collected by him, Sehon made a motion in the circuit court of Harrison, against him and his sureties, for judgment for the balance of the fees unaccounted for, with damages according to law. And the circuit court gave him judgment for 446 dollars (the balance of the fees collected and unaccounted for by the marshal) with damages thereon, to be computed from the 1st November 1821, at the rate of 6 per cent. per ann. and costs. And the sureties appealed to this court.

The causes were (of course) heard together here.

Leigh for the appellants. I. The official bond of the marshal did not bind the sureties for any act or omission of the marshal, after the expiration of three years from its date. Though the statute provides, that the marshal shall hold his office during the pleasure of the court, and shall give bond with sufficient sureties, conditioned for the payment of all moneys he shall receive by virtue of his office; yet it also imperatively directs, that "the court shall cause the official bond to be renewed from time to time, as occasion shall require, not exceeding in any case three years;" and provides, that such new bond "shall supersede the former so far only, as that the sureties in the former, shall be in no manner liable under it, for any act done, or for any omission, after the date of the latter." Now, the sureties of the marshal contracting the obligation under and in pursuance of the provisions of this statute, those provisions enter into, explain, and limit the extent of, their obligation. They contract the obligation, in the faith that the court will perform the duty imposed on it by the statute, and require a new bond of the officer, at the expiration of three years at most: 282 they bind *themselves, then, for the good conduct of the officer during that time at most. If the bond had been renewed as required, and at the time required by law, the appellants would not have been responsible for the neglect of the marshal to account for and pay the moneys he collected for the appellees: the new bond would have been the security for his good conduct in regard to those collections. It was the duty of the court to have the bond renewed, at the expiration of three years, not the duty of the sureties to see that it was done: it was owing to the omission of the court, that a new bond was not taken: and to hold the sureties of the marshal liable for these moneys, is, in effect, to make them responsible for the inadvertence of the court, as much as for the fault of the officer. The case is analogous, in principle, to that class of cases, in which it has been held that a bond for an officer's faithful performance of an office of limited duration, during his continuance in office generally, though the officer be in fact continued in the office after the term, is binding on the sureties, only for his conduct during the existing term of office. Arlington v. Merricke, 2 Wms. Saund. 412-414, note 5; Commonwealth v. Fairfax, 4 Hen. & Munf. 208. There can be no just distinction, as to the obligation of the sureties, between the case where the office is limited by law to a certain term, and the case where the official bond is limited to a certain term, as is the case here.

II. As to Sehon's case: 1st, He had no right to the summary remedy by motion, in this case, for his fees collected by the marshal. All those summary statutory remedies, trenching upon the common law, are to be confined strictly to the cases in which the statute expressly gives them. The statute provides (1 Rev. Code, ch. 85, § 21, p. 319), that the clerks shall deliver their accounts of fees to the collecting officers, annually, before the 1st June, and (Id. § 24), that the officers shall account for and pay them on or before the 1st November; and gives the motion for fees so delivered, and not so accounted for. Here the fees were delivered 283 *to the officer on the 5th June 1821.

2ndly, At all events, the officer was not bound to account for these fees on the 1st November 1821. At best, they could only be considered as fees delivered for collection before the 1st June 1822, and the officer accountable for them on the 1st November 1822. Therefore, damages (if allowable at all) should not have been computed from November 1821, but only from November 1822. But, 3rdly, Neither damages nor interest should have been given against the sureties. The statute (§ 24), allows damages, not exceeding 15 per cent. per ann. against the principal; but against the sureties (§ 26), it gives a motion for the amount of the fees only.

Johnson, for the appellees. I. The tenure of the marshal's office was during the pleasure of the court. The sureties in his official bond were bound for his good conduct in that office; that is, during his continuance in it. He continued in the office, whether he renewed his official bond or not; the statute not requiring that he should be appointed anew at the expiration of three years, but only directing that his bond should be renewed. The case, then, is not at all analogous to Arlington v. Merricke, and Commonwealth v. Fairfax. The statute, in providing that the chancellor shall cause the bond to be renewed, from time to time as occasion may require, not exceeding in any case three years, is directory to the court; and the purpose of the direction was to take care of the interest of the suitors in the court, not of the sureties of the officer. The statute also plainly intends to hold the sureties in each bond, liable for all acts of the officer, done before the execution of a new bond, whenever it may become executed: for it provides, that the new bond shall supersede the former, so far only, as that the sureties in the former, shall not be liable for acts or omissions after the date of the latter. And any of the sureties had a right at any time, to represent the case to the court, and ask that it should demand another bond.

284 *II. With regard to the clerk's case, the most that can be contended for, is, that his accounts of fees, not having been delivered before the 1st June 1821, are to be considered as fees delivered before the 1st June 1822, so as to make the officer accountable for them on the 1st November 1822.

PER CURIAM. The doctrine of Arlington v. Merricke, and that class of cases, is, that where an official bond is given for the faithful discharge of the duties of an office, by the officer during his continuance in office, and the office is of a certain limited term of duration, though the officer be in fact re-appointed to or continued in the office for another term or longer, the obligation of the bond is only co-extensive with the existing term of office. But the tenure of the marshal's office was during the pleasure of the court: his official bond bound his sureties for his conduct in office: and the obligation of this bond was co-extensive with the duration of this office. The failure of the court to require a new bond, did not determine his office. The statute directs the new bond for the better security of persons interested in the officer's official conduct. It provides, in express words, that the new bond shall supersede the former, so far only as to exempt the sureties in the former, from liability for official acts and omissions after the date of the latter. The marshal's sureties in the first bond, became thereby bound for his official conduct, until his office should be determined by removal or otherwise, or until he should give a new bond.

There is, indeed, an error in M'Calley's case, but it is an error against him. The statute entitled him to damages at the rate of fifteen per cent. per ann. on the amount collected by the marshal for him, and not paid over. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 134, § 48, p. 542, 3. The judgment gives him damages only at the rate of six per cent. Of this he has not complained, and the appellants cannot. This judgment is to be affirmed.

285 *There is error in Sehon's case, prejudicial to the appellants. The appellee's clerk's tickets were delivered to the marshal for collection, after the 1st June 1821, and the officer was not bound to account for them on the 1st November following. Upon a just construction of the fee law, those tickets are to be considered as delivered before the 1st June 1822, and the officer accountable for them on the 1st November 1822. The judgment awards damages to be computed from the 1st November 1821. It ought to have allowed them only from November 1822. This judgment is to be reversed for this cause, and corrected in this respect.

Peter v. Butler.

(Absent BROOKE, P., and CARR, J.)*

Foreign Attachments—Claim on Contract Made Out of State.—A claim arising on contract of bailment made out of Virginia, against a non-resident of Virginia, is a claim for debt, for which a foreign attachment in chancery lies.

Butler, a farmer of Jefferson county, Virginia, had deposited with Peter, a merchant of Georgetown in the district of Columbia, in a warehouse kept there by him for the storage of flour, a parcel of flour, to be kept on storage, and re-delivered on demand: but before the flour was demanded, Peter's warehouse, with whatever flour was in it at the time, was accidentally consumed by fire. And a dispute arose between the parties, which should bear the loss? whether Peter had fairly performed the contract of bailment on his part? and whether or no he was bound, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, to account to Butler for the value of the flour, 286 which he had deposited with "him on storage? Hereupon, Butler, finding persons in Virginia indebted to Peter, proceeded by way of foreign attachment in chancery (1 Rev. Code, ch. 123, p. 474,) exhibiting his bill, in the superiour court of chancery of Winchester, against Peter, as an absent debtor, and against his debtors in Virginia as garnishees, praying a decree for the value of the flour, against Peter, and the attachment and application of the moneys due him in Virginia, to satisfy the claim. Peter, besides making strenuous defence upon the merits, objected to the jurisdiction of the court of chancery. The chancellor sustained the jurisdiction; and, upon the merits, decreed Butler the amount of his claim. And Peter appealed to this court.

The cause was argued here by Leigh for the appellant, and by Wickham and Standard for the appellee.

The facts of the case were much controverted, and several interesting questions of law were discussed, both in the court of chancery, and here: but, in the view of this court, the cause turned wholly on the questions of fact. These the court decided against the appellant, and affirmed the decree.

The only point of law involved in the decision, was the question of jurisdiction. This court concurred with the chancellor, that a claim, arising on a contract of bailment made out of Virginia, against a non-resident of Virginia, is such a claim for debt, for which the foreign attachment in chancery is a proper remedy.

Wills—Not Duly Executed as to Real Estate—Effect after Seven Years.—Will, disposing of real and personal estate, but not duly executed as to the real, was admitted to probat by county court, in general terms, in 1785, and never contested: HELD, this was full probat: the heir could only have contested the will, by bill in chancery, within seven years: and he, instead of so contesting it having taken as devisee under it, it must be now regarded as a complete will of lands.

Bills of Exception.—Defendant in ejectment, relies on 20 years adverse possession, as a bar: verdict against him, which he moves court to set aside, as contrary to evidence: court overrules the motion: then, he moves court to certify the facts that were proved, which went to establish his 20 years adverse possession: this the court refuses to do. HELD, the court was right in so refusing. Quære, Whether, if the judge, in such case, refuse to certify a proper state of the facts proved, the party may take an exception for that cause, and appeal from the judgment? or ought to tender a fair and full state of the facts proved, and upon the judge refusing to certify it, take evidence of its fairness, and then ask the appellate court for process to compel the judge to sign and seal it?

Ejectment for a small parcel of land, brought by Green against Vaughan, in the circuit court of Halifax. Vaughan filed two bills of exceptions to opinions of the court given at the trial. There was a verdict for Green. Vaughan moved for a new trial: the court overruled the motion, and he excepted to this opinion also. Judgment was then given upon the verdict; and Vaughan appealed to this court.

1. The first bill of exceptions stated, that Green, who claimed title under William Boyd, in order to shew that he (Green) and those he claimed under, had been in possession of the land in controversy, since the grant thereof to col. Byrd, the patentee, offered in evidence, 1. A paper purporting to be a will of William Boyd, wherein all his lands as well as his personal estate, were given to his wife and children: this paper was dated January 2d 1785, and though it appeared not to have been duly executed as a will of lands, the county court of Halifax, at September term 1785, stating that it was exhibited in court as the will of Boyd, and proved by the oaths of two witnesses, admitted it to probat in general terms, recorded it, and granted administration with the will annexed to the testator's widow. *2. An instrument, indorsed on the original will, signed and sealed by Francis Boyd, eldest son and heir of the testator, dated January 5th 1785, whereby reciting that his father had died before he could complete his will, he assented to and confirmed that incomplete will, and relinquished all right and claim to the lands left by his father, except to a share thereof under the will: he acknowledged this deed in the county court, at the same time the will was proved, and it also was recorded. 3. A report of commissioners, appointed by the county court of Halifax, to divide the lands of the testator William Boyd among his children, returned to the court, and recorded September term 1789; whereby one share of land was allotted, in the partition, to the testator's son Francis Boyd, and another share to his son William Patrick; in one or the other of which (it appeared) the land in controversy was included. 4. A deed from William Patrick Boyd to his brother Francis, dated October 16th 1792, and duly recorded; whereby all the land allotted to William Patrick, in the partition of his father's estate, was conveyed to Francis. 5. The will of Francis Boyd, dated October 24th 1802, and duly proved January 24th 1803; whereby he devised all his lands to his wife Clarissa for life, remainder to his children. And 6. A deed from Francis Boyd's devisees to Green, the lessor of the plaintiff, dated September 26th 1810, and duly recorded; whereby they conveyed to Green a tract of land devised to them by Francis Boyd, of which (it appeared) the land in dispute was claimed as parcel. Whereupon, Vaughan's counsel objected to the two papers first above mentioned, (that purporting to be the will of William Boyd, and that indorsed thereon, purporting to be the deed of his heir Francis Boyd) going in evidence to the jury: but the court allowed these papers to go in evidence to the jury, connected with the other evidence in the cause, for the purpose of proving the possession of Green and those under whom he claimed.

289 *The second exception stated, that Vaughan, having introduced witnesses for the purpose of proving, that he had been in possession of the land in dispute, from the latter part of the year 1801, till the institution of this suit, moved the court to instruct the jury, that Green could not succeed in this action, unless he proved that he, or those he claimed under, had been in actual possession thereof within twenty years next before the commencement of the action. This instruction the court refused to give; but it instructed the jury, that, if it should find that Vaughan had held adverse possession for twenty years next before the commencement of the suit, such possession would be a bar to this action. Vaughan excepted.

The third exception was in the following words: "Be it remembered, that after the jury had rendered a verdict in this cause, the defendant's (Vaughan's) counsel moved the court for a new trial, because the verdict was contrary to evidence, the defendant having relied that there was an adverse possession in him and those under whom he claimed, for more than twenty years before the institution of this suit: and the court having overruled the motion for a new trial, the defendant's counsel requested the court to certify the facts which were proved, which went to establish the defendant's adverse possession for twenty years before the institution of this suit: but the court refused to certify the said facts, as requested by the defendant's counsel; and stated that such facts were insulated, and therefore it refused to certify them. And to such opinion of the court, in overruling this motion for a new trial, and in refusing to certify the said facts, the defendant's counsel excepted &c."

Johnson, for the appellant, said, he could not see how the will of William Boyd and the deed of his heir at law assenting thereto, mentioned in the first exception, and objected to as inadmissible evidence, could, both or either, be at all relevant to the point to which it was adduced, namely,

290 the possession of the Boyds (under whom Green claimed) at *the dates of those papers. They only shewed, that W. Boyd, and his family after his death, claimed a right to the land; they did not, they could not, shew possession according to the right claimed. Evidence of a claim was not proper evidence of possession. The will of W. Boyd was not well executed as a will of lands; and though the probat of it in the county court be expressed in general terms, yet the probat ought to be referred to the personal subject, as to which it was a good testament. This paper then proved nothing. The deed of the heir at law, indorsed on the will, was certainly not proper evidence: there was no proof of the execution of it; for, as it was not such a deed as the county court had jurisdiction to receive proof of, the record of the acknowledgment and registry of it there, was not proof of execution. Illegal or improper evidence, however unimportant, ought never to be left to the jury:

per Pendleton, P., in Lee v. Tapscott, 2 Wash. 281, 2; Brown v. May, 1 Munf. 291. Neither ought evidence wholly irrelevant to be admitted, for it can only tend to confuse the jury. See Turner v. Fendall, 1 Cranch, 132.

Upon the second exception, he contended that the instruction proposed by Vaughan, ought to have been given to the jury. Vaughan having proved continual possession in himself, and that unqualified, for twenty years next before the institution of the suit, it behoved Green to prove an actual entry, in order to sustain this action. This was the true meaning of the proposition which Vaughan contended for; and, thus understood, the proposition was correct.

The court erred, in refusing to certify the facts proved touching the point, on which Vaughan insisted that the verdict was contrary to evidence. He relied on twenty years adverse possession in himself, as a bar to the ejectment: if he proved such possession, he was entitled to a verdict: and, therefore, though the facts relating to that point, might have been unconnected with other facts in proof, or (in the language of the court) insulated, yet the party had a right to require that the facts proved touching the possession, should 291 *be stated and certified by the court, as those were the facts, upon which the motion for a new trial was to be determined.

Leigh, for the appellee, contended, that the will of W. Boyd professing to devise the land in 1785, whether the devise were valid in law or not, and the deed of his heir at law relinquishing his right to the land by descent, and agreeing to take a share of it by devise, were acts of ownership exercised over it; and, as no possession inconsistent with the right asserted, was pretended to have existed at the time, and as, in 1789, the land was actually divided among the testator's devisees, so that it was then certainly in possession of his family, the will and the deed of the heir, taken in connexion with the subsequent partition, was evidence, circumstantial if not direct, that W. Boyd at the date of his will, and his family after his death, held the possession. The will was admitted to probat, not only as a will of personality, but generally as the testator's will; and whether the judgment of the court of probat, was right or wrong, it was too late to correct or even to question it. The deed of the heir, assenting to and confirming the devises contained in the will, was apparently a piece of evidence of little importance; but it appears to have been the original deed that was offered in evidence, not an office copy; it was an ancient deed, in conformity with which, as confirming the previous questionable devise of the ancestor, the land was thenceforth held by, and afterwards divided among, the devisees; and such an ancient deed proved itself. Phil. Ev. (N. York ed. 1820) p. 404. Besides, in Lee v. Tapscott, 2 Wash. 276, an office copy of an ancient patent, recorded in the county court, which never had jurisdiction to record patents, was held to be admissible evidence.

As to the second exception, he said, that the instruction which the court was asked to give the jury, was, that Vaughan having adduced evidence for the purpose of proving possession in himself for twenty years next before the ejectment was brought, it was necessary to sustain the action, 292 *that Green should prove that he, or those he claimed under, had had actual possession within the twenty years: that is, as the proposition was propounded to the court, that the introduction of evidence for the purpose of proving his possession, whether the evidence should be satisfactory proof of the fact to the jury or not, and whether if it proved his possession, that possession were an adverse one or not, was enough to put Green to the proof of actual possession in himself or actual entry within the twenty years. And that the court so understood the proposition, and therefore refused to give sanction to it, was manifest from the instruction which it did give: that if Vaughan had held adverse possession for twenty years next before the ejectment was brought, that would be a bar to the action. And this instruction was, undeniable, the law upon the point.

The third exception, he said, might have been inaccurately penned; yet this court could only look to the record for the state of the case. According to the record, Vaughan asked the court to state and certify "the facts which were proved, which went to establish his adverse possession for twenty years," not, all the facts in proof, in relation to that point. Well might the court say, that the facts it was required to certify, were insulated, and refuse to spread a partial state of the case on the record.

A question was made, upon the third exception, and discussed at the bar, but was not noticed in the opinion of the court. Whether, if a motion for a new trial, on the ground of the verdict being contrary to evidence, be overruled by the court, and the court then refuse to state and certify the facts proved at the trial, the party may take an exception to such refusal of the court to state and certify the facts proved, and complained of that as error, in the appellate court? Or, whether, in such case, it be not the proper and the only course for the party aggrieved, to have a correct state of the facts proved at the trial, set forth in a bill of exceptions, and require the judge to put his seal thereto, and if the judge refuse, then to take affidavits that his 293 state of the facts *is correct, and apply to the appellate court for process to compel the judge to sign and seal his bill of exceptions?

CARR, J. The proper court of probat, in 1785, admitted the paper purporting to be the will of William Boyd, to full probat, had it recorded, and granted administration under it. There has never been any bill filed, or attempt made in any other form, to impeach it. And, in 1823, thirty-eight years after the probat, it is objected, that this will shall not be introduced in evidence, in a contest about the lands held under it. I do not think this objection can be sustained on any ground. In Bagwell v. Elliott, 2 Rand. 198, West v. West, 3 Rand. 373, and Nalle v. Fenwick, 4 Rand. 585, this court decided, that a will admitted to probat by the proper court, could only be contested by bill; and that, no party appearing within seven years to contest the will, "the probat shall be forever binding." The circuit court, therefore, committed no error in suffering this will to go to the jury. Nor can I see what possible effect the instrument indorsed on the will could have: it could neither add to nor take from the will, being merely the assent of the heir.

The second bill of exceptions states, that the defendant introduced witnesses for the purpose of proving, that he had been in possession of the land in controversy, more than twenty years; and then moved the court to instruct the jury, that the plaintiff could not support ejectment, unless he, or those under whom he claimed, had been in actual possession of the land within twenty years. The court refused, but instructed the jury, that if it should be of opinion, that the defendant had had adverse possession of the land, for twenty years before the institution of the suit, such possession would bar the plaintiff's right to recover in this action. Ejectment is an action of trespass. When first this remedy was applied to the trial of disputed titles, the term was created, by the party claiming title making an actual entry upon the disputed premises, accompanied by another, to whom, while on the lands, he sealed and delivered a lease for years. It

294 *is from the necessity of this entry, that the remedy by ejectment is confined to cases, in which the claimant has a right to the possession: where only a right of property, or a right of action, remained to him, the entry would be illegal, and of course not sufficient to enable the party making it, to convey a title to his lessee. And, as the principles of the action remain the same, though the proceedings be changed, the right to make an entry is still requisite, though no actual entry be now necessary. Whatever takes away this right of entry, and turns it to a right of action, deprives the claimant, of the remedy by ejectment, though the legal title may still remain in him. Our statute of limitations (following 21 Jac. 1, c. 16, § 1,) enacts, that "no person, who hath any right or title of entry into any lands &c. shall make any entry but within twenty years after such right or title accrued;" saving to persons under the disabilities enumerated in the proviso, ten years after such disabilities removed. The possession of the defendant gives him a right against every man who cannot establish a good title: the plaintiff, therefore, must recover on his own strength. The defendant may meet his claim, either by shewing title in himself and those under whom he claims, or he may rest intirely on his possession: when he does this last, he must shew in himself and those under whom he claims, a possession of twenty years adverse to the claim of the plaintiff. When he relies on possession, the idea of right is excluded. 9 Johns. Rep. 180. Nothing less, therefore, than the twenty years required by the statute, will do; nor even this, if the plaintiff can bring himself within any of the savings. The circuit court, then, was right in refusing to instruct the jury, that the plaintiff must shew actual possession within twenty years; and the instruction given would have been intirely correct, if after telling the jury, that twenty years adverse possession, if proved by the defendant in himself and those under whom he claimed, would bar the plaintiff's action, the court had added, unless the plaintiff could bring himself within some saving of the statute. This 295 omission however *is of no moment, as the plaintiff against whom it was calculated to operate, was satisfied with it.

Then, as to the third exception. In the case of Bennett v. Hardaway, 6 Munf. 125, there was a verdict for the plaintiff on the general issue: a motion for a new trial was made, and overruled: the defendant excepted to the opinion of the court, and prayed that the evidence might be certified of record, and that being done, appealed. This court, upon reasons given at large, shewing the inconvenience of the practice, was of opinion, that the bill of exceptions, because it brought up the whole evidence, was not properly taken, and therefore furnished no ground to reverse the judgment: it therefore affirmed it. But, taking up a point not then before it, the court proceeded thus: "Whether a party can, overruling a motion for a new trial, on the alleged ground of the verdict being contrary to evidence, require the judge to state in a bill of exceptions, the facts as they appeared in evidence to him, and carry up the case to the appellate court thereupon, is a different question. We are inclined to think, it has been affirmatively settled, by the admissions of this court, and the practice of the country." After several further remarks, tending to shew the advantages of this mode of proceeding over the other, the court concluded thus: "For this reason, and because we see none of the evils resulting, which exist in the case before us, we should be disposed to entertain a bill of exceptions of the description last mentioned." I do not consider this case as settling, authoritatively, the question, whether an appellate court can reverse the decision of an inferior tribunal, refusing a new trial moved for on the ground of a verdict being contrary to evidence; nor have I met with any case in our books, where the point has come directly before the court, and been discussed and examined: yet it seems to be considered as settled, and (my brethren think) correctly settled by the above case, and others that have since passed sub silentio. If this were still an open point, I confess I should think, with the su-

296 preme court of the U. States, that an appellate court ought not to review the decision of the court who heard the evidence. It seems to me impossible, that any certificate, either of the whole evidence, or of the facts which the court may certify as proved, can give to the appellate court such a view of the real ground, as to enable it to pronounce upon the judgment of the court below: it cannot see or hear the witnesses: and when the jury has found the verdict, and the court which presided agrees with it, I should think it safest for the ends of justice, and best for the parties, that there should be an end to the matter. This, however, is my opinion simply: the point is considered as settled differently.

But still, I think, the court, in the case before us, committed no error in refusing the certificate asked for. The counsel (it will be remarked) did not ask for a certificate of all the facts that were proved, touching the adverse possession, but of such facts only as went to establish his adverse possession. If the court had complied with this request, we should have been presented with the evidence on one side only, all the countervailing evidence, being shut out. The very reason which the court gives, for refusing to certify as requested, shews that it so understood it; such evidence (it said) would be insulated. The court was clearly right in refusing to give this one-sided certificate.

I think the judgment must be affirmed; with less hesitation, indeed, as this is an action in which a judgment does not preclude another trial of the right.

The other judges concurred; and the judgment was affirmed.

[19 Am. Dec. 750.]

Mortgages—Foreclosure*—Case at Bar.—Mortgage of land, slaves and stock: chancellor, in May 1822, decrees foreclosure, and directs his marshal, unless the debt be paid within six months, to sell the subject to satisfy the debt: mortgagor is allowed to retain possession, and sows crop in spring of 1823: marshal sells the subject in June 1823, and mortgagee purchases it, and completes crop: afterwards, and before marshal's sale reported and confirmed, creditors of mortgagor levy fi. fa. on crop of 1823, then gathered. Held.

1. Same—Same—Growing Crops.—Vendee at marshal's sale entitled to the then growing crop.
2. Same—Same—Emblements.—Tho' mortgagor in possession be tenant at will to then growing crop, yet doctrine of emblements does not apply to his case.
3. Same—Same—Protection of Vendee.—Chancellor ought, in such case, to protect vendee's property in the crop, by injoining mortgagor's creditors from proceeding under their execution.

Judicial Sales—When Absolute.—In Cocke v. Gilpin, 1 Rob. 39, and note, it is said a purchaser at a judicial sale acquires no right until a confirmation of the sale by the court, and until the order confirming the report, he is only inchoately and not absolutely a purchaser having till then no fixed interest in the subject. That such is the English doctrine is well settled. The same doctrine has been recognized by this court in several cases, Crews v. Pendleton, 1 Leigh 297; Heywood v. Covington, 4 Leigh 373; Taylor v. Cooper, 10 Leigh 317, from the first of which it will be seen that before the confirmation of the report and conveyance of the title, the purchaser must resort to that tribunal in which the proceedings were had, for the adjustment and enforcement of his claim. For this last proposition the principal case is cited in the last named case and Terry v. Coles, 80 Va. 708. See also, citing the principal case on the first proposition laid down, foot-note to Hudgins v. Marchant, 28 Gratt. 177; Kable v. Mitchell, 9 W. Va. 515; Childs v. Hurd, 25 W. Va. 538. See monographic note on "Judicial Sales" appended to Walker v. Page, 21 Gratt. 638.

+Sale of Land—Growing Crops.—For the proposition that, if land is sold without any reserve, all the crops, not severed, will pass to the purchaser, the principal case is cited and approved in Kerr v. Hill, 27 W. Va. 606, 614. See monographic note on "Mortgages" appended to Forkner v. Stuart, 6 Gratt. 197.

Crews, and William, Betsey and Nancy Brydie, two tracts of land in Amherst, about forty slaves, sundry household furniture, and stocks of horses, cattle, sheep and hogs, to secure payment of a debt of 8,320 dollars due by him to Crews, and a debt of 10,081 dollars which he owed to the Brydies. The deed appointed the 20th day of the same month for the payment of the first debt, and the 25th for the payment of the last; and provided, that the mortgagor should hold and enjoy the subject till he should make default of payment; and that, from and after such default, the mortgagees might "enter upon, have, hold, possess and enjoy," the whole subject real and personal, "and receive and take the rents, issues and profits thereof, without hindrance &c. until the debts should be fully paid off and discharged."

Shortly after the execution of the mortgage, several creditors of the mortgagor (the appellee Pendleton was one of them) sued out writs of fieri facias against him, and caused them to be levied on some of the mortgaged slaves; and the mortgagees, in October 1819, exhibited their bill against the mortgagor, and against the creditors whose executions had been so levied, setting forth their rights under the mortgage, 298 *praying an injunction to stay further proceedings upon the executions, a foreclosure of the mortgagor's equity of redemption, and a sale of the mortgaged subject to satisfy the debts thereby secured to the mortgagees. The injunction was awarded. Some of the defendants put in answers, impeaching the mortgage as fraudulent; others, and among them, Long, the mortgagor, made default. And on the hearing, May 18th 1822, the chancellor decreed that, unless Long should pay the mortgagees the debts due to them, respectively, and the costs of the suit, within six months from the date of the decree, his equity of redemption in the mortgaged subject, should be foreclosed, and that the marshal of the court should sell the whole of it, for cash, and after defraying expenses, pay the mortgagees the debts and costs due to them, and pay the surplus if any to the mortgagor; and make report of his proceedings in order to a final decree.

Under this decree, the marshal sold all the mortgaged subject in June 1823, when there was a crop of wheat, oats, indian corn, and tobacco growing on the land, which had been sown and planted by Long, who had been allowed to retain the possession of the land, and the slaves and stock upon it, till the day of sale. The whole subject was purchased at the sale, by the mortgagee Crews.

Afterwards, and before the marshal's sales had been reported, and confirmed by the court, Pendleton and Mountcastle, in the autumn of 1823, sued out a writ of fieri facias against Long, the mortgagor, and caused it to be levied on the tobacco hanging unstript in the tobacco houses, a parcel of indian corn, and of fodder and oats in the stacks, being part of the crop of 1823, then gathered. This proceeding gave occasion to the present controversy.

forth all the proceedings in the other suit; that he had purchased the land at the sale, with the growing crops upon it; that the proceeds of the marshal's sales had fallen far short of the amount of the debt 299 *secured by the mortgage; that he had with his own means finished and gathered the crops, and that they were his property, though he intended to apply the net proceeds thereof towards the satisfaction of the balance of the mortgaged debts: and praying an injunction to restrain the sheriff from selling, under Pendleton and Mountcastle's execution, the crops on which he had levied it.

The injunction was awarded the 28th October 1823.

On the 30th, Pendleton, on behalf of Pendleton and Mountcastle, filed an answer, in which he denied, that Crews purchased the growing crops at the marshal's sale in June 1823, and insisted that they were properly taken to satisfy their execution: and he alleged, that the land was sold by the acre; that Long had always been permitted to hold the whole subject, both before the marshal's sale and since, to have complete control of the crops, and to sell and appropriate them to his own use; that there was a fraudulent combination between Long and Crews to defraud Long's other creditors; and that the debt due to themselves was contracted by Long for supplies of cloathing &c. for the mortgaged slaves, in the year 1819. Of these allegations, no proofs were adduced.

On the 31st, the chancellor dissolved the injunction. And from this order, Crews appealed to this court.

Johnson, for the appellant. The chancellor's order dissolving the injunction in this case, could not, possibly, have been founded on the imputation contained in Pendleton's answer, of a fraudulent combination between Crews and Long, to defeat the just claims of Long's other creditors; since there is no proof in the record, nothing to justify even a suspicion, of any such fraud; and, since, moreover, the chancellor's own decree of foreclosure (in the first suit) in which all parties have acquiesced without complaint, plainly evinced, that, in his opinion, this charge of fraud was wholly groundless.

300 *Nor can it be supposed, that the chancellor dissolved the injunction, under the impression, that he had no jurisdiction to interfere, in that way, with the proceedings upon Pendleton and Mountcastle's execution. The principle of Bowyer v. Creigh, 3 Rand. 25, does not touch this case. There, an execution at the suit of one creditor, was levied on chattels that had been conveyed by the debtor to a trustee, in trust to secure a debt due to another creditor, who asked the chancellor to stay proceedings on the execution by injunction: a complete legal title was vested in the trustee; and there was nothing to prevent him, or the cestui que trust, who had a right to sue in his name, from vindicating his rights at law. But, in this case, the legal title of the property taken in execution, was not in Crews or in any trustee for him: he was in a court of equity, asserting his equitable lien upon the subject; the chancellor had decreed a sale of it by his marshal, whose office was only ministerial, and Crews was only a purchaser at the sale, which yet remained to be confirmed. The title lay at the chancellor's own disposal. He was bound to protect the purchaser of a subject sold under his decree, in the possession and enjoyment of it.

The case, then, is to be decided on its merits. Was Crews entitled to the crops growing on the land at the date of his purchase from the marshal? The sale was in June. The crops then growing had been sown and planted by Long, but he did the work with the slaves &c. that belonged, as well as the land, to the mortgaged subject. The crops of wheat and oats were reaped and secured by Crews's own means: the indian corn was in an early stage, the tobacco in the earliest stage of its growth; and as to these, especially the tobacco, the labour and expense of tillage, must have been supplied, for the most part, by the purchaser. Crews must be regarded as a purchaser for cash: interest on so much of the debts due on the mortgage, as the proceeds of the sales discharged, ceased immediately. It is an established rule, that a purchaser under a decree in chancery, is entitled to be let into possession from quarter

 301 day preceding his purchase, he paying his money before the following one; that is, where the subject yields rents payable quarterly: if the subject yield profits settled monthly, the purchaser is entitled to the profits from the beginning of the month in which he purchased, paying the purchase money in the course of that month. Sugd. law of Vend. 41, 2; Wren v. Kirton, 8 Ves. 502; Barker v. Harper, Cooper's Ch. Ca. 32. There are cases, which may, at first view, seem at variance with this rule; but these turned on their own peculiar circumstances, and leave the rule undisturbed. Twigg v. Fifield, 13 Ves. 517; Ex parte Minor, 11 Ves. 559. Crews was a purchaser for cash, under a decree foreclosing a mortgage, wherein it is expressly provided, that, in default of payment of the debt, the mortgagees may enter on the real and take possession of the personal subject, and thenceforth take the rents, issues and profits of the whole, till their debts shall be discharged; and the profits he claims, are chiefly the fruits of labour furnished by himself.

The appellees cannot maintain their claim to take these crops in execution, on the ground that their debtor Long was entitled to them as emblements. A mortgagor in possession is, in some sort, a tenant at will or at sufferance of the mortgagee; but not a tenant at will entitled to emblements. Emblements are given by an equitable principle of the law, in order that the tenant may not be deprived of the fruits of his industry, by the sudden and unexpected determination of his tenancy: in this case, to give Crews the crops, is not to deprive Long of them; it is the application of them to the payment of his debts, and that in pursuance of his express agreement. But of whom was Long the tenant at will? of Crews? of the marshal? of the court? Crews had resorted to the court, to assert his equitable rights; he thenceforth had no will to exercise; he was to take what the chancellor should mete to him. The marshal was a mere ministerial officer, who certainly had no power, 302 by *express grant or tacit permission to constitute Long his tenant upon any terms. The court, which had the whole subject at its disposal, gave Long a precise term of six months from the date of its decree of foreclosure: that term expired November 18th 1822. If Long continued to sow, without regard to the duration of the term, he was not entitled to reap.

R. C. Nicholas and Scott, for the appellees. If Crews acquired by his purchase at the marshal's sale, a right to the growing crop, upon which, after it was severed, Pendleton and Mountcastle's execution was levied, he might have maintained trover for the subject, whether his right was perfect or qualified, and recovered damages commensurate with his interest; or he might have forbidden the sale, in which case the sheriff would have proceeded to sell at his own peril, unless he took an indemnifying bond; and if P. and M. gave the bond, Crews might have recovered upon it full satisfaction for the injury. Crews, then, had an adequate remedy at law; and the authority of Bowyer v. Creigh is in point, and conclusive, that his case is not proper for relief in equity.

But, Crews acquired, by his purchase, no right to the crops growing at the time on the land. The rule of the english court of chancery, referred to by Mr. Johnson, can rarely be applicable, in this country, where lands are seldom let out upon leases, rendering a certain rent, payable at stated times; and can hardly, by any ingenuity, be adapted to the present case. This is a case that stands on its own peculiar circumstances. The decree of foreclosure gave Crews a right to require the sale of the mortgaged subject, immediately after the 18th November 1822; and Long was entitled to hold the subject, until the marshal should make sale of it under the decree. The mortgagees had perfect control over the sale: the marshal was bound to proceed when they required him to do so, and was not bound to proceed until so required.

303 Long, then, was in *fact left in the possession and enjoyment of the subject from November to June, by permission of the mortgagees: he had their consent to employ, in sowing and planting the crop, the slaves &c. which were mortgaged to them: he devoted to the tillage his own industry also, which was not mortgaged. The general creditors of Long have certainly a right to have the fruits of his industry applied to the satisfaction of their just demands; but these, with the acquiescence and by the permission of the mortgagees, have been inseparably mingled with the profits of the mortgaged subject. Crews is asking now, not only the profits of the mortgaged subject, but the profits of Long's industry. He does not ask, that his rights as purchaser of the subject, shall relate back to a quarter day from which rent began to accrue: he asks the court to attach those rights to the sub-

Long was strictly entitled to the growing crops, as emblements. A mortgagor in possession, after default of payment, is a tenant at the will of the mortgagee; much more is a mortgagor in possession, after a decree of foreclosure, which the mortgagee may enforce when he pleases, tenant at will of the mortgagee. Why should not he, as well as any other tenant at will, be entitled to emblements? The only reason suggested, is, that the proceeds of the growing crops are to be applied to the payment of the debts secured by the mortgage. But Crews claims the crops as his own; and it is only as a favour to the mortgagor, or the other mortgagees, that he declares his intention to apply them to the reduction of the debts. He cannot exercise his bounty at the expense of Long's other creditors. He can only claim as a purchaser at the sale: he cannot fortify that claim, by uniting with it his original claim as a mortgagee. If any other person had been the purchaser, could he have availed himself of Crews's sudden determination of Long's tenancy at will, and claim the growing crops? If not, neither can Crews.

304 *If Long was entitled to the growing crops, the appellees' execution was rightly levied on them. In all events, they are entitled to have the profits accruing from those crops, apportioned between Long and Crews, and to have Long's portion of them, applied to the satisfaction of their claim against him.

CARR, J. The order of dissolution does not state the ground on which the chancellor proceeded: it must have been, either, 1. that he had no jurisdiction; or 2. that there was fraud; or 3. that the purchase of Crews gave him no right to the growing crops.

Upon the ground of fraud, I can hardly suppose the chancellor acted. His decree in the first suit (acquiesced in by all, and to which the appellee Pendleton is stated to have been a party) had pronounced the mortgage fair, decreed their debts to the mortgagees, and ordered a sale. If the allegations in the answer of the use by Long of the crops, of his continued possession, and of a fraudulent combination between him and Crews, had raised suspicions in the mind of the chancellor, of the fairness of the transactions subsequent to the decree; he surely would not have taken these allegations (not responsive to the bill) as proofs, but would have given time for the taking of evidence. He would not have dissolved the injunction the very day after it was granted.

As to the question of jurisdiction (though few are more jealous of equity on this point than I am) I think there can be no doubt about it. The chancellor had decreed a sale of the mortgaged property: under that sale, Crews had bought, and received possession from the officer of the court: the whole matter was still pending. If the marshal had made his report, the court had not acted upon it. The order of sale did not authorise the marshal to make a deed to the purchaser, but merely to sell for cash, pay the debts due the mortgagees, and report his proceedings to the court. Crews's purchase 305 did not give him the legal title till the *chancellor should confirm the sale, and a deed should be made to him. Till this was done, it was the bounden duty of the court, to protect the purchaser. In contemplation of law, the property was still in possession of the court. The application to the chancellor, then, was the natural and proper resort.

With respect to the growing crops, the question does not seem to me to involve the general doctrine of emblements, but to depend on the particular contract of the parties. There can be no doubt, that if one sell his land without any reserve, all the crops, not severed, will pass to the purchaser. They are a part of the subject, and enter into the price. The contract between the mortgagor and mortgagees is, in effect, this: "I convey you my land, slaves &c. as a security for the debts I owe you; I bind myself to pay you those debts by a given time, and if I fail, you may proceed, and get a decree for a sale of the subject; meantime, I remain in possession, use the slaves, and take the profits of the land; but, whenever you get a decree, you may immediately sell every thing." Under this agreement, if the mortgagor goes on and makes preparation for a crop, he does it with a full knowledge, that the land with the crop is subject to be sold, if the decree be obtained before he severs it. Nor does he lose any thing by this: for the crop on the land enhances the price; if by this increase, the debt be overpaid, he gets the overplus; if not, still the full value of his labour goes (as he had agreed it should go) to the payment of the debts secured by the mortgage.

In this case, such a result seems the more just, as the crop was prepared with the mortgaged slaves, and as (the sale being in June) a great portion of the labour in producing, gathering, and saving the crop, was performed by the purchaser.

The other judges concurred: and the decree was reversed, and the cause remanded, that the injunction might be reinstated.

Payment*—Case at Bar—H. indebted to P. on forthcoming bond, solicits him not to move for award of execution thereon, and to take flour for the debt; which P. refuses to do; but it is at last agreed, that P. shall send H.'s flour to his own commission merchant at Richmond, to be by him sold there, and the net proceeds to be applied to H.'s credit on the bond: P. in March, sends the flour to R., consigns it to his commission merchant, and directs him to sell it, and remit proceeds in May to himself at Baltimore, where he should then be: the merchant writes to P. that he has received and sold the flour, and will remit proceeds to him at B. according to his directions; but before time appointed for remittance, the merchant fails, and the money, without any fault of P. is wholly lost. tion whereof does not distinctly state to which of the three defendants the property taken in execution belonged, and omits to state that it was restored to the debtor: HELD, the bond is good. Same—Judgment—Irregular in Form—Effect—Judgment on forthcoming bond, instead of awarding execution thereon, is, that plaintiff recover the debt against defendants. HELD, irregular in form, yet well in substance.

Motion, in the county court of Rockbridge, at March term 1822, by Patton against Andrew, Thomas and Hugh Harper and James Anderson, for an award of execution on a forfeited forthcoming bond, executed by them, upon the levy of a fieri facias, which had been sued out by Patton against the three Harpers. The defence set up, was, that Andrew Harper had, since the forfeiture of the bond, paid the debt.

The forthcoming bond was dated the 28th December 1819. The condition was, that whereas Patton had sued out a fieri facias against Andrew and Thomas Harper, and Hugh Harper their appearance bail, upon a judgment of the county court of Rockbridge, amounting with interest &c. to £72. 14. 0. and directed to the sheriff of that county, and the sheriff, by virtue of the said writ, "had taken the following property, belonging to the said Andrew Harper &c. to satisfy the same, to wit" [here the property was specified] "and the said Andrew and Thomas Harper &c. being desirous of keeping the same in their possession until the day of sale thereof, had tendered James Anderson, as *security for the forthcoming and delivery of the property at the day and place of sale; now, if the above bound Andrew Harper, Thomas Harper, Hugh Harper and James Anderson, or either of them, should deliver the said property to the sheriff or either of his deputies at the court house of the county, on the 15th January next, then and there to be sold to satisfy the said Patton's execution, then the obligation to be void &c." 1

As to the question, whether the debt had been paid, the case was thus: The forthcoming bond was forfeited, and a notice was given to the three Harpers and Anderson their surety, that a motion would be made for an award of execution upon it, at March term 1820. On receiving that notice, Andrew Harper went to Patton, and requested him not to proceed upon the notice, and to take a parcel of flour, which Harper then had at Lindsey's mill in Rockbridge, in part satisfaction of the debt: but Patton refused to purchase the flour, or to decline proceeding with his motion. The request was urged again, and again rejected. But, at length, Patton was induced by Harper's urgent solicitations, to forbear his motion on the notice; and agreed at Harper's request, to send the flour to Richmond, with the understanding, that the net proceeds should be applied to his credit on the forthcoming bond, and that some indulgence should be given for the residue of the debt. Harper was told by Patton that he should send the flour to his commission merchant in Richmond, to which Harper made no objection. In pursuance of this arrangement, Patton stayed his then intended proceeding on the forthcoming bond, (by which the debt was perfectly secured, the Harpers and their surety being all in good circumstances); and, shortly afterwards, he caused the flour to be boated to Richmond, and consigned it to his own commission merchant there, with directions to remit the proceeds to him at Baltimore (where he expected to be) about the 1st May 1820, by which time it was supposed the proceeds of the flour would be in the commission merchant's hands. The commission

308 merchant *wrote to Patton informing him that the flour had been received and sold, and that the proceeds should be remitted to him according to his directions. Soon after receiving this letter, Patton left Rockbridge for Baltimore, and on his way thither, learned that the commission merchant had failed. He immediately took measures to secure the money, but without success: it was intirely lost. Indeed, Patton lost by the failure of the commission merchant, a large sum, the proceeds of other flour he had consigned to him; and several other merchants of Lexington in Rockbridge (where Patton resides) sustained losses by this failure. At the time Patton consigned Harper's flour to the commission merchant, he was in good credit. An attempt had been made to settle this controversy, by arbitration; and Harper had distinctly admitted before the arbitrators, that Patton had exerted all the diligence in his power, to carry the arrangement with Harper into effect, in causing the flour to be sold, and endeavouring to obtain the proceeds, and that if the flour had been sunk in the river on its way from Rockbridge to Richmond, it would have sunk his (Harper's) flour; but he contended, that he knew nothing of the commission merchant, that he was not his agent, and that he ceased to be responsible, after the flour had reached its destination, and its value was ascertained. The net proceeds of the flour were not equal to the debt, but Harper had paid Patton the balance, before the motion on the forthcoming bond: so that the only question now was, whether or no, Harper was entitled to credit for the net proceeds of the flour? in other words, which of the parties ought to bear the loss resulting from the failure of the commission merchant who sold it?

Upon this state of facts the county court held, that Harper was entitled to the credit claimed for the flour, and so the debt due on the forthcoming bond had been paid in full; and therefore overruled Patton's motion for an award of execution upon it. Patton appealed to the circuit court, which reversed the judgment of the county

309 court, and entered *judgment for Patton against all the obligors in the bond: but this judgment, was, in its form not a mere award of execution on the forthcoming bond, but a judgment that Patton should recover of the obligors, the penalty of the bond, to be discharged by the debt mentioned in the condition, with interest and costs, subject to credit for the sums which had been paid in cash. And then they appealed to this court.

Johnson, for the appellants. The bond on which the motion was made, being a statutory bond, if its terms do not conform with the provisions of the statute, the summary remedy by motion, given by the statute, cannot be sustained. This bond does not pursue the provisions of the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 134, § 16. The recital in the condition, leaves it uncertain, whose property was taken in execution; it states, that the execution was levied on property belonging to A. Harper &c. and then, that A. and T. Harper &c. were desirous of keeping possession till the day of sale. The &c. is no where explained. Nor does the condition state, that upon the execution of the bond, the property which had been taken in execution, was returned to the owner or owners: if it was not so returned, the bond never had any obligation, and it could not be forfeited.

The judgment of the circuit court, also, is irregular. It is an original judgment for the penalty of the bond, to be discharged by payment of the debt mentioned in the condition. But the bond itself had the force of a judgment, and the court should only have awarded execution upon it.

These objections are technical; and if they should prevail, they will not decide the point in controversy. I have little care for the fate of them. For,

I insist, that upon the plain justice of the case, the judgment of the circuit court was wrong, and that of the county court right. The net proceeds of the flour sent to Richmond, must be considered as so much paid by H. to P. in satisfaction of the debt

310 pro tanto. While it was in transitu *from Rockbridge to Richmond, while it lay unsold in the hands of the commission merchant, while the proceeds of the sales remained uncollected by him, it may safely be admitted, the subject was Harper's property, and therefore, that the risk of loss was his also. But the moment the proceeds of sales were received by the commission merchant, the money belonged to Patton, simply, exclusively, absolutely. Harper had no right or power over it, in any way; it was not passed to his credit; it was irrecoverably gone from him. The absolute right to the money, the power to direct the disposition of it at pleasure, to give the commission merchant credit for it as long as he pleased, to direct the time when, the place to which, the manner how, it should be remitted to him; all, in fine, that constituted property in the subject, was in Patton. And, in fact, he exercised complete ownership over it: he consigned the flour to the commission merchant, without any intimation that Harper had any interest in it; he directed that it should be sold, and that the proceeds should be remitted to himself, at Baltimore, at a comparatively distant day, giving credit to the commission merchant in the meantime for the amount. It was, actually passed to his credit, and mixed up with his other funds in the merchant's hands. Harper had no right to demand the money, and no right of action to recover it of the commission merchant; nor any right to adopt any legal means to save or secure it, if he had apprehended a loss. Patton alone could, or can now, maintain an action for it. Should the agent retrieve his affairs, Patton may yet, and Harper never can, recover it of him. The money was, therefore, from the moment it got into the hands of the commission merchant, and it is still, Patton's money, paid him by Harper; and, if it shall be ultimately lost (which cannot as yet be certain), the loss must fall on the owner.

Leigh, for the appellee, left to the court, without any remark, the objections taken to the form of the forthcoming 311 *bond, and to the regularity of the judgment of the circuit court.

Upon the merits, the judgment of the circuit court was right. The transaction was of a singular character, and the case must be decided on its own peculiar circumstances. Patton had prosecuted his claim against Harper, to the last stage; the debt was perfectly secure; the means of recovery sure and speedy: his debtor had no reason to ask, and he no motive to give, indulgence at any risk whatever to himself: and it is hardly to be imagined, that the one intended to incur any risk, or that the other wished or expected him to do so. The whole object of both parties, was, to give the debtor time to convert his flour into money, with which to pay the debt, and to ensure to the creditor the certain application of the proceeds to the debt. To accomplish these objects, Harper constituted Patton his agent, to send the flour to market, to have it sold, to receive the proceeds, and credit him for them; and as Patton was not expected to execute this agency in person, he proposed, and the other consented, that he should employ his own commission merchant as a sub-agent in the business. If Patton undertook this agency for Harper, in perfect good faith, and executed it with diligence, Harper, his principal, was bound to bear any loss that might happen, without his default. If he was honest in recommending the sub-agent, and faithful and industrious to save the proceeds of the property in the wreck of the sub-agent's affairs, Harper must bear the loss occasioned by the sub-agent's default; for he was Harper's own agent, employed by Patton, with his acquiescence and approbation. Both parties knew, that the proceeds of the flour must, in the nature of things, remain for some time, in the hands of the commission merchant: both, then, Harper as well as Patton, intended that he should be trusted with them. Admitting, then, as Harper most explicitly admitted, the integrity and diligence of Patton's conduct, how can he be held to bear this unlooked for loss? It is said, that after the money was received by the commission merchant, Harper 312 *had no right to demand it of him, or to sue him for it; that there was no privity of contract between them; that Patton alone had, and he only even now has, a right to demand and sue for the money; therefore, it was and is his money; and therefore, this was a payment by Harper to Patton. But, if the flour was Harper's property, the proceeds of it were his property too; and if the commission merchant was the agent of Harper, employed by Patton his other agent, to dispose of his property, it is not perceived, why Harper might not, and may not, maintain an action for the proceeds of his flour, as so much money had and received by the commission merchant to his use.

Johnson, in reply. Upon the doctrine of the law of agency, Patton made the proceeds of the flour his own, by giving the commission merchant credit for them, to answer his own purposes: for he authorised him to hold them from March till May, at which time he directed him to remit them to himself at Baltimore; meanwhile, they were put to his credit, and mixed with his other funds in the commission merchant's hands. Paley on Agency, p. 45; Wren v. Kirton, 11 Ves. 377.

CARR, J. I think the judgment of the county court was right. I admit, that no sale of the flour by Harper to Patton, was intended or effected by this transaction: Patton agreed to take Harper's flour, send it to Richmond, and have it turned into money: therefore, all fair risks on the flour were to be incurred by Harper, while it remained his. If the agreement had been, that it should be sold on a credit, (which does not seem to have been the fact), Harper, I think, would have hazarded the solvency of the purchaser: but so soon as the flour was turned into money, and that money in the hands of the commission merchant, it became, I think, Patton's money, and a payment by Harper of his debt. We are not told, that in sending the flour to the merchant, Patton gave him any in-

313 formation, that it was *Harper's flour: he treated it precisely as his own, sent it to his own commission merchant, to whom he was in the habit of sending his produce, and directed him to sell it, and remit the money to him at Baltimore. Suppose, after the money was in the merchant's hands, Harper had been in Richmond, and, having a most pressing call for money there, had applied to this merchant for it: would he have got it? would not the merchant have told him, "I know nothing of you in this business; I have received flour from Mr. Patton, have sold it according to his directions, and am bound, both by those same directions and my own letter to him, to remit the proceeds to him at Baltimore?" could Harper have enforced his demand? No. Between him and the commission merchant, there was no contract, no privity. If Harper had seen the merchant about to abscond full-handed, he could not have saved the debt, as one due to him, by attachment or any other process. This, then, was no longer his property, or his money. Whose then? Patton's. The merchant had passed it to his credit, along with all his other funds in his hands. Is it not clear, that this was the idea of the parties? Harper had parted with all control over the flour, with the understanding that it should go to Patton's agent, and the proceeds be a payment, pro tanto, of his debt: when? whenever received by Patton's agent. It appears, that Patton was in the habit of sending produce to this same agent to sell; this proves, that he thought his money safe in his hands. We may fairly conclude, then, that he had no objection to that risk in regard to this flour, which he was constantly incurring in all his other produce. Nor do we hear, that he made any difference in this consignment;

that he informed the merchant, that this was not his flour, nor at his risk, or desired him to enter it as Harper's flour, and to credit him by the proceeds: on the contrary Patton's orders were, "sell this flour, and remit the proceeds to me at Baltimore, about the 1st of May, when I expect to be there." Suppose Patton had gone to Richmond, immediately after the flour was sold;

314 *and, having occasion for the money, had made application to the merchant for it: ought he not to have paid it to him? Suppose Patton had got timely notice of his tottering condition, could he not have made any arrangement in regard to this money, precisely as he could for his other funds in the merchant's hands? These are the indicia of property: they all prove, that it was in Patton. I must conclude, then, that, both from the meaning of the parties, and the operation of the law, this was a payment to him. The money in the merchants hands was his; and his must be the loss from that merchant's failure.

GREEN, J. I think the judgment of the circuit court should be affirmed.

The substance of the transaction was, that Harper constituted Patton his agent, to dispose of his flour for him, in the usual course of Patton's business, and to apply its proceeds, when received, to Harper's credit with him: and an authority to dispose of it through the instrumentality of a sub-agent, was not only implied from the nature of the transaction, but more strongly, from the contemporary declaration made by Patton to Harper, that he should dispose of it through the agency of a commission merchant, with whom he usually dealt, and whose solvency and integrity he had no reason to doubt. And Harper admitted, that Patton had used all the diligence in his power, to carry the arrangement into effect, in causing the flour to be sold, and endeavouring to secure the proceeds. Suppose the arrangement had been, for Harper's accommodation, and in order to induce some other creditor to forbear, that Patton should send the flour to his commission merchant to be sold, and should account for the proceeds to such other creditor; could such other creditor have held him accountable for the proceeds, though never received by him, and that without any default in him? The circumstance, that Patton alone would maintain an action against the commission merchant

(if that were admitted) does not vary
315 the case: for, in that *case, he would be held accountable to Harper, only as a trustee for him.

There is no valid objection to the form of the forthcoming bond, or the judgment. It is sufficient, that the bond recites the levying of the execution, and upon what specific property: if that had been the property of a stranger, the bond would have been nevertheless good and binding. The irregularity in the terms of the judgment is only matter of form.

COALTER, J. I am of opinion, that the judgment of the circuit court must be affirmed. I cannot perceive how the circumstance, that the merchant entrusted to sell the flour, was the commission merchant who usually transacted Patton's business in Richmond, can affect this case. It is said, that Patton confided his other business to him, and therefore all he wanted was to get the flour into his hands, as he would then be sure of the money, so soon as the flour was sold. No doubt, he thought it would be safe in his hands: if he had not thought so, if he entertained a suspicion of the agent, he ought to be held accountable for not making his suspicions known. The more confidence he had, the more innocent and honest he is. He acted with good faith. Both parties are equally innocent: and the question is, who shall bear the loss? The debtor, who has gained time from his creditor, to try and make his crop available to discharge his debt? or the creditor, who has granted this indulgence, and moreover rendered services, without compensation, in sending the flour to market?

The debt has not been actually paid to the creditor. There has been an effort to pay it; but the money has been lost, without the fault or neglect of either party. It seems to me, that the case must be decided, as it would be if Patton had had no particular commission merchant in Richmond, but the flour had been sent to one named by either party, and agreed on by both, to be the person to whom it was to be sent; or, as if Patton had been authorised 316 to *send it to any one he might select, and had made the selection with due caution and care.

The question is, whether Patton, by himself for his agent, ever received this money in discharge of this debt? Was the merchant his agent to collect this debt for him? to receive the money from Harper, or from the sale of his effects, for Patton, so that, so soon as the effects were sold, and the money received, the payment of the debt was complete, as much so as if it had been paid into Patton's own hands, and he had given a receipt therefor? It is admitted, that Patton was to be at no risk in the transmission of the flour. He had a right to have the proceeds remitted to him at Lexington, or at some other equally convenient place. His debtor was bound to seek and pay him his debt, he had an execution hanging over him, which would force a payment into his hands at home: therefore, it cannot be supposed, that he was to travel to Richmond, to collect it there, unless perfectly convenient for him to do so: or that he was to be at the risk of its remittance to him from thence. He received no premium for any risk, and was to be at none. This seems to be admitted on all hands: and yet it is insisted, that he must lose the debt.

Suppose the merchant had not failed, but had remitted the money in bank bills, and they had been lost. This could not be Patton's loss, unless the risk of remittance be thrown on him. Suppose the remittance had been in a bill of exchange, believed at the time to be good, but was dishonoured, and finally proved good for nothing: it seems to be admitted, that if such a bill had been taken in payment for the flour, the loss would have been Harper's. Should it be otherwise, if the money had been paid for the flour, and instantly laid out in a bill, for the purpose of remittance?

But why was Patton to have any thing to do with the flour? His aid was called in, no doubt, that he might be certain, that the money, when received, would be paid into his hands. Suppose this object had been effected in some other way: suppose, for example, Harper had said to Patton, 317 "I will send this flour to such a merchant in Richmond; I will assign the bill of lading to you: I will moreover write to the merchant, that my property is under execution for your debt, and that the net proceeds of the flour, when received, are to be paid to you; that he shall consider this as an irrevocable order in your favour for those proceeds, and shall pay the same over to you or your order, as if you yourself had sent the flour to him." The flour is received and sold for cash, and the merchant fails. Surely, this would be no payment of the debt by Harper. I cannot well see how such a case would be materially variant from that before us.

It is admitted, that Patton has been guilty of no negligence; that he was to receive no benefit by the transaction, but on the contrary, submitted to delay, and encountered some trouble, for nothing; and this, at the pressing solicitation of his debtor.

But it is said the merchant was the agent of both parties, in different stages of the transaction: that, in receiving and selling the flour, and even in receiving the money for it, he was the agent of Harper, but that, from the moment he had accomplished the receipt of the money, he was the agent of Patton, and answerable to him alone for his conduct, since he knew nothing of Harper in the business, and could only be responsible to him, in a controversy to which Patton was a party: that the moment he sold, and the money was received, Harper's risk ceased; it was then Patton's money. How so? True, he has a right of action for it: but so he would have had, if the flour had been lost by the negligence of the merchant; or if he had, without authority, sold it on a credit, and the debt had been lost; in which cases, it is admitted, the loss must have been Harper's. The liability of the merchant to Patton then, cannot be the test of the question, who is to bear the loss. He would have been in like manner liable, if the contract between Harper and Patton had expressly stipulated, that, until the money was actually paid into Patton's hands, it should be at Harper's risk. Nor would these 318 have been "contradictory, unlawful, or unreasonable stipulations. It would only have been expressly stipulating for what appears to me to be the legal and necessary meaning and result of the contract that was made. The merchant (it seems to me) held Harper's money to be paid over to his creditor, who had also a lien on it in his hands, or rather an absolute right to enforce payment of it, but he was not less Harper's agent for the purpose of paying over, than he was his agent for receiving and selling; nor can he be otherwise considered, merely because he did not know Harper in the transaction. This also would equally have been the case, if there had been an express stipulation (unknown to him) between Harper and Patton, that all was to be at Harper's risk, though transacted in Patton's name, until the money was paid over. He stood (as it seems to me) in the nature of an acceptor of Harper's draft, in favour of Patton, to pay the proceeds of the flour over to him as soon as they were received.

If Patton had drawn on the merchant for the proceeds of this flour, to be paid the moment it was sold and the proceeds received, (which would have been a method of drawing it out of his hands, with as little risk as possible to Harper,) and this order had been presented and accepted, on the day of sale, for the net proceeds, naming the sum, for which the flour was sold, and (the acceptor failing at the instant) the draft had been dishonoured: would this have been Patton's loss? or, suppose he had arrived in Richmond, an hour after the sale and receipt of the money, and had demanded it in vain. In either case, would it have been a payment by Harper of his debt? If it would, it must be because the money was to be at Patton's risk, whether in a course of remittance or otherwise, from the moment the merchant received it, it being then a complete payment to him, not simply a right in him to receive and enforce the payment of it, to be placed to Harper's credit, when received.

On the whole, I think that the merchant, though responsible to Patton, was, nevertheless, so far as it regards the 319 *question of risk, as much the agent of Harper, to pay over the money, as he was to receive and sell the flour; and that, until the proceeds were actually so paid over, unless some fault in Patton should occasion loss, the whole risk was on Harper.

CABELL, J. The question is, on whom the loss occasioned by the failure of the commission merchant, shall fall?

The arrangement between the parties certainly constituted a bailment. But the question, as to the loss, depends not so much on any principle peculiar to the law of bailments, as on the intention of the parties, as to the time when the net proceeds of the flour were to be applied to the credit of Harper on the forthcoming bond. If it was intended, that the money should be thus applied, at the moment it got into the hands of the commission merchant, then the receipt of the money by him, made it, ipso facto, Patton's money; and, consequently, the loss of it must fall on him. If, on the contrary, it was not intended by the parties, that the net proceeds of the flour should be applied to the credit of Harper until Patton himself had received them, or had applied them to his own use, or until by due diligence, he might have so received or applied them, then it is manifest, that the mere receipt of the money by the commission merchant, did not make it Patton's money; and, consequently, that as Patton has been guilty of no negligence, the loss must fall, not on him, but on Harper. Bearing these principles in mind, let us look at the situation of the parties, and the terms of the contract. Patton's debt was perfectly secure, and he had already resorted to legal measures to enforce payment of it; and that object would have been speedily accomplished, if the law had been left to take its course. Overcome by Harper's repeated and urgent solicitations, he consented, most reluctantly, for Harper's accommodation, to suspend legal proceedings, and to send the flour to Richmond, to be sold by the instrumentality of a third person, with the understanding, that the net proceeds *should be applied to the credit of the forthcoming bond.

320 Did the parties intend, that Patton should take on himself the risk of the insolvency of the agent of sales? Did they intend that Patton should be debited with the net proceeds of the flour, although they might never come to his hands? In the situation in which the parties stood towards each other, it would have been most unreasonable in Harper to ask such a stipulation, and folly in Patton to have acceded to it. No such stipulation can be inferred from the case presented by the record. The contract undoubtedly was, that the proceeds of the flour should be applied to the debit of Patton, when they should be received by him. This view of the case is not changed by the circumstance, that the person selected to sell the flour was the commission merchant who transacted Patton's own business: he was selected, not because he was Patton's merchant, but because he was believed to be a safe hand. Nor is it material, that Patton might have sustained an action against the commission merchant: he might also have sustained an action against the common carrier, by whom the flour was sent to Richmond, if that carrier had violated his trust by selling the flour, and applying the proceeds to his own use; and yet, in that case, nobody would pretend, that the loss, if the carrier proved insolvent, would fall on Patton.

The objections taken to the bond, are not valid. The bond recites the levying of the execution, and the property on which it was levied; and even if that property had belonged to a stranger, it would not impair the obligation of the bond. And, from the nature of the transaction, the property which had been taken by the sheriff in execution, must have been restored to the owner, upon the execution of the bond for the forthcoming and delivery of it: if it had not been so restored, that would have been a substantive ground of defence; but nothing of the kind was pretended.

The irregularity in the terms of the judgment is merely formal.

Judgment of the circuit court affirmed.

321 *Griffith v. Thomson and Others.

June, 1829.

(Absent BROOKE, P., and CABELL, J.)

Wills—Executory Limitations—Case at Bar.—G. T. having three legitimate children and a natural son, by his will in 1803, makes provision for each, and then adds: In case all my children by my wife die without heirs, my natural son C. shall fall heir to my whole estate; and in case he also die without heirs, my estate shall be divided into six parts, and 3-6ths shall go to my father's brothers that are alive, and the heirs of those that are dead receiving no more among them than my father's brothers would have received had they been living: 2-6ths to go to C. Leland, S. Leland, L. Leland, H. Gaskins, and T. Legg; and the other 6th to go to my wife, to be disposed of as she may think proper: but my wife is to have the use of the whole as long as she lives, if all her own children die without issue: Two of the testator's legitimate children, and his natural son, die without leaving issue: his legitimate daughter, E. G. T. survives all her paternal uncles, the three Lelands, H. G. and T. L. and the testator's wife: and then dies without leaving issue:

Same—Same.—HELD, as to the personal subject, that the executory bequest thereof, after the death of the natural son without heirs, was void in its creation; and that E. G. T. was entitled to the whole in absolute property.

George Thomson of Westmoreland, made his last will and testament in 1803, and shortly after died. At the time he made his will, he had two children by his wife, a son Thomas, and a daughter Elizabeth Griffith Thomson, and a natural son called Charles Thomson, alias Briarly; and his wife was pregnant of a child, who was born after the will was made and before the testator's death, and called George. All these children, and the testator's wife, survived him.

The testator by his will made divers devises and bequests of land and slaves to his son Thomas, to his daughter Elizabeth Griffith, to his natural son Charles, and to the child his wife was pregnant with, the expectation of which occasioned a great many alternative provisions in case it should prove a son or a daughter: but the lands and slaves were in every devise, given, in the first instance, to the devisee and his or her heirs forever; and then, he annexed to these devises, a string of limitations, all to the like effect, that in case either devisee should die without 322 heirs, the property *given to him or her, should pass to one of his other children, or should be divided among them in a manner prescribed. And then followed an ulterior limitation in these words: "It is my will and desire, that in case all my children by my wife, should die without heirs, that my son Charles Thomson alias Briarly, shall fall heir to the whole of my estate: and in case he should also die without heirs, it is my desire that my estate be divided into six parts, and that three-sixths go to my father's brothers that are alive, and the heirs of those who are dead, receiving no more among them than what my father's brothers would have received had they been living; two-sixths to go to Charles Leland, Sally Leland, Lucy Leland, Harry Gaskins and Thomas Legg; and the remaining one-sixth to go to my wife, to be disposed of as she may think proper—but my wife is to have the use of the whole as long as she lives, if all her own children die without heirs."

The testator's widow, his sons Thomas and George, and his natural son Charles, all died before his daughter Elizabeth Griffith Thomson; who also survived Charles, Sally, and Lucy Leland, Harry Gaskins, Thomas Legg, and all the brothers of her father's father. She died in 1824, and by will gave almost all her estate to Sally W. Griffith, the appellant, whom she also appointed her executrix.

A bill was exhibited, in the superiour

Wills—Executory Limitations.—On this question, the principal case is cited in foot-note to Dunn v. Bray, 1 Call 338; foot-note to Higgenbotham v. Rucker, 2 Call 313; Deane v. Hansford, 9 Leigh 257, 259, 260, and note; Callava v. Pope, 3 Leigh 106; Nowlin v. Winfree, 8 Gratt. 348; Moore v. Brooks, 12 Gratt. 150. See monographic note on "Wills."

court of chancery of Fredericksburg, by a surviving child of one of the brothers of the testator George Thomson's father, who died before the testator, and by the personal representatives of another child of the same brother; of the other brothers of the testator's father who survived him; of the testator's widow; of the three Lelands; of Gaskins and of Legg, against Sally W. Griffith, legatee and executrix of Elizabeth G. Thomson; setting forth the will of the testator George Thomson, as well as that of his daughter Elizabeth, and all of the facts, as above stated; claiming all the personal estate of the testator George Thomson, which had come to the defendant's hands as executrix of the daughter, 323 under *both wills; and praying an account of profits &c. The answer of Sally W. Griffith admitted all the facts alleged in the bill, but contested the plaintiffs' claim to the property. The chancellor held the executory devises well limited as to the personal property, and decreed for the plaintiffs according to the prayer of their bill. The defendant appealed to this court.

Leigh and Wickham, for the appellant. The case turns wholly on that clause of Mr. Thomson's will, which contains the last set of executory limitations: no other part of the will has any bearing on the point in controversy. The limitations (under which the appellees claim) of the "whole estate" to the testator's natural son, in case his legitimate children "should die without heirs," and of the "estate" over to others, in six portions, in case the natural son "should also die without heirs," are both void in their creation, as being limited on too remote contingencies, unless there be some expression used, or some circumstance indicated, in the will, which the court can lay hold of, to tie up the generality of the expression dying without heirs, and confine it to a failure of heirs within the period allowed to executory bequests.

The ulterior limitation, after the dying of the natural son without heirs, gives three-sixths of the estate to the testator's father's brothers that are alive, and the heirs of such as are dead (to take per stirpes); two-sixths to the three Lelands, Harry Gaskins and Thomas Legg, not to them and their heirs; and the other sixth to the testator's wife, to be disposed of as she may think proper. And it may perhaps be thought, at the first view, that the limitation over, being to the Lelands and others, by name, without any words of perpetuity, is within the principle, on which the executory bequest was held good in Timberlake v. Graves, 6 Munf. 174. But the authority of that case cannot govern the decision of this. In that case, specific property was given to the devisee over, after the failure of issue of the first taker, 324 *without words of perpetuity; and the court supported the executory bequest, on the ground, that it was made to the executory legatees themselves, and was intended as a personal benefit to them, since nothing was given to their heirs or representatives. But, in this case, the devise over is of the estate and of the whole estate; which is fully equivalent to a devise to them and their heirs, and certainly carries the whole interest; as was determined, in a case of real estate, in Goodrich v. Harding, 3 Rand. 280. Much more ought it to be so determined in a case of personal estate. Besides, the principle on which Timberlake v. Graves was determined, though it has been followed by several cases in this court since, is very questionable at least, if not plainly wrong. It was never before affirmed: it was supported by no authority: it was contrary to many, very many, previous adjudications, and to the whole doctrine of executory limitations of the kind. In particular, it was considered and condemned by Mr. Fearne, in his commentary upon the case of Keily v. Fowler: he says, "as to any thing that might be inferred from the devise over to the sister's children being intended as a personal benefit to them, as much may in all cases be inferred from a devise over to any relation or other person; and therefore seems to be of no weight." Butler's Fearne, 483.

The provision, in this will, that the wife should have the use of the whole, as long as she should live, if all her own children should die without heirs, might have led to the construction on which the chancellor has founded his decree, if it had stood alone, and if the testator had only given the whole property to her for life, though, in the actual event of her death before her children, she could have taken nothing by it. But the devise to her for life, being connected with the devise of five-sixths to others and one-sixth to herself, in absolute ownership, the devise of the life estate to her in remainder, cannot alter or affect the construction of the previous devises. Her life estate is only a part of the fee or absolute property, and is given over to her 325 on the failure *of issue of the children: and, as her dying in the lifetime of her children, would not have rendered the devise over to the natural son, after failure of issue of the legitimate children, or the devise over to the others, in portions, after failure of heirs of the natural son, ineffectual as to the devisees in remainder, if those devises had been in themselves well limited; so neither can it have the effect of abridging the interests given to the testator's legitimate children in the first instance, and, failing issue of them, to his natural son.

But, if it be conceded, that the limitation of the estate, after the dying of the children without heirs, to the three Lelands, Gaskins and Legg, without any words of perpetuity, was intended as a personal benefit to them, and therefore, the dying of the children without heirs, on which the limitation depends, imports not an indefinite failure of their heirs, but a failure of heirs during the life of some one or more of those devisees in remainder; or, conceding that the limitation of a life estate to the wife, after the dying of her own children without heirs, shews that the contingency in the testator's mind, was a failure of heirs of the children living the wife: this would only prove, that the contingency of the failure of heirs of the children was restrained to a failure of their heirs within the compass of a life or lives in being, and that, therefore, these executory devises were good in their creation; not, that they are effectual in the event that has actually happened. The executory devisees cannot resort to these circumstances, for the mere purpose of restraining the generality of the contingency within a reasonable compass, and, that purpose answered, discard all farther consideration of them: they are, surely, as influential in ascertaining the precise event in the testator's mind, upon which he intended to limit his estate over, as in ascertaining that the event intended was one which could only happen, if at all, during the lives of the devisees in remainder. They ascertain, that the testator intended to give his estate over to his natural son, only in the event of his legitimate children dying without heirs living his wife, and to the others, "only in the event of all his children dying without heirs during the lives of the three Lelands, Gaskins and Legg, or some of them. And, then, if these executory devises were good in their creation, they fail of effect, because the events on which they are limited have not happened. The testator's children have not died without heirs living his wife, or living the three Lelands, Gaskins and Legg, or any of them: his daughter Elizabeth survived them all.

Stanard, for the appellees. The case of Timberlake v. Graves was decided by this court (as it tells us) upon consideration of the authorities affecting the question; and the principle, there laid down, has been repeatedly recognized and followed in cases since decided. Greshams v. Gresham, 6 Munf. 187; James v. M'Williams, Id. 301; Didlake v. Hooper, Gilm. 194. It is as well settled as a series of adjudications of this court can settle any principle. Counsel have been guided by it, in advising parties concerning their rights under executory bequests of personal property: claims have been asserted or surrendered, acquiesced in or adjudged, in conformity with it. Nor was the principle any otherwise new, than the principle of every case was new, in which an executory devise has been held good, upon its own peculiar circumstances, varying from the circumstances of any former case of the kind. There is an infinite variety in the language of wills; and the courts have been always studious and astute to find, and have been continually finding, new circumstances to support executory limitations of personalty, and thus to give effect to testamentary intention; and have been, in this sense, continually asserting new principles; yet those principles, far from being ever after objected to, on the ground of their novelty, have been immediately, and indeed eagerly, received. The principle of Timberlake v. Graves is also reasonable in itself: for it only serves to extricate executory limitations from the influence of technical rules of construction, which almost universally lead to a result contrary to the known intent; and to enable the court to give effect to such limitations, when no wise repugnant to the policy of the law, according to the real sense of the words in the acceptance of the authors of them.

As to the diversity that has been suggested, between the circumstances of Timberlake v. Graves and those of this case, namely, that there, specific chattels were limited over to persons in being, without any words of perpetuity, whereas, here the whole estate is limited over, which carries the whole interest as effectually as if words of perpetuity had been added: in the first place, it cannot be pretended, that the same diversity exists between this case and that of Greshams v. Gresham; in which the testator gave "the balance of his estate to his brother Isaac, and in case he should die without issue, to be equally divided between this uncle J. G.'s children," naming them; and the executory bequest to the uncle's children was held good. In the next place, in cases of limitations over, after a dying of the first taker without issue, the sole object is to ascertain, from the whole will, whether the contingency of the failure of issue, in the testator's mind, be an indefinite failure of issue, or a failure of issue within the period allowed to executory devises; and if it appear, that in making the executory limitation, the testator intends a personal benefit to individuals then living, it follows, that, in his apprehension, the contingency on which he designs them that benefit, is one that is to happen during their lives; that the dying of the first taker, in his contemplation, is a dying without leaving issue. And then, it can make no odds, what is the extent of the benefit, or quantity of estate, intended for the devisees in remainder.

When the testator, George Thomson, said, "my will is, that in case all my children by my wife should die without heirs, my son Charles Thomson alias Briary shall fall heir to my whole estate;" had he in contemplation, the failure of heirs of his legitimate children, at any distance of time, however remote? When he said, "and in case he (his natural son) should also die without heirs," his estate should go over, in portions, to the persons who and whose representatives are now claiming it; had he in his mind, the indefinite failure of heirs of the natural son? These are the questions. If he did not contemplate an indefinite failure of heirs of his children, in either limitation, he must be understood to have intended (for there is no middle ground) a failure of their heirs living at the death of them respectively; and then the executory devises are good and effectual.

He surely did not intend the indefinite failure of the heirs of his legitimate children, as the contingency on which the estate was to go over to his natural son: for he gives a life estate in the subject to his wife upon the same contingency; which he intended should take effect before the limitation to the natural son; thus plainly evincing, that the failure of issue he had in contemplation, was one that was to happen while his wife was living. He did not intend the indefinite failure of the heirs of his natural son, as the contingency on which the estate was to be divided into six parts, and to go over to the ulterior devisees, in portions: for he made this ulterior devise for the personal benefit of the Lelands, Gaskins and Legg, and therefore contemplated a failure of issue of his children during the lives of those whom he wished to enjoy the estate, upon the principle of Timberlake v. Graves.

It being thus ascertained, that the events of his children dying without heirs, in the sense in which this testator used the phrase in these executory limitations, was not an indefinite failure of issue, and consequently was a failure of issue at the death of the previous takers, the executory bequests, limited upon those contingencies, are good and effectual; and, as possibilities of this kind are transmissible to representatives, it is wholly immaterial, that the persons, out of regard to whom the testator framed the executory devises, have died before the events happened, upon which he intended they should vest.

329 *CARR, J. This is another of that numerous class of cases, where the contest is between the alienee, heirs or devisees, of the first taker, and those who claim under a subsequent limitation, as executory devisees. In the cases of Goodrich v. Harding, 3 Rand. 280; Bell v. Gillespie, 5 Rand. 273; Broaddus v. Turner, Id. 308; Ball v. Payne, 6 Rand. 73, heretofore decided, I have given my opinion on this question generally, with the reasons and authorities on which it was founded. These, I shall not repeat, but will simply inquire, whether, and in what degree, the principles governing those cases, where land was devised, apply to the present, where the subject claimed is personal estate.

In the early ages of the law, there could be no limitation over, after an interest given in personal estate, the rule being, that a gift for an hour, as to it, was a gift forever: but this has long been changed; and it is laid down by Mr. Fearne, as settled by numerous decisions, that there may be as well an executory bequest of personal, as an executory devise of real estate. They are governed too, by the same general rules. Thus, in either case, the devise must be such, that in the very nature of the limitation it must vest within twenty-one years, after a life or lives in being; if more remote, it is void in its creation: and the question, whether the contingency be too remote, depends on the construction of the will at the time of making, and cannot be influenced by after events. The possibility, at the creation of an executory devise, that the event on which its existence depends, may exceed the prescribed limits, vitiates it from the very beginning. Hence, in all limitations over, after a failure of issue, the question arises, whether it be a definite or indefinite failure, which the testator intended. If a precise time is fixed and clearly defined, and that time be within the prescribed limits, the limitation over is a good executory devise: but if from the whole will it appear, that the testator meant to give it to the first taker and his descendants, and that the limitation over should take effect only when the issue of the first taker should become extinct, without reference

330 *to any particular event or time, then the devise is void, though the first taker should die without issue within twelve months. Thus, a devise to A. and his heirs, and if he die without heir, or without heir of his body, or without issue, to B. and his heirs: the devise to B. is void, as being too remote. But a devise to A. and his heirs, and if he die without heir living at his death, or without heir living B. then to B. and his heirs, is a good limitation over to B.; because it must vest, if at all, within the time allowed. And, although the failure of issue be not tied up to the death of the first taker, by express words; yet if it can be clearly seen from the whole will, that such was the meaning of the testator, the devise will be good. Upon this question of intention, the courts seem to have taken some distinction between executory devises of real, and bequests of personal estate; being much more inclined in the latter, than in the former, to lay hold of any words in the will, to tie up the generality of the expression dying without issue, and confine it to dying without issue living at the death of the first taker. Mr. Fearne, in his essay on executory devises (Butler's edi. ch. 3), treats this subject with his usual learning and ability: and after citing and commenting upon all the cases touching the points, his conclusion seems to be, that the words dying without issue, when they stand alone, mean an indefinite failure of issue, and make the devise over, whether of realty or of personalty, too remote; but that the signification of these words, in bequest of personal estate may be confined to a dying without issue then living, by any clause or circumstance in the will, which can indicate or imply such intention. After all, then, it is a question of intention.

The testator, in this case, had two sons and a daughter by his wife. To these he gives real and personal estate, to them and their heirs, and if they die without heirs, he gives the property first to one of them, and then to the other, so as to shew, that by heirs he meant issue; making it to each an estate tail. It is most clear to me, 331 that in each of these *devises, he meant that the first taker should have an estate transmissible to his descendants, so long as any existed; and that, whenever the line of the first taker should fail, the property should go to the second taker, without reference to the time of such failure. I think thus, because this is the very nature of such estate as is given; an estate tail necessarily implying issue, in indefinite succession: and as it is given to the first taker, so long as he shall have descendants, we cannot suppose it was intended to limit the commencement to the estate of the next taker, to an earlier period, without words to that effect. Thus, it seems to me, that each of the legitimate children took an estate tail, which the statute enlarged into a fee. Then, as to the natural son, the testator gives him, two negro boys, two negro girls, and their future increase, to him and his heirs forever; and if he die without heirs, he gives the negroes among his legitimate children. I see nothing in the will tying up this bequest to a dying without issue living at the death. Then comes the clause under which the plaintiffs claim: "in case all my children by my wife should die without heirs, it is my will, that my son Charles, shall fall heir to the whole of my estate." By these words, "if all my children by my wife should die without heirs," it seems to me, that (recollecting the manner, in which the testator uniformly uses the word 'heirs') an implied estate tail is given to each of his lawful children in his whole estate, and then a fee simple to Charles, by the words "my son Charles shall fall heir to the whole of my estate." But this fee is cut down, I think, by the next clause (the testator by heirs always meaning issue): "And in case he (Charles) should also die without heirs, it is my desire, that my estate be divided into six parts, and that three-sixths go to my father's brothers that are alive, and the heirs of those who are dead, such heirs receiving no more among them, than my father's brothers would have received had they been living, &c." Now, it seems to me impossible to doubt, that the intention here was to give this estate to the family of Charles, as long as there should be 332 "any descendant of his in the lapse of time. Nor can I think the testator meant, that unless his father's brothers, and the other devisees, could take at the instant of the death of Charles, they should never take; that if Charles should have a child which should die the next hour, this should defeat all the limitations over in that clause. I must think he meant that whenever the issue of Charles failed, his uncles and the other devisees should take; and this we know, was a contingency too remote. The plaintiffs acknowledge this to be the case as to the real estate, by making no claims to it; and it is clear to me, that the intention as to both was the same.

The cases of Timberlake v. Graves, and Gresham v. Greshams, 6 Munf. 174, 187, were cited as governing this. Judging from the reports of these cases, they underwent but little discussion, either from the bar or the bench. Understanding them as the counsel did, I acknowledge I cannot see clearly how they are to be reconciled to the otherwise unbroken current of decision, both in England and here; yet they do not profess to overrule or depart from the former cases. In Timberlake v. Graves (which governed the other) there was a devise of slaves and their increase, "to my beloved nephew, J. A. and his heirs forever; and if he die without heir, then and in that case, what I have given him, to be equally divided between my two nieces, M. A. and P. A." The first taker J. A. sold one of the slaves, and died without issue. The executory legatees brought detinue against the purchaser. A special verdict stated these facts, and the court below gave judgment for the defendants. This court reversed it, and entered judgment for the plaintiffs. Judge Roane, who pronounced the opinion of the court, assigned the following reasons: "the ground on which the opinion of the court is founded, is, that the devise over to the nieces, is to them merely, and not to them and their heirs. It purports a limitation to themselves, and was intended as a personal benefit to them. This construction is fortified by the words then and in that case, and equally to 333 be divided, *found in the bequest; which, though singly taken, they might not be complete to limit the previous words, have that effect in conjunction with the circumstance above mentioned." The ground here assumed, is, that the nieces took no estate transmissible to their representatives; nothing but a life estate: that it was a personal benefit intended for them alone, which would be intirely defeated, if it did not take effect in their lives: and on this principle, it was considered as tying up the failure of issue to a life in being. If the court had believed, that the devise to the nieces carried the whole interest in the slaves, it must, upon its own ground, have pronounced it bad; for then it would not have narrowed the operation of the preceding words, which of themselves clearly meant an indefinite failure of issue. Taking the case thus, (and I can understand it no other way), it would seem to make against the plaintiffs in this case: since, if the devise here were intended solely as a personal benefit; if the interest it gave, was but a life estate; then, the contingency on which it was to vest, has never happened, for it was to take effect only after the death of all the testator's children, and one of them outlived all the executory devisees. The same reply may be given to the proposition, that from the devise to the wife in this same clause, it is evident the contingency was limited to happen in her life: if this be true, the contingency has not and cannot happen, for the daughter Elizabeth survived her mother.

But, it seems to me, the devise to the testator's uncles, was not a mere personal benefit: it is to those who are alive, and the heirs of those who are dead; and such heirs are to take no more among them than the uncles would, had they been living: When? Not at any particular period, but whenever the failure of issue should happen. Moreover, the devise (as was admitted at the bar) gives them the whole interest, the fee: this takes it wholly out of the influence of Timberlake v. Graves.

334 *GREEN, J. The last member of the clause of Mr. Thomson's will, on which this case depends, giving the testator's wife the use of the whole of the estate for life, in case all her children should die without heirs, should, in its natural order, be read as occurring in the commencement of the clause, thus: "It is my will and desire, that, in case all my children by my wife, should die without heirs, she is to have the use of the whole of my estate as long as she lives, and that my son Charles shall fall heir, &c." It is clear, that the word "heirs," wherever it is used in this clause, means issue; that the expression used, in relation to the brothers of the testator's father "who are alive," meant such as might be alive upon the death without issue of all those who were to take before them; and that this expression was intended, not to prescribe as a condition upon which the limitation over was to take effect, that some one or more of them must be then alive, but the mode in which those alive, if any, and the descendants of those dead, or of all, if all were dead, should take; that is, per stirpes.

This, then, is a naked case of a limitation over after an indefinite failure of issue, unless the limitation being to persons in esse, without the addition of words of perpetuity, restrains it within the limits allowed to executory bequests: for, the interposition of an estate for life to the wife, between that of the first takers and the ultimate limitation has no effect in imposing such a restraint. The testator did not mean, that the death of the wife before the failure of the issue of the first takers, should defeat the other limitations over, or that her being alive at that time, should be a necessary condition to the right of those who were intended to take ultimately, upon the failure of the issue of the first takers: he only intended, that she should take the life estate, in the event that she was then alive. This was expressly held in Barlow v. Salter, 17 Ves. 479, in the case of personal estate; and the case of Clare v. Clare, Ca. Temp. Talb. 21, is to the same effect. There, the devise was of a term in trust for A. for life, and after his death for his issue male for life, and when the issue male should happen to be extinct, for C. for life, remainder in trust for the issue of C. for life, remainder to the issue male of the family of Clare: and it was held that all the limitations over, after the life estate of A. (he dying without issue in the lifetime of C.) were void, and a residuary legatee entitled.

There is no adjudged case in this court, which touches the question under consideration, except Timberlake v. Graves, and the other cases turning upon the same principle, and which followed that, in quick succession. Dunn v. Bray, 1 Call, 338, turned upon the word leave. In Higgenbotham v. Rucker, 2 Call, 313, the word issue was explained by the word children. In Pleasants v. Pleasants, 2 Call, 319, the devise of partial freedom was to persons in esse and their immediate descendants: Yet the court established a perfect perpetuity, and allowed the will of a testator to determine the condition of their descendants forever; slaves until a given age, and afterwards free; a partial slavery once allowed, but before that will was made, abolished by our laws. And in Royall v. Eppes, 2 Munf. 479, the quality of the property bequeathed decided the cause; slaves which came by the wife, to return to her in person, without embracing their issue or increase.

In Timberlake v. Graves (decided March 1818) the limitation over to particular persons, without words of perpetuity, was held to restrain the dying without issue, to the period of their lives; as purporting a limitation to themselves, and intended as a personal benefit to them. But the court did not rely upon that circumstance alone: they considered the words then and in that case, and to be equally divided, as aiding that construction, although singly taken they might not be complete to limit the previous words. This effect attributed to those other words, had some countenance, though perhaps was not justified, by the case of Pinbury v. Elkin, 1 P. Wms. 563, where the words then after her decease, were held to tie up the event upon which the limitation over was to take effect, to a dying without issue then living; 336 *and Doe v. Lyde, 1 T. R. 593, in which the words, to the children share and share alike, and if he die without issue then over, was held to have that effect. In Gresham v. Greshams (October 1818) the limitation over to particular persons, without words of perpetuity, was connected with a direction that the subject should be equally divided between them. Then followed the case of James v. M'Williams (February 1819) in which there was no circumstance, except the limitation over without words of perpetuity, to determine the construction; and the limitation over was held to be good. In the case of Didlake v. Hooper, the bequest to A. for life, and if he have issue, to them at his death; and if he should die without issue, to two, by name, without words of perpetuity: there, the limitation over might be construed to be intended to take effect, only upon a dying without such issue as could take at the death of the first taker, who took only for his life. In the reports of these cases, we have none of the arguments of counsel: indeed, none of them, except the first, appear to have been argued: all the others, except perhaps the last, must have been decided upon the authority of the first, and upon the admission, that that proceeded upon the ground, that a limitation over after the failure of issue, without words of perpetuity, was good, without the aid of any other circumstance.

This doctrine was, for the first time, asserted in Timberlake v. Graves; and, so far from being supported by any insinuation in any prior case, is expressly contradicted by great numbers. In Bigge v. Bensley, 1 Bro. C. C. 187; Glover v. Strothoff, 2 Bro. C. C. 33, and Robinson v. Fitzherbert, Id. 127, we have the very words of the wills; and in the last, an equal division was also directed. The limitations were held to be too remote, although the circumstance under consideration occurred in all of them. The counsel, in those cases, did not even suggest, that it was entitled to any weight, nor has it ever been suggested in any of the multitude of cases to the same effect, which 337 *might be cited. Neither is it reconcilable with the general principle of executory bequests. The settled rule, frequently recognized in this court, is, that to the validity of an executory devise or bequest, it is necessary, that it be so framed as to shew, that the testator intended it should not take effect, unless the event, upon which it was to do so, was such as must necessarily happen, if at all, within the period allowed by law. If a devise over for life only, be good, it is because it cannot take effect at all, unless the failure of issue take place in the lifetime of the devisee, who is to take a life estate in that event. But a contingent limitation of personal estate, without words of perpetuity, always gave as absolute a right, as if given with words of perpetuity; an interest, which, before the contingency happens, is vendible, deviseable and transmissible to the representatives of the devisee. Fearne, Butler's edi. 548, 552. Upon what ground, then, can the presence or absence of words of perpetuity, make any difference in the construction? It is said, because the want of such words indicates the state of the testator's mind, and that he contemplated the probability that the event might or would take place in the lifetime of the party designated to take in that event. That must necessarily be in his contemplation, in all possible cases: but that alone is not enough to make the limitation good: he must also intend, that the limitation over shall not take effect, unless the event does happen in the lifetime of the party; or it is void.

The only ground, upon which the cases of Timberlake v. Graves, and those that followed it, can be supported, is, that the omission of words of perpetuity proves, that the testator intended that the limitation should not take effect, unless the failure of issue happened in the lifetime of the person designated to take in that event: otherwise, the legal restraint upon perpetuities is utterly abrogated, and a testator may controul his property ad infinitum, by limiting it to some person, or a succession of persons, in esse, after a general failure of issue, without words of perpetuity; 338 in which case,* upon a failure of issue after many generations, the limitation being good in its origin, his remote executors or administrators will be entitled, for the benefit, first, of his creditors, and then of his descendants or collateral kindred. This we cannot suppose the court intended, by the decisions in those cases; and they are not authority for the case at bar, as all those intended to take upon the failure of the first taker, died in his lifetime: otherwise, this absurdity would follow, that the limitation being valid, because the testator intended only a personal benefit to the executory legatee, his executors, and through them, his creditors, may take it in the event in which it was impossible for him to take or enjoy the personal benefit intended; and that the testator, intending that the bequest should not take effect, unless the legatee were alive when the event happened, yet his right to take exists, and is transmitted to his personal representative, though the event has not happened in his lifetime.

If I am wrong in this, there is another ground, on which all the limitations over, in this clause of the will, were clearly void. That to the testator's natural son, which preceded all the others, was accompanied with words of perpetuity: if all the other children died without heirs, he was to fall heir to the whole estate; and if he died without heirs, then over to those now claiming. These words give him, upon the expressed intention of the testator, as absolute an estate, as if the gift had been to him and his heirs in terms. So that the limitation over to him, upon a general failure to issue, was clearly void. And, when a preceding limitation is too remote, all that succeed it, even although limited to take effect in good time, are defeated. Thus, in Proctor v. Bishop of Bath and Wells, 2 H. Blacks. 358, a devise to the first or other son of T. P. (he having none) that should be bred a clergyman and be in holy orders, and to his heirs and assigns, but if T. P. shall have no such son, then to his grandson T. M. and his heirs: T. P. died without ever having had a son; and it was held, that the first limitation over was too remote, as none could take holy orders until the age of twenty-four, and as T. P. might have a son born a short 339 *time before his death, who might take holy orders at the age of twenty-four, which would be beyond the fixed limit of executory devises; and that the devise over was, consequently void also. The same principle is affirmed in Chatham v. Tothill, 7 Bro. P. C. 453; Tomlins' ed.

One word as to the influence, which our statute of 1819, prescribing the construction of future limitations after a failure of issue, ought to have upon our judgment, in cases like this. Elizabeth G. Thomson had, as the law was clearly settled when her father made his will, and her mother and brothers died, an absolute right to the property in question, with an unlimited power to dispose of it at her pleasure. Surely, it is too much to say, that the court should now deprive her devisee, or purchasers from her, of those vested rights, because the legislature has changed the law, even if that was done in consequence of an opinion, that the courts had given an improper construction to the effect of such limitations. Those constructions, right or wrong (and I think, they were founded in sound principles of public policy and private convenience) had fixed the law, and gave rights, which, like all others, should be held sacred.

COALTER, J., concurred in opinion with the other judges, that the executory bequest, under which the appellees claim the property in question, was limited upon a failure of issue of the first takers, not restrained by any expression in the will, or by any circumstance indicated in it, to a failure of issue within the limits indulged to executory devises; a general, indefinite failure of issue. Therefore, the limitation was void in its creation. It was so, in respect to the real estate, clearly and acknowledgedly: and, as the executory bequest of the personal estate, was limited over in the same words with the executory devise of the real, and was intended to take effect at the same time, upon the same contingency, upon the same failure of issue, the executory bequest of the personal subject was also ineffectual.

Decree reversed, and bill dismissed.

(Absent BROOKE, P. and CABELL, J.)*

Bills of Exception—Certificate of Facts or Evidence—Quere.†—Question, whether exceptions to an opinion of a court, overruling a motion for a new trial

*CABELL, J., did not sit, because he was related to the appellee.

†Bills of Exception—Certificate of Facts.—On this question, the principal case is cited in Rohr v. Davis, 9 Leigh 33, and note, in which note there is a discussion of the question: Ewing v. Ewing, 2 Leigh 340, 342, 345; Jackson v. Henderson, 3 Leigh 215; Green v. Ashby, 6 Leigh 141, 143, 145, 146, 148, 149, 150, 151; Slaughter v. Tutt, 12 Leigh 162, 164; Tallafarro v. Franklin, 1 on the ground that the verdict was contrary to evidence, were well taken or not? whether the exceptions stated the facts proved, or only the evidence adduced to prove them?

Debt in the county court of Halifax, brought by Bennett as assignee of Boyd, against Carrington, on a bond for 353 dollars, executed by Carrington to Boyd, and by him assigned to Bennett. Carrington pleaded, that the consideration of the bond was money won of him by Boyd, at unlawful gaming, by playing at cards: and on this plea an issue was made up. The jury found a verdict for Bennett; which Carrington moved the county court to set aside, and grant him a new trial: the court overruled the motion, and gave judgment upon the verdict. Carrington filed a bill of exceptions to the judgment of the county court denying him a new trial, and appealed to the circuit court, which affirmed the judgment; and then he appealed to this court.

The bill of exceptions was as follows: "Be it remembered, that on the trial of this cause, the plaintiff introduced, in support of the issue on his part, a bond in these words"—Here the bond was set out in hæc verba: it was a single bill, executed by Carrington to Boyd, for 353 dollars, dated September 18, 1819, and one William Thaxton was the subscribing witness: and an assignment of the bond by Boyd to the plaintiff Bennett, was indorsed on it—"And this being all the evidence on the part of the plaintiff, the defendant introduced a witness, who proved, that in the month of March, 1819, the witness was present when the obligee in the said bond (Boyd) and the defendant gamed, and the next morning the obligee told the witness that he had won about 600 dollars of the defendant.

341 That afterwards, *sometime in the month of September in the same year, the obligee in the said bond and the subscribing witness thereto (Thaxton), who was admitted to be the agent of the plaintiff (Bennett), came together to the house of the witness, and stated to him, that they had come for the purpose of meeting the defendant there, who had agreed upon that meeting, in order to give his bond to the obligee; that the debt for which the bond was to be given was a gaming debt; that a part of the debt was transferred to the plaintiff (Bennett) for whom the bond was to be taken. That the defendant did not meet the obligee and the subscribing witness, on that day; but that the witness afterwards, in the same month, saw the subscribing witness and obligee, who then stated, that they had obtained the bond from the defendant, and that the bond was taken for a less amount than the original gaming debt, for that they had been compelled by the defendant, to allow credits, in order to obtain the bond, which he the obligee would not otherwise have allowed. It was also admitted on the part of the defendant, that he had purchased a slave of the obligee (Boyd) at the price of 500 dollars, some years previous to the date of the bond upon which this suit was instituted. The witness also stated, that he did not know, that this bond upon which the suit was brought, was given for gaming consideration. And these being all the facts proved in the cause, the jury retired from the bar, and brought in a verdict for the plaintiff"—which was set forth in hæc verba—"Whereupon, the defendant moved for a new trial; which motion was overruled by the court; to which opinion of the court the defendant excepts, and prays the court to seal this his bill of exceptions: which is done accordingly."

Leigh, for the appellant, said, the bill of exceptions to the judgment of the county court, on the motion to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial, was well taken, according to the opinion of this court in Bennett v. Hardaway, 6 Munf. 125, and

Keys v. M'Fatridge, Id. 18. The facts 342 were *stated in the exceptions, as admitted by the parties, and as proved by a single witness: nothing was offered to contradict the facts stated by him, nothing to impeach his credit.

The exceptions were certainly intended to state, that the facts therein set forth, were facts proved; for it was expressly said, that these were all the facts proved in the cause.

The fact, that the bond in question was founded on a gaming consideration, was not, indeed, directly and positively proved: the facts proved, were only circumstances bearing on the principal fact in issue; but such circumstances, as should have led the minds of the jury and the court, to infer, undoubtingly, that this was a gaming debt.

Johnson, for the appellee, denied, that the bills of exceptions was well taken, according to the doctrine laid down in Bennett v. Hardaway; and he entered into a critical examination of it, to shew, that it did not profess to state facts as proved to the satisfaction of the court, but only the evidence adduced at the trial.

The jury which tried the cause, and the county court before which the trial was had, which knew the parties and the witness too, and heard the evidence, were better able than any appellate court, to determine, whether or no the evidence proved the facts it was adduced to prove.

And, even supposing the bill of exceptions to state, not merely evidence offered, but facts proved, the proof did not sustain the plea: the plea alleged, that the money was won at unlawful gaming at cards; the proof was, at most, that it was won at gaming, without ascertaining what kind of gaming; and there are many games, at which men may play, and at which money may be won, without offending against any law.

CARR, J. It was questioned at the bar, whether the bill of exceptions in this case, contained a statement of all the evidence before the jury, or a certificate by the judge of such facts only as he considered proved. To my understanding, it is a simple detail of the evidence, drawn 343 by the *counsel, and signed by the judge, not omitting one title of the testimony before the jury. It begins thus: "Be it remembered, that on the trial of this cause, the plaintiff introduced, in support of the issue on his part, a bond in these words, &c." setting out the paper with its indorsements verbatim et literatim: and then is added, "and this being all the evidence on the part of the plaintiff, the defendant introduced a witness who proved &c." going on to detail, with great particularity, the evidence of this witness. It is then added, "the defendant admitted, that he had purchased a negro of the obligee, at the price of 500 dollars, some years previous to the bond, on which this suit was instituted. The witness also stated, that he did not know, that this bond upon which suit is brought, was given for a gaming consideration. And these being all the facts proved in the cause, the jury" &c. notwithstanding these last words "facts proved," it is clear to me, that this is a detail of the evidence, and all the evidence, before the jury, not a statement, by the court of such facts, as it considered proved by the mass of evidence. The whole frame and manner of the exception shews this.

This then, is the very question which was before the court in Bennett v. Hardaway, in which judge Roane delivering the opinion of the court, after stating the case, says, "the question is, whether it is competent to a party, to carry all the evidence to the appellate court, by a bill of exceptions, and on the ground of it to reverse a judgment of the court below, refusing to grant a new trial?" He proceeds to give strong and conclusive reasons, why an appellate court, cannot upon the evidence reverse the opinion of the trying court. "It does not follow, (he says) that the judge believes every witness who gives evidence before him; as he may well hesitate to do, from the manner of testifying, and other extraneous circumstances; nor can he do it, where they conflict with one another. It is evident, therefore, that, in this case, the opinion of this court might be founded on the testimony of witnesses, who were discredited both by the jury and the court below."

344 Now, apply this reasoning to *the case before us: we have the statement of a witness, who says, that in March 1819, he saw the obligor and obligee gaming, and the next morning the obligee told him, he had won of the defendant about 600 dollars: that, in September 1819, the obligee and the subscribing witness to the bond, came to the house of the witness, and said they had come to meet the defendant there, who had agreed to give his bond to the obligee; that the debt for which the bond was to be given was a gaming debt, and that a part of it was transferred to the plaintiff, for whom this bond was to be taken: that the defendant failed to meet, but afterwards, in the same month, the obligee and the subscribing witness told the witness, that they had obtained the bond from the defendant, but had to take it for less than the original gaming debt, being compelled to allow credits in order to get the bond. The witness added, that he did not know, that this bond now in suit was given for a gaming consideration. It is insisted, that this evidence makes it very clear, that the bond in the record was the very bond given for the gaming debt; and that the jury and court grossly erred, in not drawing this inference, instead of the contrary one. But, how do we know, that the court and jury believed this witness? They may have discredited his whole tale. They saw and heard him; and there may have been that in his manner (though wholly hidden from us) which proved to them he was intirely unworthy of credit. Is not this more likely, than that the jury and court should have come to a conclusion the very opposite of that, at which (if they credited the witness) it is insisted they must inevitably have arrived? And if upon the strength of what this witness swore, we reverse the judgment and set aside the verdict, may not our opinion (in the words of judge Roane) be founded, upon testimony discredited both by the jury and court below? "This (the judge adds) would be for this court, not only to revise and reverse the opinion of the court below, on a question touching the weight of evidence and the credit of the witnesses, but to do it in the dark, or, at least, with lights 345 *inferior to those possessed by that court. That court while it can faithfully transmit to this, the actual words spoken by the witnesses, can give it no fac simile of the manner of testifying, the hesitation or partiality manifested on the trial, or the like. With respect to these important circumstances, as they relate to the weight of testimony, and credibility of witnesses, this court is intirely in the dark; the advantages are exclusively confined to the court of trial." The judge then illustrates his position by several analogies: among others, the case of a verdict found on a view, in which the court will hardly ever grant a new trial "because the jury may have been influenced by what they saw on the view, and which the court did not see. This last position (he adds) is intirely analogous to the case before us, and decisive of it. The jury and court below saw what this court cannot see. They had, or may have had, the most cogent reasons for discrediting witnesses, on whose testimony (it appearing only on paper) this court might found its judgment." Upon this reasoning the court decided, that it is not competent to a party to carry up the evidence to an appellate court, by a bill of exceptions, and upon the ground of it to reverse the judgment of a court below refusing to grant a new trial: and this decision seems to me conclusive of the present case.

But in Bennett v. Hardaway, the court after deciding the case before it, puts another, and says, that if a bill of exceptions were taken to the refusal to grant a new trial, in which bill the judge should state the facts (contradistinguished from evidence) as they appeared in evidence to him, they would be inclined to entertain such a bill of exceptions. "In that case, the exception is not liable to the objection existing in the case before us. The appellate court does not, in that case, depart from or overrule the decision of the trying court, as to the weight of testimony, or the credit due to any witness. It only acts upon his own certificate and acknowledgment of his opinion upon the subject. Such an exception only states briefly the facts as they 346 appeared *to the judge, and are admitted by him to have been proved; and in consequence of such his admission, the appellate court founds its decision, upon the same facts as those which governed the court below." In the case here put, it seems to me, that the appellate court must receive and act upon the facts stated, as it would act upon a special verdict, in which it is to have facts, not evidence; and is to infer or imply nothing: the inferences must be made by the judge who tried the cause, because they depend on the weight of evidence, the credibility of witnesses; and he alone, who saw and heard them, can weigh them. In the case before us, for instance: the bond shewed no gaming; the fact, that the defendant had bought a slave from the obligee, some years before, shewed, that the bond might have been given on that account. But the evidence of the witness, detailing what he saw, and what the obligee told him, went strongly to the conclusion, that the bond was for a gaming debt. The jury, however, have said, that it was not so, and the court agreed with them. Now, they both heard this witness; and their decision must have been governed very much by the credit they gave him. If they believed him, we can hardly see, how they avoided the conclusion, that it was a gaming debt. If they disbelieved him, the verdict of the jury was intirely correct, and so was the refusal of the court to grant a new trial. If this bill of exceptions, then, had intended to give us the court's state of the facts, as proved, it ought to have stated, not the evidence of this witness, but its opinion of the effect of that evidence; the facts it proved.

I think, then, in every aspect in which we can view the case of Bennett v. Hardaway, whether we take the case actually decided by the court, or that hypothetically put, it condemns the bill of exceptions before us.

It seems a little strange, that the defendant, knowing that he had to prove his plea, did not summon the only witness, who could have placed the fact beyond question. The subscribing witness to the bond must have known all about 347 *the matter: we do not hear, that he had removed, was dead, or could not be found.

Upon the whole, I do not think we can reverse this judgment, without the hazard of acting upon evidence, which the jury and court below discredited: I am therefore for affirming it.

GREEN, J. I think the exception in this case was well taken. The effect of the case of Bennett v. Hardaway is, that it is not competent to a party, by way of an exception to the granting of or refusal to grant a new trial, to refer to the judgment of the appellate court, the credit of the witnesses; and that, therefore, the facts considered by the court as proved upon the trial, and not the evidence by which they are proved, should be stated. If the rule there laid down, were considered as extending further than this, and to require, that the court should not state the proved facts from which the fact in issue might or might not be inferred, but only the inference made by the court; then, there could be no case, in which an exception to the allowance or refusal of a new trial, could be successfully taken, (except where the court below erred in declaring the law arising from an admitted state of facts,) even in a case, where the ground of the application for a new trial, is, that the verdict was contrary to the evidence. For, if the proof of the fact in issue, was direct and contradictory, the court must state, that the fact was proved, in its judgment, according to the credit it gave to the testimony; and to such a case the rule in Bennett v. Hardaway, applies. But, in a case in which there was no direct evidence to prove the fact in issue, but only proof of other facts from which the matter in issue might or might not be inferred; if the court, instead of stating the proved facts, from which such an inference might arise, were required to state its own inference, this would be, not to state the fact or facts proved, but the judgment of the court as to their effect: and there would be nothing for the appellate court to 348 decide *or act upon. Yet, the jury and court below may err as essentially, and as fatally to the rights of the parties, in their inferences of other facts from the admitted facts, as in respect to the law arising from the facts proved. And, as I understand the decisions of this court, such an error may be corrected by exception and appeal.

This is such a case. The clear inference from the proved facts, was, that the bond in question was given for a gaming consideration. Those facts are, that the parties gamed in March; and the obligee, afterwards, declared that he had then won 600 dollars of the obligor. In September, the obligee and the agent of the subsequent assignee declared, that they went to a certain place to meet the obligor, by appointment, who was then to give his bond for a gaming debt due to the obligee, a part of which had already been transferred to the subsequent assignee of the bond: not meeting the obligor at the appointed place, they afterwards, in the same month, declared, that they had obtained the bond from the obligor, for less than the original gaming debt, the obligor having compelled them to allow credits, as a condition of giving the bond, which he would not otherwise have allowed. The bond in question, is dated the sixteenth and was assigned the eighteenth of September; and the agent of the assignee is the subscribing witness, both to the execution of the bond and the assignment. The only fact directly proved, was that of the gaming: all the rest were inferrible from the admissions of the obligee and the agent of the assignee; an agent for procuring the bond and assignment, whose declarations being a part of the res gesta, and therefore admissible, or if not, unimportant, since those of the obligee were sufficient. The court could not truly certify, that it was proved that the obligee won money of the obligor, and that he took this bond for the money so won. It could, with truth, only state, that those facts had been admitted by him, from which the existence of the facts might be fairly inferred.

349 *To avoid the plain inferences from the facts proved, the appellee insisted on the fact, that the obligor had, some years before the date of the bond, purchased a slave of the obligee at the price of 500 dollars, and so this bond for 353 dollars might have been for the balance of that purchase; an inference decisively repelled by the fact, that the bond was given for less than the gaming debt, in consequence of set-offs claimed and allowed, so that, upon their transactions, independent of the gaming debt, the obligee was indebted to the obligor.

It is said the evidence did not support the plea, which alleges that the bond was given for money won by unlawful gaming at cards, while the evidence is silent as to the manner of gaming. It does not appear, that this objection was taken at the trial, or upon the motion for a new trial. To allow it now to prevail, would be a surprise on the party. Suppose no inquiry was made of the witness, by either party, at the trial, as to the manner of the gaming, and this objection had been made upon the motion for a new trial: ought not the court to have inquired how the fact was, and if it found that the gaming was at cards, and there were no other objection, to have allowed a new trial upon the ground of surprise? I think it ought: and, as the appellee failed to make the objection in the court below, where it might have been met and obviated, it ought not to be heard here.

I think the verdict was manifestly contrary to evidence, and that both judgments should be reversed, and a new trial of the issue directed.

COALTER, J. I am of opinion, that this is a bill of exceptions, which, according to the authority of Bennett v. Hardaway, presents a fit case for the judgment of this court on a refusal of a court below to grant a new trial, on 'the ground of the verdict being contrary to evidence.

There was no conflicting evidence in the case: only one witness was examined; and the facts not proved by him, were admitted by the parties, and inserted in the bill of exceptions.

350 *If the bill of exceptions had stated, that the defendant introduced a witness who testified to such and such a purpose; perhaps, it might have been said (though the court below does not say so) that the court did not believe him, and so was right in not granting a new trial. But, I incline to think, that, in such a case, the court ought so to have stated it, as its reason for refusing a new trial, where, otherwise, such new trial ought to have been granted. This would not be necessary, if there was a contrariety of evidence; because two conflicting witnesses, however credible, cannot both be believed; one or the other must be mistaken, or willfully perjured; and the court and jury must judge of this; and then the court must certify the fact as it believes it to be proved. I presume it would not be less a fact, because certified in the language of the witness. It may be necessary so to certify it; because as in this case, what the witness proves may only amount to circumstances, from which the main fact in controversy may be inferred one way or the other. Suppose there had been another witness who had testified, that he was present at the same times and places, mentioned by the witness whose evidence is detailed in this cause, and who had stated contradictory facts, which, if believed, would overthrow his evidence, but which was not believed, either from the manner of giving evidence, or infamy of character, or for any other reason: such evidence ought to form no part of the bill of exceptions, since it proved nothing, and therefore it would be improper to introduce it, according to the case of Bennett v. Hardaway, unless, indeed, for the purpose of shewing to this court, that there was contrariety of evidence, and that on that score the court below ought not to have interfered, the jury being the proper judges of credit &c. But here, the bill of exceptions does not state, that the defendant introduced a witness who testified, but a witness who proved, certain facts, and confessions of the obligee, going to shew that the debt sued for was a gaming debt; and then concludes, "these being all the facts proved in the cause." &c. Now, 351 I confess, *I cannot see the difference between the case as thus stated, and a statement, that the defendant proved, that in the month of March 1819, the obligor and obligee gamed together, and that on the next day the obligee confessed that he had won 600 dollars of the other: that in September, (the bond in question bearing date the sixteenth day of that month) the subscribing witness (who the plaintiff admitted was his agent) together with the obligee, repaired to a certain place, as they confessed, in order to take an obligation from the defendant for the gaming debt aforesaid, &c. &c. setting out every thing, which the witness proved, in this way.

The only question, it seems to me, which the bill of exceptions before us, or one taken in the way last indicated, would present, is, whether, if the jury failed to draw the inference (which it would have been well warranted in doing) that the obligation sued on was given for a debt won at unlawful gaming, it was competent for the court, which heard the trial, to set aside the verdict as being contrary to evidence?

It is true, that this is a case, in which the jury must infer the fact, that this was a gaming debt, and it would be incompetent for a court to do so, on a special verdict finding these facts and circumstances: but I do not think it follows, that, if a jury improperly infer a fact from circumstances too weak to justify the inference, or fail or refuse to infer a fact, which, in many cases, they would be as correct in inferring, as to find the fact on positive proof, it is without the power of the court to correct such improper finding. Had the court granted a new trial in this case, and an exception had been taken precisely on the words of this bill, and the verdict on the new trial had been for the defendant, could we have reversed the judgment, because, although we might agree with the court which granted the new trial, that the first verdict ought to have been the same with the last, yet the first verdict must stand, the court not having the power to set it aside? It seems to me not. Where the evidence is not contradictory, where there is no contest

352 about credibility, *the court and jury must each weigh the evidence, whether positive or circumstantial, and must each, within their respective spheres, pronounce upon it. If this be correct, then, either no appeal lies to correct an error in refusing or granting a new trial in such a case, or it must be done in the manner in which this case is brought before us.

I am of opinion, that the current of decisions in this court warrants the appellate tribunal, in a case properly made out as this is, in revising the decisions of inferior tribunals refusing to grant new trials. I am also of opinion, that the inference, from the facts proved, that this obligation was given for a gaming consideration, is too manifest and irresistible, to justify the verdict of the jury, and the refusal of the county court to set it aside. Both judgments must, therefore, be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial to be had.

Patents—Prior Equitable Right against Grantee—Jurisdiction of Equity.—Under what circumstances, a party shall be entertained in equity, to assert a prior equitable right against a grantee claiming under a patent, the claimant having never prosecuted a caveat against the patentee.

Same—Entry—Failure of Survey to Conform with—Effect—Case at Bar.—In the location of a land warrant, the entry calls to begin at three marked red-oaks, and to extend down for quantity: these three oaks are on the head waters of a stream called Poplar Fork: the survey does not extend down that stream for quantity, but leaving it intirely, extends down the general course of the country: and there is evidence, that the call of the entry to extend down for quantity, in the usual sense of that phrase in locations, required the locator to extend down Poplar Fork for quantity. HELD. the survey is naught for not conforming with the entry.

Same—Same—Sufficiency of Survey—Case at Bar.—An entry calls to begin one mile above a marked tree and a rock on Big-Hurricane creek, eight or nine miles above its mouth: the marked tree and rock are on the east side of the creek, 18 miles from its mouth by the meanders, and more than 9 miles in a straight line: the survey of this entry begins at a point on the west side of the creek, 65 poles from the stream, and one mile and 84 poles from the designated tree and rock. HELD. 1. The entry is special and precise enough: 2. The survey conforms with the entry with reasonable exactness, especially as a jury had so found shortly after the survey, upon a caveat to which though not all yet some of the parties, now contesting the right under this survey, were parties.

Edward Billips and others claiming under him, exhibited their bill in the superior court of chancery of Staunton, against Andrew Lewis and others devisees of Thomas Lewis deceased, and John Morris and others claiming under William Morris deceased, Shadrach Harman deceased, Thomas Teas and William Neely, setting forth:

That Billips, in 1794, holding a land office treasury warrant, put the same in the hands of Thomas Lewis to locate for him. And Lewis, having indorsed on the warrant an assignment thereof from Billips to himself, on the 1st October 1794, made an entry thereon in his own name as assignee, for 1437 acres of land in Kanawha county, which was surveyed on the 1st October 1798, and on this survey a grant of the land was issued to Lewis, on the 26th January 1801. But Lewis acted throughout for the benefit of Billips, the owner of the warrant, and always declared, that the land was his property. Accordingly, Billips and 354 *those claiming under him had held the possession of a part of the tract. The whole of the land, however, was now claimed by the defendants, under grants thereof, issued to William Morris, Harman, Teas and Neely; and these patents were older than that granted to Lewis; and the surveys and entries on which they were founded were also older than the survey and entry on which the patent to Lewis was founded; yet the right of Billips under Lewis, was preferable in equity to the right of the defendants claiming under Morris, Harman, Teas and Neely, because their entries were not special and certain, because their entries in truth did not at all interfere with Lewis's entry, and because their surveys, which did interfere with Lewis's survey, were not conformable with their entries. The bill, therefore, prayed that Lewis's devisees might be decreed to convey his right in the land to Billips; that he and the other plaintiffs holding under him, might be quieted in the enjoyment thereof, against the other defendants claiming under the patents of Morris, Harman, Teas and Neely, and that these defendants might be decreed to convey the legal estate derived to them from the elder patents, to Billips; and general relief.

One of the devisees of Lewis answered the bill, and contested the equitable right asserted by the plaintiffs as well as the rights of the defendants claiming under the conflicting patents, and claimed the land for himself and his co-devisees. As against the other devisees, the bill was taken pro confesso.

Several of the defendants claiming under the elder patents, filed their answers, wherein they stated, that Morris and Harman, on the 15th April 1786, duly entered 2000 acres of land in Teas's Valley in Kanawha; and, at the same time, Morris, Harman, Teas and Neely duly entered 4000 acres adjoining the other entry; but owing to the hostility of the indians, and the unsettled state of the country, these entries were not surveyed till February 1795, when the surveys were made and sent to the 355 land office; *and grants were issued upon them, the 28th November and 2d December 1799. They insisted, that their entries were special and certain, the surveys conformable with the entries, and the patents regular: and that, on the other hand, Lewis's entry was not special and certain, and his survey was not conformable with his entry. Therefore, they had not only the elder grants and the legal title, but a preferable right in equity to the land.

The plaintiffs afterwards exhibited a supplemental bill (suggested, no doubt, by the decision of this court in Noland v. Cromwell, 4 Munf. 155), in which they assigned as the reason why neither Lewis nor Billips had had recourse to a caveat, to prevent the grants to Morris, Harman, Teas and Neely, that Morris and one Milburn guardian of Harman's heir, in February 1799, entered a caveat in the county court of Kanawha, against a grant to Lewis upon his survey, and in September following, judgment was given therein, against them and for Lewis; and that it was pending this caveat, or shortly after the decision therein, that Morris and others obtained their grants.

The defendants, in their answers to the supplemental bill, insisted, that the caveat prosecuted by Morris and others against Lewis, to prevent the grant to him, afforded no excuse for the failure of Lewis or Billips to resort to that remedy to prevent the grants to Morris and others.

The allegations of the bill, that Lewis's entry was made by him for Billips, upon a warrant belonging to Billips; that the assignment of the warrant made by Lewis to himself, and the making of the entry in his own name, were not intended to appropriate the land to himself, and to defraud Billips, but only to serve him more effectually; and that he always declared that Lewis's land was located for Billips; and that it was in truth his property; were incontrovertibly proved.

Lewis's entry was in these words "October 1, 1794, Thomas Lewis lifts his entry of 1437 acres, made on Point creek near Farley's Rooting camp, the 31st July 1787; *and enters the same to begin one mile above a tree marked D B. and a large rock standing about 20 poles above the said tree, on Big-Hurricane creek, a branch of Kanawha river, and eight or nine miles above the mouth of said creek; running from said beginning, a line N. 45 W. so far that double the distance S. W. and at right angles, will contain the above quantity of acres: warrant 1437 acres, No. 13700, dated 8th August 1782."

The tree D B. and the rock 20 poles above it, called for in the entry, were on the east side of Big-Hurricane. As to the distance of these objects from the mouth of that creek, there was some variance in the evidence: the distance following the general meanders of the stream, was about thirteen miles; in a straight line, it was something more than nine miles. The beginning point of the survey, which was made on this entry the 1st October 1798, and on which the grant to Lewis was founded, was at two white-oaks, on the west side of the creek, 65 poles from the stream, and a mile and eighty-four poles from the tree D B. and the rock on the east side, called for in the entry. From the two white-oaks, there was a line run N. 45 W. 340 poles, and upon that line a parallelogram extending to the south west was laid down containing an area of 1437 acres.

The entries made by Morris and others, were in these words: 1st. "April 15, 1786, William Morris and Shadrach Harman, assignees of John Hawkins, on a land office treasury warrant, No. 1622, dated 8th May 1783, enter 2000 acres, to begin at three red-oak trees marked with three notches, joining the right of settlement of Jacob Rife, and to extend down for quantity:" 2nd. "April 15, 1786, William Morris, Shadrach Harman, Thomas Teas and William Neely, by virtue of the following land warrants, viz. 3000 acres from warrant No. 15901, 1000 acres from warrants Nos. 16989 and 1698, 1500 acres from warrant No. 20335 (lodged in the surveyor's office of Greenbrier), 706 acres from warrant No. 16035, enter part thereof, 4000 acres, joining the last entry of William Morris 357 *and Harman, so as to include the vacant land on both sides."

The three red-oak trees, called for in the first of these entries, were upon the head waters of a stream called Poplar Fork, a branch of Big-Hurricane creek, which runs thence a north-westward course to Big-Hurricane; and had the 2000 acres been surveyed beginning at the three red-oaks and extending in any way down Poplar Fork for quantity, the survey would not have interfered at all with the survey made on Lewis's entry. But the survey of the tract of 2000 acres, which was in fact made and returned to the land office, and on which Morris and Harman's patent was founded (dated February 15, 1795), began at the three red-oaks, and ran a short base line eastwardly, leaving the waters of Poplar Fork intirely, and crossing a ridge which divided the waters of that stream from those of Big-Hurricane; and upon this line, the area of the 2000 acres was laid off to the south of the beginning point, extending down for quantity, according to the general course of the country; and this survey included a part of Lewis's survey. If the phrase in the entry, "to extend down for quantity," was to be interpreted down Poplar Fork, the survey, so far from conforming to the entry, departed from it at the very beginning and throughout. If that phrase was to be interpreted down the general course of the country, the survey conformed to the entry. To ascertain the sense and acceptation of this phrase, as used and understood in locations, a great many depositions were taken on both sides; and there was some contrariety in the evidence; but the evidence, that the phrase required the locators to extend their survey down the Poplar Fork for quantity, preponderated.

The surveys, made the 20th and 21st February 1795, on the second entry (that, namely, of Morris, Harman, Teas and Neely) were not made so as to include the vacant land on both sides of Morris and Harman's entry, according to the call of his second entry, or indeed the land on both sides of Morris and Harman's 358 survey. The survey on the *second entry joined Morris and Harman's survey, on three short lines at the extreme southern point thereof, and extended southwardly from thence so as to include almost the whole of the land included in Lewis's survey. If Morris and Harman's survey did not conform with their entry, the surveys made on the entry of Morris, Harman, Teas and Neely, were not in any way conformable with the entry.

The record of the caveat in the county of Kanawha, prosecuted by Morris and Harman's heir against Lewis, was exhibited with the supplemental bill. The caveat was filed in February 1799, to prevent the grant of the 1437 acres of land to Lewis, upon his survey thereof of the 1st October 1798, suggesting for cause, that the same was claimed by Morris and Harman, by prior entry and survey. It was tried in September 1799. The jury, sworn to inquire of facts between the parties litigant, found: 1. That Morris and Harman's survey of 2000 acres, did not conform with their entry, because they had not run down for quantity. 2. That their survey of 400 acres did not conform with the entry thereof, as the survey was made of land for which there was in fact no entry. 3. That Lewis's survey of 1437 acres did conform with his entry. And the parties agreed the dates of their respective entries and surveys, and the extent of the interference of the surveys of the caveators with the survey of the caveatee. Upon this state of facts, so found and agreed, the county court gave judgment for Lewis the caveatee. From this judgment the caveators prayed an appeal, which the court allowed them, without requiring an appeal bond with surety, nor was any given during the term; and the appeal was, therefore, dismissed by the district court held at The Sweet Springs, in October 1800. But, meanwhile, viz. in November and December 1799, Morris and his associates, contrary to the judgment upon the caveat, took out their patents for the lands in controversy. Lewis did not apply for this patent, till January 1801, after the district court had dismissed the appeal from the judgment on the caveat.

359 *The late chancellor Brown was of opinion, that Billips had shewn himself entitled, in equity, to the 1437 acres of land granted to Lewis, as against Lewis's devisees; and that, upon the facts proved in the cause, this equitable right of Billips was vested in him before the emanation of the patents to Morris and others; and, considering the circumstances and the manner in which these patents were obtained, the priority of them would not avail the patentees: therefore, he decreed, that the defendants, respectively should convey to Billips, all their right and title in the lands, or any part thereof, included within Lewis's survey of 1437 acres; and that the defendants in possession of the lands should render accounts of rents and profits, &c. The defendants appealed to this court.

1. Johnson said, the chancellor certainly erred, in decreeing Lewis's devisees to convey the land to Billips, without requiring Billips to defray the expenses defrayed by Lewis, in having the entry and survey made, defending the right, and obtaining the patent, or any money otherwise disbursed by him. Leigh admitted, that the decree was erroneous in this particular: but the error was owing to mere inadvertence; and, as the decree was interlocutory, the chancellor might, and doubtless would, have corrected it, whenever his attention was called to it.

II. Johnson, strenuously contended, that the decree was wrong in principle.

1st. He insisted, that Morris and Harman's entry of 2000 acres, was sufficiently special and certain, and that the survey thereof conformed with the entry; and, by consequence, the entry of 4000 acres by Morris, Harman, Teas and Neely, was also special and certain enough, and the survey of this too conformed with the entry, with as much precision as could reasonably be, or had ever been, required in such cases.

360 *This point presented the question, whether the call of Morris and Harman's entry of 2000 acres, required the locators to go from the beginning point on the head waters of Poplar Fork, down that stream for quantity, or justified them in leaving that stream altogether, and going down the general course of the country, for quantity? A question, which mainly depended on the evidence, as to the meaning of the language of the entry, as used and understood in locations.

2dly. He contended that Lewis's location of 1437 acres was naught, not having been made, in the language of the land law, so specially and precisely, as that others might be enabled, with certainty, to locate other warrants on the adjacent residuum (1 Rev. Code, ch. 86, § 17, p. 325); and that, if the entry were good, the survey was fatally vitious, for not conforming with the entry. 1. The location was not special enough. The entry called for a beginning one mile above a marked tree and a rock on Big-Hurricane, eight or nine miles above its mouth; without stating on which side of the creek those objects were; without stating, whether they were to be looked for, eight or nine miles from the mouth of the stream, measuring in a straight line, or by the meanders of the stream; and, above all, without stating, in what course or bearing from the designated objects, the beginning point should be looked for, thus leaving the locator at liberty to select any point he pleased, in an arc of ninety degrees of a circle whereof the radius was a mile, any such point being downward from the designated objects. The entry could be regarded as special enough, only by construing it to call for a beginning at a point on the stream, and on the same side of it with the designated objects, one mile below them. And then, 2. the survey far from conforming with the entry, was an intire departure from it: for the objects designated in the entry, were on the west side of the stream; and the beginning point of the survey, was on the east side, no less than 65 poles from the stream, and 84 poles more than a mile from the designated objects. The

361 *verdict of the jury which tried the caveat in 1799, could not conclude any point in the present controversy, for only part of the parties here were parties to that caveat, and the record was so imperfect, that it was impossible to say, whether or no, the judgment of the court was given upon the merits. Neither could that verdict be regarded even as evidence, either that Morris and Harman's survey of 2000 acres did not conform with their entry, or that the survey of 4000 acres of Morris and his associates had no entry to support it, or that Lewis's survey conformed with his entry. For the record of the caveat was not exhibited as evidence touching those facts, or any facts in controversy in this case; it was only exhibited with the supplemental bill, as shewing an excuse for the neglect of Lewis or Billips to proceed by way of caveat, to prevent Morris and others from taking out their patents. And, as to the certainty and precision of Lewis's entry, the verdict on the caveat found nothing; and this was a main point in the present controversy.

Leigh said, that if the certainty and precision of location, required by the land law, were to be taken in the strict sense of those words, very few locations had ever been, or in the nature of things could be, made specially and precisely enough. To minds not versed in the subject, most of the locations which had stood the test of examination, had an air of vagueness. The requisition of the law had always been understood according to the subject matter. Certainty and precision of location, according to the general understanding of locators, was all that was requisite: they know, better than we possibly could, whether an entry be special and precise, as well as whether a survey conform with or depart from the entry. It was enough, if Lewis's entry was special and precise, and if his survey conformed with it with sufficient exactness, in the understanding of surveyors and other persons residing in this new country, and versed in such subjects. A jury of the country, trying the points in dispute shortly after they arose, had found, that the surveys of Morris and his associates, were not founded on *their entries, and that Lewis's survey did conform with his entry. It could not be at all material, for what purpose the record of the caveat was originally exhibited. It was now a document in the cause. And, surely, it was evidence, that, when a locator establishes his beginning point on the waters of a stream, and calls to go down for quantity, the acceptance of the phrase is, that he is to go down the stream for quantity, not from it, in quite another direction, down the general course of the country; evidence also, as to the degree of certainty in a location sufficient, in general, to enable other locators to locate the adjacent land, and of the reasonable exactness with which a survey should conform with an entry.

III. Johnson said, that the case was not properly relievable in equity, because Lewis or Billips might, if he had right, have had remedy by caveat; nor did the caveat prosecuted by Morris and Harman against Lewis, furnish any reason why Lewis or Billips should not have resorted to a caveat against them.

Leigh adverted to the fact, that, after judgment given for Lewis against Morris and Harman, in September 1799, that Lewis was, and that Morris and Harman were not, entitled to a patent for the land comprised in Lewis's survey, and while Lewis had every reason to believe, that that controversy was carried to the district court by appeal, Morris and his associates had come to the land office, and taken out their patents. They had, at the time, actual notice of Lewis's prior equity. And thus, he said, these patents were obtained by surprise and fraud upon Lewis, such as gave ample ground for the jurisdiction of the chancellor.

In the argument, the former adjudications of this court, concerning this much litigated point, were cited; particularly, Noland v. Cromwell, 4 Munf. 155; M'Clung v. Hughes, 5 Rand. 453; Jackson v. M'Gavock, Id. 509.

CARR, J. I shall first consider the question, whether the appellee, having no good excuse for failing to caveat the appellants, *is precluded, by the decisions of this court, from looking behind their patent? The appellee in his supplemental bill, has assigned, in excuse for this failure, that the appellants, having entered a caveat against Lewis, took out their patents while it was pending. Our caveat law says, "if any person shall obtain a survey of land, to which another hath by law a better right, the person having such better right, may enter a caveat, to prevent his obtaining a grant, until the title can be determined, such caveat expressing the nature of the right on which the plaintiff claims the land." 1 Rev. Code, ch. 86, § 38, p. 330. In Johnson v. Brown, 3 Call 267, this court said, "It was foreseen by the legislature, that there would be interfering entries and surveys; and the caveat was the remedy for settling all those disputes prior to the patent, to avoid the inconvenience of that solemn instrument being involved in contests of that kind." Here, we see the nature and object of the caveat. In the case before us, Morris and Harman caveated Lewis, because "they claimed the land by prior entry and survey." This brought directly before the caveat court, the title of the caveator; and the judgment upon that caveat, was for the defendant. It was said, indeed, that it did not appear that this was a trial upon the merits, and if not, the judgment did not bind the rights of the parties: but the jury found, that the 2000 acre survey did not follow the entry; that the 400 acre survey was on land for which there was no entry; and that Lewis's survey was conformable with his entry. And, on this finding, the judgment is given; which, to my mind, is most clearly upon the merits. The caveators appealed, and thereby prevented the caveatee from getting his patent; and pending this appeal, took out their patents, and then abandoned their caveat. I consider this proceeding a fraud; and a fraud too of that sort, that furnished a good excuse to Lewis, for not proceeding to caveat the caveators. For, after a decision against their right, and an appeal indicating their intention to rest the contest on the caveat, Lewis had no rational ground to suspect the application for their patents. *He, then, or (which is the same thing) Billips claiming under him, comes into equity, sanctioned by Noland v. Cromwell, even upon my understanding of that case, as explained in M'Clung v. Hughes. And I consider this caveat such a notice to all, whose joint rights as associates with Morris were involved, as affected them with fraud in proceeding to take patents. The case, then, is properly in equity. And, without saying, that the verdict and judgment on the caveat, is decisive of the rights of the parties, I will say that it is, with me, most persuasive evidence. The trial was by a jury of the country, every man of whom was probably familiar with entries, surveys and patents: they had the advantage, too, of hearing the witnesses examined and cross-examined by counsel well acquainted with these subjects; and thus could have every thing which may puzzle us, explained to them, by men who had been upon the land, had traced the lines, and were well acquainted with all the localities. From a decision like this, I should dissent with great diffidence.

But the examination I have given the entries, surveys and evidence, induces me strongly to believe, that the jury was right. The 2000 acre survey does not follow the calls of the entry. The beginning corner is proved to be on the waters of the Poplar Fork; and the call is, down for quantity. That stream runs a north-west course, and the first course of the survey is eastward, up and across the ridge, to get upon other waters of Big-Hurricane creek. Six witnesses (two or three of them, surveyors) state, that the survey is off the entry. The 4000 acre entry is dependent on this, calling for the vacant land on both sides of it; and the error in this, of course renders that wholly erroneous, and throws the surveys, as the jury said, on land for which there was no entry.

With respect to the entry and survey of Lewis, though they might have been more precise and certain, I incline to think they ought to be supported, under the decisions both of this and the federal court.

365 *I think however, that the chancellor erred in decreeing a conveyance of Lewis's title, before compensation shall be made to his devisees, for his services and expenses, in entering, surveying and patenting the land for Billips. The decree should have directed an account of these, and made the payment thereof, a condition precedent to the conveyance of the legal title by Lewis's devisees to Billips. This, however, being an interlocutory order, the omission will not affect the costs. The decree should be corrected in this particular, and affirmed in all other respects.

GREEN, J. The questions are, whether Billips, the cestui que trust of Lewis, has a better right to the land in controversy than Morris and his associates? and whether he can assert that right in a court of equity?

Referring to M'Clung v. Hughes, for the outline of my opinions on questions of this sort, I consider that Morris and his associates taking out a patent for the land in controversy, after the decision in a regular proceeding, that they had no right to it as against Lewis, was such a fraud as might be corrected in a court of equity, upon its general principles; and that all his associates were affected by the notice of this better right than Morris's, although they might not have had such notice themselves. And, without deciding whether the proceedings in the caveat, were or were not binding upon the rights of the parties to this cause, I think, that, upon the evidence in this case, independently of the verdict and judgment on the caveat, the surveys of Morris and his associates did not conform to their entries; that Lewis's survey did conform to his, with sufficient certainty, inasmuch as it covered the main body of the land, which it would have covered if it had been surveyed in the strictest conformity to the entry; and that no more latitude has been taken by him, in this case, than might reasonably be allowed in general; especially, as he comes in competition with one, who was not misled by the trivial irregularity in his survey. The verdict of the jury on the caveat, and 366 *judgment of the court, which were more familiarly acquainted with subjects of that sort than I am, I confess, weigh strongly with me, to fortify this opinion.

The decree is, however, erroneous, in decreeing a conveyance of Lewis's title, until his representatives be indemnified by Billips, for his expenses in procuring the title to the land, with such a compensation for his services in that respect, as may be found reasonable. With this correction, the decree is right.

COALTER, J., said, he concurred in the opinion of judge Green.

CABELL, J., said, generally, that he concurred in the proposed correction of the decree, and in the affirmance of it in all other respects.

BROOKE, P. I concur in the affirmance of the decree, with the correction proposed.

I do not think the judgment in the caveat case, can be relied on as an estoppel by the plaintiffs. A court of equity will not set aside a judgment for fraud, unless the party asking it to do so, will do complete justice: nor will it enforce a judgment, unless the party seeking relief, will submit himself to the justice of the court. But this is not material in this case, because the findings of the jury, on which the judgment on the caveat was rendered, are, I think, convincing evidence, that the judgment was right. The excuse assigned for the failure to file a cross caveat by the caveatee (if one was necessary) is, I think, sufficient, under the correct understanding of the decision in Noland v. Cromwell, without extending the construction so far, as to substitute the opinion of the minority for the opinion of the majority of the court; which, I think, is the effect of the decision of M'Clung v. Hughes. I deem the excuse, here, sufficient; for, though no fraud may have been intended by the caveator, in taking 367 out his patent pending the *appeal from the judgment against him on his caveat, especially, as the patent included other lands than those in controversy; yet it was a surprise on the caveatee, who could not have expected, that the caveator would take out his patent, pending the appeal, and before the controversy respecting a portion of the land included in it, was terminated.

The decree was corrected in the particular mentioned by the judges, and affirmed in all other respects, with costs to the appellees, as the party substantially prevailing.

368 *Jiggetts and Wife v. Davis.

(Absent BROOKE, P.)

Wills—Construction—Dying without Issue—Case at Bar.—Testator having realty of his own inheritance, and personally part acquired in his own right and part in right of his wife, devises all his worldly estate, in manner following: All the profits of my estate, after providing genteel support for my wife and daughter, to be applied to my debts; and, after debts paid, I wish my estate kept together for mutual benefit of my W' and D', till my D' attain full age or marry, or my W' wish a division or marry. After which, I wish my estate divided in the following manner: I leave my W' one half the land I live on, and one half of my estate, during her life. If my W' die without any more issue, the whole of my estate to revert to my D'; and if my D' die without issue, the whole of my estate to revert to my W'; and if they both die without issue, then that part of my estate which came by my W', to revert to her brothers and sisters that may be then living, and the balance of my estate to revert to my brother J. or to his heirs, if any, if none to be equally divided between my two half brothers. If my W' marry and again have issue, I wish her to have the disposal of the whole of the property that came by her. Held,

1. Same—Same.—The daughter took by the devise, the moiety of the land that was not devised to the wife.
2. Same—Same—Dying without Issue—Estate Tail—Effect of Statute.—The daughter took an implied estate tail in the moiety of the land devised to her; and the wife took an implied estate tail in the moiety devised to her expressly for life: each of which estates was converted into a fee-simple, by force of the statute abolishing estates tail: consequently.
3. Same—Same—Same—Same—Same.—The executory limitations were contingent remainders, and barred by the statute.

William Swepson Davis, late of Mecklenburg county, died in the year 1813, having duly made and published his last will and testament, all the disposing part of which was in the following words:

"And as touching such worldly estate, as it has pleased Almighty God to bless me with, I do leave it in manner and form following, viz. Item, my will and desire is, that all the money that can be raised from the profits of my estate, after supporting my wife Susanna and daughter Lucy in a genteel manner, be applied to the payment of my just debts: And after all my debts are paid, I wish my estate kept together, for the mutual benefit of my wife and daughter, until my daughter arrives to lawful age or marries, or until *my wife wishes a division or marries; after which, I wish my estate divided, in the following manner: Item, in case my wife should marry or wish a division, or my daughter arrive to lawful age or marries, then I leave my wife one half of the tract of land on which I live, including the buildings, also one half of my estate, during her natural life: In case my wife should die without any more issue, my will and desire is, that the whole of my estate to revert to my daughter Lucy; and should my daughter Lucy die without issue, for the whole of my estate to revert to my wife Susanna: and, in case they should both die without issue, then for that part which came by my wife Susanna, to revert back to her brothers and sisters that may be then living, and for the balance of my estate to revert to my brother John Davis, or to his heirs, if any; if none, to be equally divided between my two half brothers. Item, in case my wife should marry and again have issue, I wish her to have the disposal of the whole of the property that have come by her." And the testator appointed his brother John Davis his executor.

In July 1823, John Davis exhibited his bill in the superior court of chancery of Richmond, against Davis Jiggetts and Susanna his wife, setting forth the will; and, that the testator's daughter Lucy, who was his only child, survived him, but died not very long after him, an infant, intestate and childless: that, after the daughter Lucy's death, the testator's widow Susanna intermarried with Jiggetts, by whom, at the time of filing the bill, she had several children: that, after the testator's death, his two half brothers also died, infants, intestate and childless: that John Davis is the sole heir of the testator's daughter Lucy, and of his two half brothers: that the testator's debts were trivial, and had long since been discharged: and that the land on which the testator lived, a valuable tract in Mecklenburg, had been ever since his death held by his widow, and was still in the possession of Jiggetts and wife, who claimed title to the whole property, real and personal. And the bill claimed, that in the events, that had actually occurred, 370 the testator's *widow was entitled, under his will, to a life estate only in a moiety of his real estate; that the testator's daughter Lucy took under the will, a fee tail, converted by the statute docking entails into a fee simple, or if not, that she took a fee simple by descent from her father, in the other moiety, and in the remainder or reversion in fee, expectant on the life estate of her mother in the moiety devised to her; and that, consequently, as this estate was derived by the daughter Lucy from her father, and as John Davis was her paternal uncle, and her sole heir ex parte paterna, as well as sole heir of her deceased uncles of the half blood, he was now entitled, by the law of descents, to one moiety of the testa-

Wills—Dying without Issue—Estates Tail—Effect of Statute.—In Callis v. Kemp, 11 Gratt. 86, it is said: "That the power of disposing to such of his issue as he should think fit would not operate to restrict the general words, is shown by the case of Ball v. Payne, 6 Rand. 73, where a similar power of disposing amongst or to either of the heirs of the body, was contained in the devise; but the tenant for life was held to take an estate tail which by our statute was converted into an estate in fee simple. Upon the whole, it seems to me that according to the cases of Bells v. Gillespie, 5 Rand. 273; Broadbush v. Turner, 5 Rand. 308; Jiggetts v. Davis, 1 Leigh 368, and the cases there referred to, the son in this case took an estate tail by implication, which by the statute was enlarged into a fee." To the same effect the principal case is also cited in foot-note to Callis v. Kemp: foot-note to Carter v. Tyler, 1 Call 165; Bramble v. Billups, 4 Leigh 97, 98; Thomason v. Andersons, 4 Leigh 124; See v. Craigen, 8 Leigh 452; Tinsley v. Jones, 13 Gratt. 208. See a discussion in 4 Va. Law Reg. citing the principal case at pages 650, 652, 655, 656, 809; 5 Va. Law Reg. 85. See monographic note on "Wills."

Same—Personal Property—Limitation Over.—The principal case is cited in foot-note to Horde v. McRoberts, 1 Call 337; Callava v. Pope, 3 Leigh 106; Hinton v. Milburn, 23 W. Va. 171.

tor's real estate in fee simple, presently, and to the remainder or reversion in fee, expectant on Mrs. Jiggetts's life estate in the other moiety. Therefore, the bill prayed partition of the land between John Davis and Mrs. Jiggetts; that 'the court might settle and declare his title to the remainder or reversion in fee, expectant on Mrs. Jiggetts's life estate, in the moiety which should be assigned to her; that an account might be taken of the profits &c.

Jiggetts and wife, in their answer, admitted all the allegations in the bill, except that they alleged, that the testator's debts, so far from being trivial, exhausted his whole personal estate, including what he acquired by his wife: and they insisted, that under the will of the testator, and according to his declared intention when he made it, his widow, Mrs. Jiggetts was entitled to his whole estate, real and personal, on the death of his daughter Lucy without issue.

In January 1827, the chancellor pronounced an interlocutory decree, declaring, that the testator's widow took under his will a life estate only in the moiety of the land which included the buildings; that his daughter Lucy took by descent from her father, a fee simple absolute in the other moiety, and in the reversion expectant on the life estate of her mother in the moiety devised to her; and that John Davis was now entitled to this her inheritance, by descent from her; directing an equal 371 partition of the land, and that 'the moiety thereof including the buildings, should be assigned to Mrs. Jiggetts to hold for life, and the other moiety to Davis: and directing accounts of his administration of the estate of his testator, and of the profits of his moiety of the land.

Jiggetts and wife appealed to this court. Stanard and Johnson, for the appellants. The provisions of the will plainly evince, that the testator's wife and daughter were equal objects of his favor.

The first disposition touching the principal of the estate: "after all my debts are paid, I wish my estate kept together &c. until my daughter arrives to full age or marries, or until my wife wishes a division or marries; after which, I wish my estate divided in the following manner; in case &c. then, I leave my wife one half of the tract of land on which I live, including the buildings, also one half of my estate, during her natural life;" only gave a life estate in a moiety to the wife, nothing to the daughter. As to all of the estate, besides what was given to the wife, the testator was intestate, for the will is silent: nor was there any occasion to provide by the will, that that should go to the daughter, which, without any testamentary provision, would pass to her by descent and succession. The words in the preamble, "as touching such worldly estate as it has pleased God to bless me with, I leave it in manner and form following;" cannot be connected with the subsequent devise, so as to extend it, beyond its import, to the whole subject which the testator had to dispose of. General words of that kind, in the preamble of a will, may be coupled with subsequent devises of specified subjects, to supply the want of words of inheritance in the particular devises, and thus to give the devisees estates of inheritance, where they must take by devise or not take at all, and where the particular devises, taken alone, would give them only life estates. But the preamble cannot be resorted to, for the purpose of extending a subsequent devise to a subject not embraced by its 372 *words: it cannot be resorted to, merely to give the heir an estate by purchase, rather than by descent: it cannot have any influence in a case like this, where, without any devise of the subject in question, all of it will pass, by descent, in fee, to the very person, for whose sake the court is asked to have recourse to this principle of construction.

The daughter, then, took by descent all the estate not given to the wife by the will. This consideration will have a very material influence upon the construction and effect of the ulterior limitations, upon which the controversy turns. For, where an estate is first devised to one, and then limited over upon his dying without issue to another, all the authorities admit, that those words, in their natural sense and construction, would import a failure of issue at the death of the first taker; and the artificial construction, which prevails in the common cases of executory devises limited upon a dying without issue, and which holds those words to import a general indefinite failure of issue, has only been adopted, in order to give the first taker an estate tail, and thus to provide for his issue, according to the general intent of the testator. In this artificial construction of limitations of the kind, the words of the contingency upon which the estate is limited over, are considered in reference to the interest previously devised to the person, upon the failure of whose issue the executory limitation is made to depend: a technical meaning is imposed on the words dying without issue in the executory limitation, for the sake of the devisee of the preceding estate; to qualify, enlarge or reduce, his interest to an estate tail. The technical, is not the less contrary to the natural sense and acceptance of the words. And whenever the technical construction of the executory limitation, is not necessary in respect to any estate previously devised; where, as in our case, there is no previous devise of any estate in the subject, but the whole subject descends in fee simple to the heir, until the happening of the event on which the estate is limited to the executory devisee; the technical yields to 373 the natural construction *and common sense of the devise. Gardner v. Sheldon, Vaugh. 259. And see an opinion of Mr. Fearne, Butler's edi. of Fearne, app. iv. at least, the peculiar circumstance in this case, of the estate descending in fee to the daughter, to be held by her in fee until the event of her dying without issue, upon which the estate is limited over to the wife, should have the effect of making the common technical construction of those words, yield more readily to any expressions in the will, indicating that the testator used them in their common accep-tation, and had in his mind a failure of issue of his daughter living at her death. And if this be ascertained to have been his meaning, the executory devise to the wife, of that part of the estate which the testator did not dispose of by his will, but left to descend to the daughter, was good in its creation, and in the event that has actually happened, took effect.

Now, there are expressions in this will, which, even if the daughter took by purchase under the will, all the subject not given to the wife for life, instead of taking it by descent, would suffice to shew, that the testator, in the limitation of that subject over to his wife, upon the failure of issue of his daughter, intended not an indefinite failure of her issue, but a failure of issue living at her death.

To understand the testator's meaning, the clauses of the will should be transposed, and read in this order: "(1) In case my wife should marry or wish a division, or my daughter arrives to lawful age or marries, then I leave my wife one half of the tract of land whereon I now live, including the buildings, also the one half of my estate, during her natural life. (2) In case my wife should marry and again have issue, I wish her to have the disposal of the whole of the property that has come by her. (3) In case my wife should die without any more issue, my will and desire is, that the whole of my estate revert to my daughter Lucy: (4) and should my daughter Lucy die without issue, for the whole of my estate to revert to my wife Susanna: (5) and in case they both should die without issue, for that *part which came by my wife, to revert to her brothers and sisters that may be then living, and for the balance of my estate to revert to my brother John Davis, or to his heirs if any, if none, to be equally divided among my two half brothers." It is obvious, the testator intended to give his wife, in all events, a moiety of his estate, for life; and, in addition to that provision, to give her, in case she should marry another husband, and again have issue, the property he had acquired by her: therefore, the proposed transposition of the clauses of the will is manifestly proper. And, reading the clauses of the will in this order, it is plain, that, when the testator said (in the second clause, as here placed) in case his wife should marry and again have issue, he wished her to have the disposal of the property that came by her, he intended her this additional bounty, if she should have issue of another marriage, at any time, whether such issue should die before her, or should be left by her at her death. It follows, that when the testator said (in the third clause) in case his wife should die without any more issue, the whole of his estate should revert to his daughter, he intended it should so revert, in case his wife should die without having had any more issue. And having thus ascertained that he meant by dying without issue, in his first use of that phrase, a dying without having had issue, we must take it that he meant the same thing, by the same expression, wherever it occurs: he meant, then, in the fourth clause, that, in case his daughter should die without having had issue, his whole estate should go to his wife; and, in the fifth clause, that in case both the wife and daughter should die without having had issue, the estate should go over as there provided. Let the limitation over to the wife, upon the dying of the daughter without issue, be understood in the sense in which this testator used the phrase; let it be understood, as if he had said in terms, what he plainly meant, "in case my daughter shall die without having had issue, I give the whole to my wife;" and then it cannot be doubted, that this executory devise to the wife was good in 375 *its creation, and has in the actual event taken effect. Weakley v. Rugg,

Again, the executory devise to the daughter, in case the wife should die without any more issue, or the executory devise to the wife in case the daughter should die without issue, was clearly intended to take effect before the ulterior devise over to the brothers and sisters of the wife, which is limited to them on the contingency of both the wife and daughter dying without issue. If this ulterior devise, limited upon the dying of both the wife and the daughter without issue, be good and valid, the preceding devises to the wife or the daughter, in the alternatives, upon the dying of the one or the other without issue, must also be good: if the contingency of a general indefinite failure of issue of both the wife and daughter, was not intended in the ulterior limitation, then neither was the indefinite failure of issue of the wife or of the daughter, intended in those that preceded it. Now, the ulterior limitation runs thus: "in case they (the wife and daughter) should both die without issue, then that part of my estate which came by my wife shall revert back to her brothers and sisters that may be then living &c." Here, obviously, the testator looked to a failure of issue of the wife and daughter, living some one or more of the wife's brothers and sisters; that is, not an indefinite failure of their issue, but a failure of issue within the compass of a life or lives in being. The question always, in cases of this kind, is, Whether the contingency intended by the donor, be a general indefinite failure of issue, or not? And if it be ascertained, that an indefinite failure of issue is not intended, the court has no alternative but to hold the failure of issue, really intended, to be a failure of issue of the first taker living at his death.

But, if these views be all wrong; if the daughter took the moiety which was not given to the wife, by purchase under the will, and not as heir by descent; if it can be held, that this moiety was devised to the daughter, and if she die without issue (generally), then over to the 376 wife; and that *such a devise gives the daughter an implied estate tail in her moiety: upon the same principle, the devise of the other moiety to the wife for life, and if she die without issue, then over to the daughter, gives the wife an implied estate tail also in her moiety. The executory limitations, in both cases, are contingent remainders, limited on estates tail previously devised; and those remainders are both alike, if either be, destroyed by the statute abolishing entails.

Leigh, for the appellees. The testator's wife and daughter were certainly the principal objects of his bounty, but not objects of equal bounty.

The daughter took by purchase, under the will, all the subject and all the estate therein, which was not included in the provision carved out for the wife. The testator having, in the beginning of his will, declared his design to dispose of all the worldly estate he possessed, the court will not intend a partial intestacy, unless it be unavoidable. He intended to dispose of the whole subject, as well as his whole interest in it. First, in devoting the profits of his estate to the payment of debts, he intended to devote the profits of the whole subject to that object. Next, in directing that, after his debts should be paid, his estate should be kept together for the mutual benefit of his wife and daughter, he intended that the whole subject should thus be kept together: and the division, which he intended should be made, when a change of situation of the wife or daughter should require a severance of their interests, was a division of the whole subject. The words are, "I wish my estate kept together, for the mutual benefit &c. until my daughter arrives to lawful age or marries, or until my wife wishes a division or marries; after which, I wish my estate divided in the following manner. In case &c. then, I leave my wife one half of the tract of land on which I live, including the buildings, also the one half of my estate, during her natural life." No express devise is made of the residue. But the estate was to be divided, between whom? surely, between the wife 377 *and daughter. How could it be, in this manner, divided between them, unless the daughter took in the division, what was not included in the subject that was to be assigned to the wife in the division?

The daughter, by inevitable intendment, took by the devise, all that was not given to the wife; the remainder expectant on the life estate of the wife in the moiety devised as a provision for her, and the other moiety in possession. And, supposing the daughter took by the devise, the question will be, upon the construction of the whole will, whether, in the executory limitation over to the wife of the estate devised to the daughter, in the event of the daughter dying without issue, the indefinite failure of the issue of the daughter, be indicated as the contingency on which the wife shall take, or the failure of the issue of the daughter living at her death? And the appellants must maintain, that the contingency of the death of the daughter without issue, is clearly restrained to a failure of issue living at her death; that the daughter took by the devise an estate in fee simple, determinable by the event; that the limitation over to the wife, is an executory devise of the first sort, according to Mr. Fearne's classification (Butler's ed. 399,) and an executory devise well limited, within the principle of that class of cases of which the leading one is Pells v. Brown, Cro. Jac.

590. But the legal import of the words of the contingency in question, taken alone, is the indefinite failure of the issue of the daughter; and if there be nothing to indicate another meaning, the daughter took by the devise, an estate tail, the limitation over to the wife was a contingent remainder, and the estate tail of the daughter was converted into a pure and absolute fee, and the contingent remainder to the wife cut off and destroyed, by the statute of Virginia abolishing entails. Carter v. Tyler, 1 Call, 165; Hill v. Burrow, 3 Call, 342; Tate v. Tally, Md. 354; Eldridge v. Fisher, 1 Hen. & Munf. 559; Sydnor v. Sydners, 2 Munf. 263; M'Clintic v. Manns, 4 Munf. 328; Tidball v. Lupton, 1 378 Rand. 194; Goodrich v. Harding, *3 Rand. 280; Bells v. Gillespie, 5 Rand. 273; Broadus v. Turner, Id. 308; Ball v. Payne, 6 Rand. 73.

Supposing, as is contended for the appellants, that this will presents the case of a partial intestacy; and that the daughter took the subject not included in the provision made for the wife, by descent in fee from her father, and not an implied estate tail, according to the case of Walter v. Drew, Com. Rep. 372, Butler's Fearné on Ex. Dev. 387, then, the limitation of the estate over to the wife, upon the dying of the daughter without issue, is an executory devise of Mr. Fearne's second class (Ibid. p. 400,) in which the deviser, without departing with the fee immediately (which descends to the heir), gives a future estate, to arise upon a contingency. The contingency, in this will, upon which the executory devise is limited to the wife, is the dying of the daughter without issue. And the rule is general, that wherever any executory devise is limited to take effect after a dying without heirs or without issue, subject to no other restriction, the limitation is void, being limited on too remote a contingency. Id. ch. 4, p. 444. So the question will be still, in effect, the same: does the contingency of the daughter dying without issue, upon which the estate is limited to the wife, import an indefinite failure of the issue of the daughter, or is it restrained to a failure of issue living at her death?

Let the clauses of this will be transposed as counsel or as the court please; there is not a single expression in the will, applicable to the real estate, and referrible to the contingency of the daughter dying without issue, which narrows or in any manner qualifies the legal construction, import and effect of those words. Grant, that it is reasonable to understand the same expressions, used in several limitations, in the same will, and in reference to the same subject, in one and the same sense: it can never be admissible, to give the same sense to different expressions, applied to different subjects, in the several limitations. If it be true, that, when the testator gave 379 his wife the property that came *by her, "in case she should marry and again have issue," he meant she should have this property, if she should have issue born of a second marriage, whether such issue should survive her or not; it does not follow, that when he said, "in case his wife should die without any more issue," the whole estate should revert to his daughter, he meant, in case she should die without having had more issue born; much less, that, when he said, yet more generally, "in case his daughter should die without issue," the whole estate should revert to the wife, he meant, in case the daughter should die without having had issue born. On the contrary, the difference in the expressions used in the several limitations, indicates different meanings.

If these limitations could be fairly understood, as if they had been written thus: "in case my wife should die without having any more issue, the whole estate shall revert to my daughter; and in case my daughter should die without having issue, the whole shall revert to my wife:" the cases of Tate v. Tally and Tidball v. Lupton (before cited) and Romilly v. James, 6 Taunt. 263, are decisive, that such language, used in a limitation of real estate, imports an indefinite failure of issue. Weakley v. Rugg was a case of personal estate: we all know the difference.

The argument drawn from the language of the ulterior limitation of that part of the estate that came by the wife, to her brothers and sisters that may be then living, is wholly untenable. For, (even admitting that language, applied by the testator only to the estate which came by his wife, can be so applied by the court as to affect the limitation of the land which did not come by her) the argument would be refuted by the authority of Carter v. Tyler and Broadbus v. Turner.

I have thus far considered the will in the point of view in which the counsel for the appellants have chosen to present it. My own understanding of it is intirely different from theirs. The testator had first given his wife, a moiety of his land and of all his other estate, for life; and, 380 intending, "in the sequel of his will, to give her the property that came by her, absolutely, in case she should marry and again have issue, and having this additional bounty to her in his mind, he said, "in case my wife should die without any more issue (meaning of another marriage), my will is, that the whole of my estate revert to my daughter." The phrase, the whole of my estate, was used here, in reference to the different parts of his estate, that which he held in his own right, and that which he acquired by his wife: and the design of the provision was, that the whole, that is, even that part, which came by his wife, and which he intended to give her absolutely, if she married and had issue by another husband, should, in case she should die without any more issue of another marriage, go to his daughter. Thus, this limitation only affects the part of the estate which came by his wife, not the land which was his own inheritance. In like manner, when he said, "in case my daughter die without issue, the whole of my estate shall revert to my wife," he had reference to those different parts of his estate, and intended that on the failure of issue of his daughter, the whole, that is, even that part of the estate which he had acquired in his own right, should go to his wife. Thus, this limitation affects only the estate which was of his own acquisition. In the ulterior limitation, the distinction existing in his mind, between the property acquired in his own right and that acquired in right of his wife, is plainly marked. The proposed transposition of the clauses of the will, renders this view of it yet more clear. The testator has obscured his meaning, by blending together and confounding limitations intended to affect the one, with limitations intended to affect the other, part of the subject: separate them, and then we shall have light and order. Then we shall see, that the interpolation of the words having had before the word issue, can only be proper in respect to the limitation of the property that came by the wife, and that the expressions in the ulterior limitation to the wife's brothers and sisters that may be then living, 381 can only affect the *limitation so far as it concerns the property acquired by her. Then we shall see, too, that the limitation over of the whole estate to the daughter, in case the wife should die without any more issue, does not at all affect the previous devise to the wife of an estate for life in a moiety of the land, which was the testator's own inheritance; that the next limitation over of the whole estate to the wife, in case the daughter should die without issue, does affect the previous devise to the daughter of one moiety of the land in possession, and of the remainder of the other moiety expectant on the life estate therein carved off as a provision for the wife; and that the last limitation is twofold, intended to give the property that came by the wife, in case she should die without more issue of another marriage, to her brothers and sisters then living, and the land to the testator's own family, in case his daughter should die without issue.

If this view of the case be correct, it not only refutes all the arguments adduced to support the claim of the wife, in the event that has happened of the daughter's death in infancy and without issue, to the whole of the land, by way of executory devise limited on the daughter's estate; but it serves to repel, conclusively, the claim last advanced for the wife; namely, that if the daughter should be held to have taken an implied estate tail in the moiety of the land previously devised to her, in general terms, the wife, upon the same principles, is entitled to an implied estate tail in the moiety previously devised to her for life, expressly.

But, apart from this consideration, the estate tail in a moiety, claimed for the wife, cannot be implied without violence to reason, and indeed to the express intent of the testator. He gave his wife a moiety of the land, as well as of his other estate, "during her natural life," only. If the court, connecting the subsequent limitation with the previous devise, shall adjudge to her an estate tail in that moiety by implication, it can only do so, upon the strange supposition, that the testator intended to devote one half of the land and one 382 half of all his estate of his own inheritance or acquisition, *to the purpose of making a provision for the issue of his wife by a future husband, and, with respect to that moiety, to postpone his own child and her issue to the issue of another marriage: for (the statute docking entails apart) the effect of entailing the moiety upon the wife and her issue by a future husband, would be, that, though the daughter should survive the wife and leave numerous issue, yet neither she nor her issue would ever take this moiety, till the wife's issue by a future husband should be extinct. Nay, to allow this claim of the wife, to an estate tail by implication in the moiety expressly devised to her for life, the court must further suppose, that the testator intended to make a better provision for his wife and her issue by a future husband, than for his own child and her issue; to entail on his daughter and her issue, one moiety of the estate he had acquired in his own right, and to entail the other moiety thereof on his wife and her issue by a future husband, and, in addition to that equal share of his own acquisitions, to give his wife, if she should marry and again have issue, all that he had acquired by her, in absolute property.

But, it is quite plain, that the testator never intended, in case his daughter should live to have issue, to make any other provision for his wife, out of his own acquisitions, than a life estate in a moiety of them, and that the only other bounty he intended her, was, to give her back the portion he had received by her, in the event of her marrying again and having issue of such future marriage. And to enlarge the wife's estate for life into an estate tail, would be contrary to the express words of the will, contrary to the plain intent, and contrary to every natural motive of bounty that can be attributed to the testator. Never, under like circumstances, was a life estate, devised in express terms, enlarged into an estate tail, by implication.

Johnson, who replied, questioned the propriety of those former adjudications of the court, wherein since the statute abolishing entails, an estate tail had been raised by implication, and then the statute applied to convert it into a fee, and to defeat the limitations in remainder.

383 *He said: None of the cases, from that of Hunter v. Haynes, 1 Wash. 71, to Broadbush v. Turner, 5 Rand. 308, furnish a precedent for implying an estate tail in the heir at law, where no express estate had been given him by the will, or for raising an express estate for life into an estate tail. All the precedents of implied estates tail, are cases in which estates of inheritance have been given. Of these there are so many, that the wise judicial maxim, stare decisis, ought perhaps to forbid us from departing from them: yet, so ill have these precedents been received, so much complained of, so universally believed to have defeated, in almost every case, the clear and lawful intent of the testator, such are the perplexing questions to which they give rise, and so clear the policy of the law of 1819, furnishing a just and simple rule of interpretation, directly the reverse of that which those precedents afford, that it may be equally wise to restrain them rigidly to the class of cases to which they belong.

In every case in which the court has implied an estate tail created since the act of 1776, it has interpreted the deed or will in the same manner as if it had been made before that act; and this, without reference to the change of law introduced by the act itself. It has inferred, that a testator intended to create an estate tail, when by law he could not create it, and when such an inference would defeat the limitations of his will, from the same circumstances that justified such inference, when it was lawful to create such an estate, and when the inference was necessary to sustain the limitations of the will.

That of 1776 enacted, that "any person, who now hath, or hereafter may have, any estate in fee-tail, general or special, in any lands or slaves, and whether such estate tail hath been or shall be created by deed, will, act of assembly, or by any other ways or means, shall from henceforth, or from the commencement of such estate tail, stand ipso facto seized, possessed or entitled, 384 of, in or to such lands or *slaves, in full and absolute fee simple, in like manner as if such deed, will &c. had conveyed the same to him in fee simple."

The single purpose of the act, was to abolish estates tail with all their incidents, and to unfetter them of those restraints upon alienation, peculiar to estates tail, by converting them into estates in fee simple. It was no wise intended to restrain the power of the donor or grantor, to limit the estate, by way of contingent remainder or executory devise, within those reasonable bounds which the law had prescribed, or to furnish any rule of interpretation whereby to ascertain what an estate tail was.

The english statute de donis, with the commentaries on it, is the guide in this inquiry; and ascertains, that an estate tail is an estate of inheritance, not descending to the heirs general, but limited to the heirs or issue of the body, in relation to which the donee's power of alienation is restrained by the will of the donor; and that no set form of words is necessary to create such an estate; that it may be created, by express words of limitation to the heirs of the body, or issue of the body, or by any other words necessarily implying that the issue of the body of the first taker, and they alone, are to inherit the estate from him. Whenever a question arises under the act of 1776, whether the donee hath an estate tail by implication, the true inquiry is, whether, taking the whole will together, and considering all circumstances, it be necessarily inferrible, that he intended to limit the inheritances to the issue of the donee.

The statute having given no new rule of interpretation, we must be governed by the rules the common law furnishes. There is no common law rule which authorises you to infer, that a testator meant to do what he had no right to do: on the contrary, as all men are presumed to know the law, so all are to be presumed to conform to it, till the contrary appears. No common law rule authorises you to infer, that the testator meant to defeat the express limitations of his own will: on the contrary, you 385 are bound, if possible, so to *interpret the whole will, as to give effect to every part of it; and out of this rule have arisen those forced constructions of doubtful phrases, upon which almost every implied estate tail rests in England; constructions, the offspring of the statute de donis; made to raise and to sustain lawful and favoured inheritances, not to create and destroy unlawful and forbidden estates; to effectuate, not to defeat, the intent of the testator. No common law rule of interpretation fixes upon the words dying without issue, dying without heirs lawfully begotten, or any other such words, any technical meaning, necessarily implying an estate tail: on the contrary, in England, such words are invariably interpreted according to their context, and imply an estate tail or not, according as such implication is calculated to effectuate, or to defeat, the obvious intent. Why should he give a technical meaning to these words, and such as these, when by the common law they have none? Why interpret the words of the testator so as to defeat his will, when by the common law we are taught so to interpret them as to sustain it? Why infer an intention to violate the law, when the common law teaches us to infer an intent to obey it? The warrant is not found in the act of 1776, and it will be in vain looked for in that of 1785.

The provisions upon this subject were reported by the committee of revisors, and are found embodied in the act for regulating conveyances, 12 Hen. stat. at large, p. 156, 7. This act very properly changed the phraseology, but was never regarded as altering the substance of the enactments of 1776.

The act of 1776, had embraced in the same common provisions, estates in lands and estates in slaves. estates created before and after its passage; and was, therefore, obnoxious to the verbal criticism, that estates tail, both in lands and slaves, might still be created, although such estates, in the moment of their execution, became estates in fee. The act of 1785 removes this ground of cavil; and distinguishes estates in land, from estates in slaves, and estates 386 created *before, from those created after, the act. It declares, that "every estate in lands or slaves, which on the 7th October 1776, was an estate in fee tail, shall be deemed an estate in fee simple; and that every estate in lands, which since hath been limited, or hereafter shall be limited, so that as the law aforesaid was, such estate would have been an estate in fee tail, shall also be deemed an estate in fee simple:" and it discharges all such estates from the conditions annexed thereto, by the common law, restraining alienations before the donee shall have issue.

This act is a plain legislative declaration, that the function of the act of 1776, was to abolish entails; since it regards no estate created since as being entails, and makes no provision respecting subsequent limitations of slaves. With this understanding of the act of 1776, the legislature of 1785 meant to declare, that entails existing in 1776, should be from thenceforth regarded as estates in fee simple; and that estates of inheritance thereafter limited, to the issue of the body of the first taker, should also be held in fee simple; and, in as much, as all such estates and none other, according to the law as it was before October 1776, were estates tail, the legislature had reference to the law as it was before that time, as the standard of those subsequent limitations which should create a fee simple.

It is this reference to the law as it was aforesaid, that has been supposed to furnish a new rule of interpretation, and to warrant the construction I am controverting. But this cannot be; for it has been already shewn, that the only law known to us before the year 1776, instead of warranting any such construction, required one directly the reverse; and it would be most strange, if the reference to the law as it aforesaid was, should justify a new and unheard of rule of interpretation. The law as it aforesaid was, construed the same words, in one way, when applied to property which could not be entailed, and in another, when applied to that which could; and that, for the purpose, in each case, of effectuating the intent of the testator: the new rule maintains this diversity 387 *in the construction of the same words, though in each case they are applied to property which cannot be entailed; and this, for the purpose of defeating the intent of the testator. Thus, in limitations of personal property, which could not be entailed, the old law laid hold of the slightest circumstances, to restrain the generality of the testator's words, to save the limitation over, and to effectuate his intent; while, in limitations of real estate, which could be entailed, they disregarded the same circumstances, raised an estate tail by implication, and thus effectuated the testator's intent, without endangering the limitation over. The new rule follows the spirit of the old, in interpreting limitations of personal property, which cannot be entailed, but utterly abandons its spirit and perverts its purpose, when, in limitations of real estate which now also cannot be entailed, it disregards those circumstances, and raises estates tail by implication, not to effectuate but to defeat the intent of the testator, and destroy the limitation over.

The same act of 1785, which refers us to the law as it aforesaid was, for the interpretation of limitations in tail, makes a radical change in one rule of interpretation, which often bears directly on these questions of entail. In judging whether an entail is created or no, it is often of importance to ascertain, whether the estate limited over, be an estate of inheritance or a life estate. By the common law, an estate given without words of inheritance, is a mere life estate: by the act of 1785, an estate so given, is an estate of inheritance. By the common law rules of interpretation, if an estate be given by will, to A. and his heirs, but if he die without issue, remainder to B. and his heirs. A. takes an estate tail by implication, and B. a remainder in fee dependent thereon. But if the limitation over had been to B. without words of inheritance, A. would have taken a conditional fee, and B. a contingent remainder for life. Suppose, since the act of 1785, the same limitation in Virginia, to A. and his heirs, and if he die without issue remainder to B. without words of inheritance: if 388 you construe *this limitation without reference to the provision of the act of 1785, which would give B. an inheritance, A.'s estate would be a fee conditional, and B.'s a contingent remainder but if you construe it with reference to this provision of the act of 1785, A.'s estate is an implied entail, and B.'s remainder defeated. Does the reference to the law as it aforesaid was, preclude all consideration of this change introduced by the act of 1785? This question was presented to this court, in Goodrich v. Harding, and in Bells v. Gillespie, cited by Mr. Leigh. One judge retreated from its difficulties in dismay; others have grappled with it; but the labour which it costs them, and the varying conclusions they have come to, only serve to shew how the natural strength of their minds has been subdued by the chains in which former adjudications have bound them. In truth, no question would have been more simple, if it had been res integra. No one could have doubted for a moment, that in ascertaining the intent of the testator, you must interpret his language, with reference to the law which explains it, if it had not been for the interpretation, which had already been put upon the reference to the law as it aforesaid was. And if you would refer to one part of the law of 1785, as explanatory of the testator's intent, why not consider the whole of it?

If we are at liberty to interpret the testator's intent with preference to laws passed since the year 1776, the statute of descents would be entitled to great weight. It might be quite reasonable to imply an intention to limit an estate, which should descend in a single line of succession from father to son forever; but it would require irresistible circumstances to justify an inference, that a man in his senses, meant to limit an estate to descend forever, from generation to generation, to and among all the descendants of his donee, male and female, when, in all probability, before the fifth generation, the inheritance would be sub-divided into as many parcels, as it contained acres.

I submit these views in the hope, that as the will now under consideration, is not directly within the precedents 389 *relied on for the appellee, the court will feel itself at liberty to interpret it by the well known rules of the common law, and common sense, and will find in it nothing to justify the implied estate tail, which is insisted on, and nothing to disappoint the remainders over.

CARR, J. This case turns wholly upon the construction of the will of W. S. Davis, who died in 1813. It brings again before the court, in a form a little varied, the question so often debated, so often decided, here: Whether a devise to A. and his heirs, or to A. for life, or to A. without words of inheritance, and if A. die without issue, to B. C. and D. or such of them as may then be living, gives an estate tail to the first taker? And if this were the only question in the case, I should content myself with referring to my former views on the subject in the cases reported, and repeating my steady determination stare decisis. But there is another question which renders it necessary to go farther into the case.

It is evident that the will in question, drawn probably by the testator himself, is the production of a man ignorant of legal forms, and unused to express his ideas in writing. It is clumsily and obscurely written. That men should differ in the construction of such a will, is by no means wonderful. I will briefly offer my conjecture as to the testator's meaning.

I admit, that it is allowable to transpose the different clauses of a will, where that is clearly seen to be necessary to give distinctness and perspicuity to the ideas of a testator; but it is only in such cases, and then with much caution, that the practice should be indulged. Generally, I think, we are much more apt to attain to the meaning of a writer, by pursuing the order and current in which his thoughts flowed, than by reversing or deranging it. In the present case, it seems to me, that transposition would tend rather to confuse than explain, and is therefore improper.

In the first place, I will dispose of that clause, which in case of the wife's marrying and again having issue, gives 390 her *the disposal of all the property that came by her. This was personal property, none of which is the subject of contest between the parties; and the only remark which seems necessary, is, that I do not consider this clause as having the slightest influence on the meaning of any other clause in the will.

I believe, the testator intended to divide his estate equally between his wife and child: they were naturally nearest and dearest to him; all the provisions of the will look first to them; and it is evident, that he did not mean to extend his bounty to any other objects, so long as they, or the descendants of either of them, were in existence.

It was strongly contended, that the will contains no words of devise to the daughter, except of a remainder after the devise to the wife; and that, in the other half of the estate, the daughter took a fee by descent as heir of her father: and this was urged, as having an important influence on the construction of the words of the contingent limitation, "should my daughter Lucy die without issue." I cannot assent to the position, that Lucy took by descent. The heir, I know, will take by descent whatever is undevise by the will: and even where there is a devise to him of the same estate which he would take as heir, he is said to be in by descent: for Hobart says (Counden v. Clarke, Hob. 30,) "this is a positive rule, that a man cannot raise a fee simple to his own right heirs, by the name of heirs, as a purchase, neither by conveyance of land, nor by use, nor by devise:" "but the devise is void, and it works by descent:" But the same case and others lay it down, "that where another estate is created by the will, than would descend to the heir, or the quality of the estate is altered by the devise, then the will shall prevail though the devisee be heir at law." I consider it settled law, that in a will the estate may be given by implication, even to the disinheriting of the heir, if such implication be necessary to effect the clear intent of the testator. This is laid down very strongly, in Gardner v. Sheldon, Vaughan's Rep. 259, and Robinson v. Robinson, 391 *1 Burr. 38, and, in 1 Bridg. Ind. 545, under head of Devise by implication, many cases to this point are stated. Every man has the option, either to make a will for himself, or to leave his property to be disposed of by the laws of the land. If, however, he undertake to make a will, it is always presumed, that he means to dispose of his whole estate, and not to die intestate as to any part of it; and, in the case before us, this conclusion is rendered clear by the words of the testator, "as touching such worldly estate as it has pleased God to bless me with, I do leave it in manner and form following;" not a part of it, but the whole.

Let us now look more closely at the will. The testator says, "My will is, that all the money that can be raised from the profits of my estate, after supporting my wife S. and my daughter L. in a genteel manner, be applied to the payment of my just debts; and after all my debts are paid, I wish my estate kept together for the mutual benefit of my wife and daughter, until my daughter arrives to full age or marries, or until my wife wishes a division or marries; after which, I wish my estate divided in the following manner: I leave my wife one half of the tract of land whereon I now live, including the buildings, also one half of my estate, during her natural life." Here we see the wife and daughter coupled together in all things, and forming the sole objects of the testator's bounty: they are to be genteelly supported: the estate is to be kept together for their mutual benefit, till the daughter comes of age or marries, or the wife wishes a division or marries. Why is the arrival at age or marriage of the daughter, marked as epochs at which a division should take place? because either of these events would make it necessary, that the daughter should have her portion in severalty: no other reason can be given. The estate was to be held for the mutual benefit of mother and daughter, until the daughter married or came to age, or the mother married, or wished a division, and then to be divided: between whom? The division, ex necessitate, supposes persons between whom it is to be made: who could they be 392 *here, but the wife and child? Is not this implication irresistible? The division is to be into two equal parts: if nothing more had been said, if there had been no other disposition of the estate, except limiting remainders after the death of the wife and child without issue; could we hesitate a moment to say, that they took the estate between them, subject to the effect of the limitations over? But the will goes on: "I leave my wife one half the tract of land I live on &c. and half my estate &c." What becomes of the other half? I answer, by strong and inevitable implication, it is given to the daughter; if not, we must say the father died intestate as to it. Neither does it weaken the force of this implication, that the daughter would have taken as heir. The testator took the disposition of his estate into his own hands, and meant to leave nothing to the law, but to dispose of the whole himself. The half of the estate being previously given to the wife during her natural life, the testator adds, "in case my wife should die without any more issue, my will and desire is that the whole of my estate revert to my daughter Lucy." Now, he had given his wife but half, and it is most evident, that this limitation was meant to operate upon that half only; yet he says, if his wife die without more issue, the whole shall pass to Lucy. How can we make sense of this, but on the ground, that the testator, supposing the one half already in Lucy, considered that the half given to his wife, when it should pass to Lucy, would vest the whole in her. The will proceeds, "and should my daughter Lucy die without issue, for the whole of my estate to revert, to my wife Susanna; and in case they both die without issue, then &c." I consider this a clear estate tail in Lucy. The case of Walter v. Drew, seems to me stronger than this. Richard Weeks, having two sons, William his elder and Richard his younger, devised as follows: "It is my will, that if William Weeks, my son, shall happen to die and leave no issue of his body lawfully begotten, that then, in that case and not otherwise, after the death of the said William, my son, I give and 393 bequeath all my lands *of inheritance in L. unto the said Richard, my son, to have and to hold the same, after the death of the said William, to him and his heirs." This case was much canvassed before baron Price, and many authorities cited, among others, Gardner v. Sheldon. The question was, whether the heir at law took an estate tail by implication, and Richard a remainder, or whether the heir took a fee by descent, and Richard by way of executory devise? After time for consideration, the judge gave his opinion, "that William took an estate tail by this will; for the words shall not be construed to give an estate by way of executory devise, but where the devisee cannot take any other way; but here William took by the will, for it is a necessary implication, that he shall have it to him and the heirs of his body; for the heir shall take by the will, though he is not expressly named, or there be no devise to him by express words."

I am of opinion, then, that Lucy took by devise, and that the estate taken was a fee tail, the limitation over being on her death without issue. And I have no doubt, that though Lucy had taken by descent, the result would have been the same: this is a point, however, which I have not well examined. The view taken of it by my brother Green, seems clear and sound; and to that I refer, as also particularly, to his strong and satisfactory remarks and authorities, in support of the law, so often sanctioned by this court, under which the devise to Lucy has been held to be an estate tail. But there is one point in this cause, in which I must differ from him: I mean as to the estate which the mother took in the land devised to her.

I think that she also took an estate tail, enlarged into a fee by the statute abolishing entails. I cannot agree to the reading which connects the last clause in the will with the devise of the land to the wife, and makes the words "if she should die without any more issue," refer exclusively to the personal estate that came by her, so as to prevent their enlarging the express estate for life given her in the land, into an estate tail.

I do not believe the testator ever 394 dreamed *of such connection. It is clear to me, that he held his wife and child in equal scales, and meant to divide his estate between them. The whole face of the will convinces me of this. Immediately after the devise to her of his land and half of his estate, and indeed forming a part of that devise, follows, the limitation, "if she die without more issue, then to my daughter:" shewing that it was not till failure of that issue, that the daughter would take, and that until such failure, that issue would itself take: this constitutes an estate tail. Observe the exact equality in these devises, between the wife and daughter: if my wife die without more issue, then the whole of my estate to my daughter; if my daughter die without issue, then the whole to my wife; and if they both die without issue then over. I cannot make a distinction between these devises, and say that the mother took but an estate for life, and the daughter a fee tail enlarged into a fee. I think the same words, and the same reasoning, and the same settled law, carry an estate tail to both, in the half given to them; and consequently, that the appellants are entitled to that portion given to the wife, her estate in it being enlarged into a fee.

GREEN, J. The appellants' counsel was right in saying, that the construction should be made upon the whole of the will in question, and all the provisions made in favour of the testator's wife brought together. And then the will, with all its provisions taken in their natural order, would read thus: "I leave my wife one half of the tract of land whereon I now live including the buildings, also one half of my estate, during her natural life: In case my wife should marry and again have issue, I wish her to have the disposal of the whole of the property that came by her: In case my wife should die without any more issue, my will and desire is, that my whole estate to revert to my daughter L.: And should my daughter L. die without issue, for the whole of my estate to revert to my wife S.: And in case they both should die without issue, 395 then for that part that came by *my wife S. to revert back to her brothers and sisters that may be then living, and for the balance of my estate to revert to my brother J. D. and his heirs, if any, if none to be equally divided between my two half brothers." I think too with him, that the devise to the wife of all the property which came by her, in case she should marry and again have issue, taken by itself, would have the effect of giving her an absolute estate in that property, if she should marry and again have issue, even if that issue died in her life-time, the hour after its birth; and this upon the plainly expressed intention of the testator. But I do not think, that the inference he insists on is just; namely, that the testator, having given her that property upon that condition, did not intend that it should go over to his daughter, unless that condition failed, and that the daughter and wife being equal objects of his bounty, (as is inferred from the provisions of the will) neither did he intend, that the property given to or devolving on the former, should, if she had any issue, go over to the latter, or that any of the property should go over to his and his wife's relations, if his daughter had any issue, or his wife any more issue, at any time; and that, therefore, the words "having had" should be interpolated before the word issue, wherever it occurs. In every instance, in which the expression "die without issue" occurs, it is used indefinitely: and the words "without any more issue" applied to the wife, have the same effect as "die without issue" applied to the daughter; "any more" referring to the future issue of the wife, since she could not die without issue generally, as long as the daughter or any of her issue existed. Accordingly, those words are dropped in the ultimate limitation, where that discrimination was neither necessary nor proper, as the event upon which that was to take effect, was the death of both without issue.

This then presents no more than the common case, of a devise in fee or for life, or without the designation of any estate, with a limitation over upon the failure of the issue of the first taker. Whether, in 396 this case, that was to be, after *an indefinite failure of issue, or otherwise, is a different question, depending upon other provisions of the will, to be hereafter examined: these are the conditional limitation over to the brothers and sisters of the wife living at the death of the survivor of the wife and daughter, and to the half brothers of the testator, without words of perpetuity.

Whatever may be the effect of these provisions, it is clear, from the limitation over to the wife upon the death of the daughter without issue, and to the daughter upon the death of the wife without any more issue, that the testator intended, that the daughter should take such an estate in the property given her by the will, or devolving upon her by law, and the wife such an estate in a part or the whole of the property given to her, for life in the first instance, or in absolute property upon a condition, as would be transmissible to their respective issues. And there is nothing in those ultimate provisions of the bill, before alluded to, which can possibly controul this intention, and reduce the daughter's interest to a life estate only, or the wife's in that part of the property, which was intended to be transmissible to her issue other than Lucy. These transmissible interests were, of necessity, estates in fee simple or estates tail, as the law was before the 7th October 1776.

As to the property, which came by the wife, and which was given to her upon a condition which has been performed, that being personal, it is unnecessary to make any further inquiry, as a devise which will give a fee tail in real, gives an absolute property in personal, estate. The only question is, whether the life estate given to her in a moiety of the testator's land, and the residue of his personal property, was enlarged into an estate tail by the limitation over upon her dying without any more issue. And that depends upon the question, whether that limitation related to the property so given to her for life, in which case it might have that effect, or only to the property which she had a contingent right to take absolutely?

397 *Much of the difficulty in the construction of this will, arises from the circumstance, that the testator, having in his mind two classes of his property, that which came by his wife and that which was of his own acquisition, and intending to dispose of these alike in some events, and differently in others, has confounded them together, and in terms made the same dispositions as to both. But, in respect to this subject also, by reading the will altogether, and giving effect to all its provisions, without allowing one to contradict or controul another, unless it be unavoidable, we shall be enabled to solve the difficulties. With a view, then, to these two descriptions of property, the provisions of the will may be arranged and paraphrased thus: "I give to my wife, in all events, during her natural life, one half of my estate which came by her; and if she marry and again have issue, I wish her to have the disposal of the whole of it; and if she die without any more issue, the whole of it is to revert to my daughter; and if both my wife and daughter die without issue, it is to revert to my wife's brothers and sisters then living. I also give to my wife, during her natural life, half of the residue of my estate; and if my daughter die without issue, the whole of my estate, including that which came by my wife, is to revert to her, whether she marry and again have issue or not; and if both die without issue, that part of my estate which did not come by my wife, is to revert to my brother J. D. and his heirs, if any; if none, to my two half brothers." Thus, reddendo singula singulis, all the provisions of the will are rendered consistent. The expression die without any more issue finds a fit subject to operate upon, without any necessity to enlarge or affect the estate expressly given for life; which ought not to be done by any implication, unless it be such as is necessary. Indeed, a little more than one hundred years since, it was held, that no estate expressly given could be enlarged by any implication. Bamfield v. Popham, 1 P. Wms. 54, (1702); Idle v. Cook, Id. 78, (1705); Tomlinson v. Dighton, Id. 154, (1721);

398 Humberston v. Humberston, *Id. 333, (1716.) This, however, was soon exploded, as a general and inflexible rule, in Blackborn v. Edgley, Id. 605, (1719), although it was in that case, as it has ever since been admitted, that it only yielded to a necessary implication, and where the words die without issue, would otherwise have no operation. And, in that case, there was no such necessary implication. But, in Langley v. Baldwin, decided in 1707 (cited in the Attorney General v. Sutton, Id. 759), and in the last mentioned case, decided in 1737, the implication was thought necessary, because otherwise some of the issue of the person to whom the life estate was given in terms, might be excluded. And in Robinson v. Robinson, 1 Burr. 38, 2 Ves. 225, (1750, 1758), such a necessary implication arose from the same cause. There would be the like necessity here, if all that part of the estate of the testator given to his wife, had been given only for her life; in which case the expression, "dying without any more issue, then the whole of my estate to revert to my daughter," must have applied to all given to the wife for life, without discrimination, and the intention would have been thus manifested, that all so given to her should go to her issue other than Lucy, if she left any such. But, as there was a part given to her absolutely, upon the contingency of her having more issue, there is no such necessity; and the expression "the whole of my estate to revert to my daughter," applies, naturally and emphatically, to that part of the estate, and in respect to that only was there any occasion to provide for its returning to the daughter, upon the wife's dying without any more issue. The rest given only for her life, would have returned of course, without any such provision. This is, I think, the only true construction of that part of the will; and the wife's estate expressly given for life, was not enlarged into an estate tail, according to the law as it was before the 7th October 1776. That part of the estate devolved on the daughter, in the same way as did the residue of the estate not given to the wife in any form. And the question is,

It is perfectly clear, that if the testator had given that part of the estate to his daughter and her heirs, and if she died without issue, to his wife, and if his wife died without issue, then over; the daughter would have taken an estate tail, with remainder in tail to the wife. But, it was argued, that an estate in fee descending upon the daughter, and she taking nothing by the will, that estate cannot be restrained to a fee tail by implication; and the case of Gardner v. Sheldon, decided in 1671, was cited as establishing that proposition. There, the devise in effect was, "if my son George (the heir at law) and my daughters M. and C. die without issue, then all my lands shall remain to my nephew W. George entered, and died seised, leaving two daughters, his heirs; M. died; and C. brought ejectment against the daughters of the son. Vaughn, C. J., and two others held against Terryle, that neither the daughters nor the son took any thing by the will, but the estate descended upon the son in fee, upon the ground, that an heir could not be disinherited by any but a necessary implication. And to obviate the objection to that construction, that the testator manifestly intended that his nephew should succeed to the estate, upon the failure of the issue of the son and daughters, an intention which would be frustrated, unless the son and daughters were held to take estates tail under the will, because a fee could not be limited after a fee; they determined, that the limitation to the nephew after the indefinite failure of issue of the sons and daughters, was good as an executory devise; and cited for that, Pells v. Brown, and the cases there cited: a proposition which I cannot ascertain to have been ever asserted in Westminster hall, either before or since. This case, however, is not like that of a limitation over upon the failure of the issue of the heir only, as in the case before us; for construing that to give a fee tail to the heir by implication, does not disinherit him, as would have been the effect in Gardner v. Sheldon, if it had been held there that the daughters and the son had a joint estate tail, or a joint estate for their lives, with remainder in tail. And that case is entitled to the less weight, because the decision was founded, in part, upon a legal proposition unquestionably erroneous. Upon principle and reason, I can see no greater objection to reducing an estate in fee by descent to a fee tail by implication, than to do so in respect to an estate explicitly given: indeed, there would seem to be a greater difficulty in so doing in the latter case, against the expressed will of the testator, than in the former, where there is no such expressed intention. Accordingly, whenever the naked case under consideration has occurred, the estate in fee which would otherwise have descended to the heir, has been restrained to an estate tail, and he has been held to take under the will. Thus, in Newtons v. Barnardines, Mo. 127, (27 Eliz.) A. having three sons, T. R. and G. devised twenty nobles to the child of T. (he being dead, and his wife enstent) for twenty years; and if my son R. die before he hath any issue, so that my land descend to G. before he comes to twenty-one, my executors shall occupy it till he comes to that age, then &c." held that R. by implication of the will, had an estate in tail, as well by the words "if he die before he hath issue," as if it had been if he die without issue, they being tantamount.

Cozen's case, Owen, 29, (which seems to be the same as the foregoing); Devise, "if it shall please God to take my son R. before he hath issue of his body, so that my land descend to C. his brother, then &c." All the justices agreed, that this was plain to make an estate tail in R. by implication.

Counden v. Clarke, Hob. 29; Mo. 860, (10 Jac. 1); Devise, "Touching my land which of right will, and (my intent and meaning is) shall, descend and come to my son J. C. (his heir), after my decease, this is my devise;" and then the will appointed certain friends to take the profits, until his son attained the age of twenty-four, accounting therefor to him; and added, "Provided always, that if my son J. shall happen to decease without issue of his body lawfully begotten, that then I will, shall go unto my right heirs males, and posterity of me and my name forever, equally to be divided amongst them:" held, that "declaring that the land should descend to his son, is just the same that the law speaks; it is utterly void and idle; and then, the rest of the devise must proceed, as if that had not been spoken at all:" that the limitation to his right heirs &c. was void, or if not void, it was a devise to the son himself, who was right heir male: and that he took in tail by the will, and the reversion by descent.

Walter v. Drew, Com. 372, (1723.) A. having two sons, W. the eldest, and R., devised, that if W. should die without issue, R. should have all his lands in fee: held by baron Price, that W. took a fee tail under the will.

Goodright v. Goodridge, Willes, 369, (1742); Devise to testator's wife for life, "and my will is, that if my son R. do happen to die without heirs, then my son J. shall enjoy my lands:" held, an estate tail by implication to R. the eldest son, with remainder to J. the youngest, they being brothers of the whole blood, and therefore heirs meant issue.

In the case of Newton v. Barnardine, the question arose between the posthumous daughter of the eldest son and the testator's second son R. And the heir was disinherited by an implication arising from the limitation over upon the failure of the issue of R. probably strengthened (though it is not noticed in the report) by the pecuniary bequest to the expected child of the eldest son. And in Counden v. Clarke, the construction was made upon the intent of the testator (implied from the words, "decease without issue of his body") to provide for that issue, without deriving any aid from a necessity by that construction to give effect to the limitation over, since the son himself would have had the fee, whether the construction were one way or the other, and whether the limitation were valid or void. Indeed, it has been a settled rule for ages, that the effect of every limitation over, upon the indefinite failure of the issue of the first taker, whether he took by the will or deed, or by descent, *was to convert an estate which would otherwise have been a fee into a fee tail, and even although the limitation over was to the right heirs of the donor, and therefore void. Of this, the cases of Nottingham v. Jennings, (1700); 1 Ld. Raym. 568, and Lee v. Brace, (1696); Id. 101, and 3 Salk. 337, (the first in case of a devise, the last of a feoffment) are striking examples.

But, suppose it to be doubtful, whether the daughter's estate was in this case a fee tail or fee simple, or capable of being considered as one or the other, indifferently. Then the question would arise, whether it ought to be construed as a fee, and so the limitation over incapable of being barred or destroyed by any means? or as a fee tail, and the limitation over a remainder destroyed ipso facto by our statute, and capable of being destroyed, at the pleasure of the tenant in tail, by docking the estate tail, as the law was before the act of 1776? This question is answered by the rule laid down in Purefoy v. Rogers, (1671); 2 Saund. 330, as there fully established, and never since departed from, that "when a contingency is limited upon an estate of freehold, capable of supporting a remainder, it shall never be construed to be an executory devise, but a contingent remainder only." Such are the words in which the rule is laid down, in reference to the particular circumstances of that case: but its principle, and the reason on which it is founded, make it in truth much more general and comprehensive, and in effect this, that "no limitation shall be construed as an executory devise, if it may be construed to be a remainder," (as it was expressed by Lord Hardwicke in Wealthy v. Bosville, Rep. K. B. Temp. Hardw. 258; Butler's Fearne, 387, in which that rule was assigned as one of the reasons for restraining an express estate in fee to a fee tail, by force of the limitation over); or, that "no words shall be construed to give an estate by way of executory devise, but when the devisee cannot take any other way," (as laid down by baron Price, in Walter v. Drew, and assigned as one reason for holding, that an estate in fee descending was restrained to an estate tail, by the force of the limitation over).

403 *This rule was founded in the best reasons. Before the introduction of executory devises, (which are comparatively of modern date,) every limitation over was void, unless it could be construed to operate as a remainder, either vested or contingent. The court, therefore, in order to give effect to the intention of the donor, laboured to give such a construction, as would in that way make the limitation over valid: and this is one of the reasons given in some of the early cases, for reducing an express estate in fee to an estate tail by force of the subsequent limitation. And the only ground, on which executory devises were originally admitted, was "an indulgence to a man's last will and testament, when otherwise the words of the will would be void," and the devisee could not take any other way. Reeve v. Long, 4 Mod. 259. They were, however, admitted with great reluctance, since they established perpetuities to the extent within which they were allowed to be valid, as they were incapable of being defeated in any way, contrary to the former principles of the common law, according to which no future or contingent interests could be limited with effect, otherwise than in the form of remainders, which if depending upon a precedent estate tail, could be barred at the will of the tenant in tail, or if upon an estate for life and the remainder was contingent, by the destruction of the precedent estates by any means, as by forfeiture, merger, surrender, or the feoffment of the tenant for life, before the contingency happened. It was not, therefore, to be expected, that the courts should have abandoned the settled construction, by which limitations might take effect as remainders before the introduction of executory devises, for the purpose of allowing them afterwards to operate by way of executory devises.

This principle of construction, with all others touching the creation of estates tail, were left untouched and unaffected by our statute of 1776 docking entails, and are prescribed to the courts of justice for their guidance, by our subsequent legislation.

This is the literal effect of our statutes, and repeatedly *decided to be their true construction, and I think rightly. The purpose of the act of 1776 was to unfetter estates, upon principles of public policy. The means adopted for effecting this object, was, to do by the statute, in respect to all entails, then existing or afterwards to be made, that and no more than that, which every tenant in tail could do at his pleasure; dock the entail, and thereby bar all remainders and the reversion. It would have been wholly inconsistent with this purpose, to have introduced new fetters, by allowing limitations, before operating as remainders, and so liable to be barred by the act of the tenant in tail, to take the new form of executory devises, not capable of being barred in that way, and not barred by the statute; and to apply the same rule to all limitations of estates afterwards made, as was applied to those already existing, was perfectly consistent with and prescribed by the policy of the statute, that of unfettering estates, by destroying all contingent limitations afterwards made, which might have been destroyed by the tenant in possession, if that act had not been passed. The act of 1819, in respect to contingent limitations, in its very terms, declares a change of policy in this respect, and cannot be considered as declaratory of the former laws, or as influencing their construction.

But supposing the daughter's estate to have been a fee simple; then the question would still remain, whether the limitation over to the wife, upon the daughter's dying without issue, is good as an executory devise? and it is insisted, that the ultimate limitation over of the property, which came by the wife, in case of the death of the wife and daughter without issue, to the brothers and sisters of the wife then living, is good, and controuls all the other limitations, as well those between the wife and daughter, as that to the testator's brothers; that the limitation over to the testator's half brothers, without words of perpetuity, has the same effect; and that the testator did not intend, that if his daughter died without issue, his wife should take under that limitation, or that, if his wife

405 should die without any more issue,*his daughter should take under that limitation, or that, if his wife and daughter should both die without issue, his brothers should take under the limitation to them, unless, in each of those cases, some one or more of the wife's brothers and sisters was alive when the issue failed. This construction must be maintained, in order to make the limitation over to the wife good as an executory devise. For the rule on that subject requires, not only that the testator contemplated the possibility that the limitation over might take effect within the period allowed by law, but it must appear to be his will, that unless it takes effect within that period it shall not take effect at all. It is impossible to look at this will, and suppose that the testator intended, that the contingent interests given to others, should depend upon the circumstance, whether one or more of his wife's brothers or sisters was alive when the contingency happened, as they might all die in the life-time of the wife and daughter. And so the counsel of the defendant thought; for it is not alleged, that any of the brothers or sisters of the testator's wife, were living at the time of his daughter's death. But, even if that could be supposed, in respect to the property which came by the wife, it would not apply to that given ultimately to the testator's brothers: As to that the limitation over was clearly after an indefinite failure of issue: for they took estates in fee, not only by force of the preamble of the will, but of our act of assembly dispensing with words of perpetuity in the creation of estates in fee, the effect of which, in cases like this, I have already considered in another case. Bells v. Gillespie, 5 Rand. 286.

COALTER, J. It seems to me, that the intention of the testator was this: In the first place, until his daughter came of age, if neither she nor her mother married before that time (unless the mother before that de- sired a division), that the estate should be kept together for their mutual benefit: but that, so soon as the daughter came of age, or if before that time she married, or if 406 before that time the mother *married or wished a division, then the mother should have one half of the whole estate during her life. The consequence of such division would necessarily have been, that, as the estate was no longer kept together for mutual benefit, the other half would go to the daughter, immediately, in possession; and she would also be entitled, in fee, to the other moiety on the death of the mother. Had nothing more been said, and had they both lived unmarried until the daughter came of age, no division being called for by the mother, the estate must then have been divided, and the daughter (it seems to me) would have taken, by descent, and distribution, one moiety in fee and absolute right, in possession, and the other moiety in reversion; and the mother her moiety for life. I say, had this been the whole will, the estate, subject to the wife's life-interest in one moiety, would have gone to the daughter, under the statutes of descent and distribution: whether the descent has been broken by the after clauses, may be another question.

But the testator had looked to the future marriage of his wife, and also to the event that there might be issue of that marriage. He had certain property (slaves, I presume), which he held in right of his wife; and his intention was, in case she married and had issue by that marriage, that she should have the disposal of this portion of the estate. Her marriage alone was not to give her this right; she must again have issue; and then the question is, whether such issue must be alive at her death, in order to vest that property in her, so as to give her the disposal of it? The plain meaning of that part of the will, I think, is to give her the absolute disposal of that property, upon her marriage and having issue, without any view to the death of that issue before her or otherwise. In those events, that property would pass to her absolutely; in which case, although she might die afterwards, leaving no such issue behind her, the other clauses in relation to that portion of his estate, would not operate upon it: they would merely operate, in case she should die without hav- ing had such issue. For this event, any more issue, (that is to say, without having had any more issue,) my will and desire is, that the whole of my estate is to revert to my daughter Lucy." He doubt- less calculated, that, if a division was made, this property would form a portion of his wife's share, as it was to be abso- lutely her's, in the event so looked to. She would feel a greater interest in it than in his other property; but if that event did not happen, this property is to revert. That is his meaning by the expression, "the whole is to revert." He had carved out this portion, which might thus go in- tirely from his daughter; but if it does not, then it is to revert to her. Thus, the use of this word may perhaps have some bear- ing on the construction I have above given; though, I think, the intention plain enough without it. Generally, when that word is used it means simply, "go to."

Secondly, he looked to the event, not only that his wife might die without hav- ing had more issue, but that his daughter might also die without issue; and then he intended this part of his estate to go to the brothers and sisters of his wife, that might then be living. The words of the will are, "and should my daughter Lucy die without issue, for the whole of my estate to revert to my wife Susanna; and in case they both shall die without issue, then for that part that came by my wife, to revert back to her brothers and sisters that may then be living." We are now consid- ering what he intended, as to this portion of his estate that came by his wife. "Brothers and sisters living:" when liv- ing? When his wife should die without having had more issue, and his daughter should also die without issue, and should so die during the life of the wife, or of some one or more of her brothers and sis- ters, who, surviving these events, were to take the property.

But it cannot go over, until the mother is dead without having had more issue, and the daughter is also dead without issue.

Does this, as to the daughter, mean 408 dead without *having had issue? I think not. Does it mean, that, though she may die leaving issue alive, yet as that issue may ultimately fail, possibly in the life of the mother, and if not, pos- sibly in the life of her brothers and sisters, possibly not until long after the death of them all, in either of which cases, however, it is to go over? To whom is it to go over? First, to the mother: but it could only go over to the mother, in case she survived the daughter dying without issue, and had had no more issue herself; for if she had had such issue, it never would have gone to the daughter, so as to come from her to the mother. But on the death of the daugh- ter without issue, it is to go to the mother first, if she be in esse. The testator, then, as to this portion of his estate, looked to the mother's surviving the daughter who should be dead without issue, and taking it subject to be absolutely her's, should she have more issue, and if not, that she should have it for her life. He could not calculate on the mother taking it in tail, so that her issue, surviving the issue of the daughter, might, in the long course of time, take it: for the very fact of her having issue born, even after the death of the daughter, leaving issue, would cut out the issue of the daughter, and put an end to all questions. As to this portion of the estate, he did not intend to provide for the issue of the mother by a future marriage: he intended the mother, on that event, to take it absolutely, as her dowry, as if it never had ceased to be her property. A dying then, without issue in the life of the mother, and at most within the life of some brother or sister of the mother, was clearly intended as to this part of the estate. If the mother was alive on this event, and died afterwards without having had more issue, then it was to go to the survivors of the brothers and sisters.

This too must be ascertained at the death of the mother; for she could not have more issue after her death. But she may be dead without having had more issue, before the death of her daughter, and she may then die without issue: Without issue, when?

In the long course of time when that *issue, after her death, may become extinct? Is this property, then, to go over to surviving brothers and sisters? when too, other events looked to, tied it down to the death of the daughter without issue during the life of the mother! And this as to a personal subject, which could not be so limited on an indefinite failure of issue! Surely, it seems to me, this would not be a sound construction of the will, as to this part of the estate.

Had the mother died without having had more issue, and had the daughter died without ever having had issue, and that in the life-time of the mother, could it be said, that this limitation over of this portion of the estate was void, as being limited on an event too remote? On an indefinite failure of issue? It seems to me not.

Suppose the mother to have married, and to have had more issue, this part of the estate, in that event, if in possession, would have become absolute in her, and would have belonged to her husband. The daughter, though she might have survived her mother, and died leaving issue, and though the issue of the mother by the after marriage had also died before that time, would have had no interest in this portion of the estate. Nor would the issue of the mother, if alive at her death, take it under the will. It would be the property of the husband, if in possession, or go to him, if he survived, as his wife's administrator. Nor would it go to the brothers and sisters of the wife, although her daughter Lucy had died in her life, without having had issue, and the issue by the second marriage had also been dead at the death of the mother. But it might and would have gone over, had she never had such issue, and any brother or sister had survived her to take it.

Now, though it has happened, that the testator's daughter Lucy died soon after him, without having had issue, and though the mother again intermarried with the appellant Jiggetts, and is now alive, having had issue by him, so that no question remains as to this part of the estate; yet, as the provisions and limitations as to it, had these events not happened, 410 *are connected with the provisions and limitations in relation to the residue of the estate, which was to go over on the same events (as it seems to me), I have thought it expedient thus to inquire, whether this would have been a good executory limitation over, of this portion of the estate, in the events that might have happened.

John Davis, the testator's brother and devisee, mentioned in the will, is constituted one of the executors thereof, and qualified as such. It is said, in the answer, that the debts exhausted the personal estate, except that part of it which came by the wife. John Davis brings this suit for the real estate only. He says, and it is admitted in the answer, that his half brothers died infants, intestate and without issue; that he is their heir at law; that the testator's daughter Lucy also died an infant, intestate and without having had issue, before the marriage of her mother to the appellant Jiggetts; and that he is her only paternal uncle, and heir at law. He claims the estate by descent from her, one moiety to be decreed to him presently, and a declaration of his right to the other moiety on the death of Mrs. Jiggetts.

The defendants insist, that, on the death of Lucy, the daughter, without issue, the whole estate was to go by the will to her mother in fee.

It seems to me, that, as to the residue of the estate, the precise events which the testator looked to, and on which the estate was to go to his wife, have happened. It was quite natural and reasonable that he should have looked to the possible, if not probable, event of the death of his infant daughter without leaving issue; in which event, if her mother survived her, he wished her to take the estate; and if she died also without leaving issue by an after marriage, that it should go over to his own family, the estate being of his own acquisition. Should his wife die before his daughter, without more issue, the whole estate would of course belong to his daughter; but she might die afterwards without leaving issue, in which case he wished that portion of it acquired by her, to go to her brothers.

411 If the mother had *other issue at her death, and the daughter died leaving issue also, the estate which came by the mother, being thus absolute in her, would go as her property, to whoever might be entitled to it. If, at the death of his daughter without leaving issue (in which case, she could not have disposed of her estate), his wife had been also dead, but had left issue, the estate would not have gone to that issue by the will, nor would it have gone to the uncles under the will; for the events, on which it was to pass, either to his wife or his brothers, had not taken place. Suppose that situation of affairs had been suggested to the testator, and he had been asked, "do you wish the estate, in this case, to go out of your family to the children of your wife by a second marriage?" Is it not reasonable to suppose, he would have answered, "should my wife survive my daughter, as I have the greatest affection for her, next to that I feel for my child, I wish her to have all, if my daughter leaves no issue: but if I cannot benefit her, I surely can have no such feeling for her children, or her husband, that would induce me, in this event, to prefer them to my own blood: I therefore mean, that she is to survive the death of my daughter, without leaving issue, so as on that event, to take a personal benefit from me: if it does not so happen, I leave the law to dispose of it." Suppose all this had been explicitly stated in the will, what objection could there be to it? But if we can collect this to have been his real intention, and these to have been the events plainly and naturally looked to, why shall we impute to the testator an intention to intermeddle with the abstruse doctrine of implied estates tail, which we have to study anew, as every case arises? Why shall we suppose, that he was looking to events, which might not happen for an hundred years; and that he was seeking to create perpetuities in his family, of which he certainly never dreamt? To consider him as doing this, is to suppose he thought he had the power to create an estate tail; and was ignorant of the law, which would in fact obliterate and change his whole will the moment he made it, in case 412 he did so; would make *it read, either as giving his whole estate, at once, in fee, to his daughter, which, consequently, in no event, could go to his wife, or to any one else ultimately in his view; or would give one half of his own acquired estate to his wife in fee, on his death, and possibly also the whole of the property which came by her, and to his daughter only the other half of his own acquisition, so as in fact to give her a less share than her mother! This will was made in 1813, so long since the act for destroying entails, that the testator may not have been born under that system of laws: could he have been ignorant of the existing system? If he was not, he could only have created estates tail by his will, through sheer mistake, or slip of the pen: he could not have intended it: and if there be circumstances in the will, to satisfy us that he intended what I have supposed, we ought not, if we can avoid it, to violate this intention. As to our duty in this respect, I have expressed my opinion pretty fully in the case of Bells v. Gillespie.

The mother has survived the daughter, who died without ever having had issue. Since that, the mother has again married, and has a family of children. On this death of the daughter, the whole estate went to her mother, at least during her life. Her taking husband, and having issue, has given her the estate that came by her, in absolute right, and it now belongs to her husband. The other estate will be absolutely her's too, if she leave issue at her death; if not, it will either pass, under the will, by way of executory devise, the event on which it is to pass or not, being to happen at that time, or it will descend to the testator's heirs at law. We have nothing to do with that question, at present.

But let us further inquire, whether we are bound to imply estates tail in this case: First, as to the wife.

estate, expressly, in one moiety of the testator's estate. The next provides thus: in case my wife should die without any more issue, the whole to revert to my daughter: and should my daughter die without issue, the whole of my estate to revert 413 to *my wife: and, in case they both should die without issue, then that part that came by my wife to revert back to her brothers and sisters then living, and for the balance of my estate to revert to my brother John Davis and his heirs, if any; if none, to be equally divided between my half brothers.

"In case my wife should die without any more issue &c." The issue supposed to be here intended to be provided for by the will, is her issue by a future husband. The estate for life in the wife is then to be raised into a fee tail, that her issue by another husband may take one moiety of the estate, as her heirs in tail, so as to defeat, quoad that moiety, his own daughter and her issue, although she and they may endure for generations, at the same time, that his wife, by having this very issue, gets back absolutely the estate which came by her; and thus, she and her issue are to take a much larger portion of his whole estate, than his own child and her issue! This is on the supposition, that the testator supposed he could make an estate tail, and thus provide for the future issue of his wife by another husband, and intended to provide, in this way, for such issue. Is it possible to suppose he ever dreamed of such a thing? It would be just as reasonable to suppose, that he intended that which, under the act of 1776, would be the effect of such a disposition, to give to his wife, at once, a fee in a moiety of his estate, which she might sell the next day after his death, and thus disinherit his child.

But that clause of the will, as I have before shewn, had no other object but to bring back to his daughter, that portion of the estate, which might become the absolute property of the wife, in a certain event: this is manifest, if we suppose he had that disposition of the estate that came by his wife, then in his mind. And though, when that part of the will now under consideration was written, he had not put into writing the clause which was thus to give that portion of his estate absolutely to his wife, yet the words "more issue" shew, that he was looking to that very 414 event, which *was to give it absolutely to her, and that he was providing for what was to be done, if that event did not happen; as he also provided for it, in the other clause, which, in certain events, gives that portion of his estate to his wife's brothers and sisters; which clause was also penned before he made the provision, giving it absolutely to his wife on her having more issue. That disposition was as much in his mind and will, when those clauses were written, as if it had actually been reduced to writing before them, as part of his testament. And it is therefore perfectly fair to read it as the first written. These clauses never contemplated creating an estate of any kind in the wife: they were designed to dispose of the property which came by her, and that only. As to the other property, any interest she was to take in it, depended on the first clause giving a moiety for life, and on the clause giving her the whole of the estate on the death of the daughter without issue, which she was to take absolutely.

Next, did he intend by that clause, to create an estate tail in the whole property in his daughter.

He certainly did not intend to create an estate tail in his daughter, in that portion of his property which came by his wife, as I have before shewn. He had taken it from her already, and given it absolutely to his wife, on an event that has happened. As to it, then, he did not mean to provide for the issue of his daughter out of it.

He had not thought it necessary to give to this, his only child, any thing, not even a life estate in a moiety: nothing but a support until a division, which might have been called for the day after his death. Why? Because, with the interruption of the life estate of his wife in a moiety, the whole would go to her and her heirs; and, had he not looked to her possible death, (she being an infant probably of tender years), without children, in which case he intended to provide more amply for his wife, and should she die also without issue, to discriminate between his brothers, the will would have gone no farther than 415 to give the life estate to the *wife, and to make the provisions which he did make, as to the estate that came by her. Suppose he had, in no event, intended any thing more for his wife, and had intended to give no preference to his brother John Davis, the clause, under which this question arises, would have been unnecessary, to effect anything else in the mind of the testator, and never would have been found in his will. He would simply have permitted the estate to go by descent to his daughter, and afterwards in due course of descents, should she not attain her age so as to dispose of it, or never have issue to take it from her. He did not mean, by this clause, to give to his daughter a less estate, than that fee which he knew would descend to her.

But, it is said, he intended to provide for her issue, by this clause, so as to perpetuate the estate in them as heirs in tail.

I have already shewn, that he did not intend this, as to one portion of the estate, although included by the word whole; and I cannot think, that he was so intirely ignorant of his want of power to do this, or of the fact that the consequences of an attempt to do so, would have been a felo de se of every other intention expressed in his will, in relation to the other part of his estate, as that, he could have intended any such thing as to it. Had the idea crossed his mind, that if his daughter should live to mature years, marry, and have a family, she was not to take an absolute estate as his heir, he would probably have shewn this in the usual way in which unlearned testators do, by giving her only a life estate. That would have been his intention: he would have intended her to enjoy it, at least during her life, and that it should then go to her issue. But such an idea never presented itself. He looked to her death without issue in the life-time of her mother, and intended to provide for that event. And he also looked to the death of that mother without more issue; and as his whole estate, as well that acquired by him, as that which came by his wife, would thus have centered in the mother, he intended the *one to go to her brothers and sisters, and the other to his own brothers. He never looked to these ulterior provisions taking effect after a long lapse of time, when the issue of his daughter might become extinct. I think, taking all the provisions of the will together, he has plainly enough tied it down to a definite failure of issue, so as to enable us to give effect to his real intentions.

He did not intend by this clause (as I have before said) to create any estate in his daughter; but merely to provide for such an event as has happened. It seems to me, therefore, to be a stronger case than the case of Pells v. Brown. We have seen, that the same words were not intended to give an estate tail to the wife, and why should they have a different meaning when applied to the daughter?

The circumstance that the wife's brothers and sisters might all be dead before the wife and daughter, is nothing more than what often happens, that the person or persons intended to be benefited, have died before the happening of the event on which the benefit was to accrue: it does not shew, that the event looked to was one not expected to happen in time to give a personal bounty to the party. How numerous they were, and the probability of their surviving is not known. They may now be alive; but, having no connexion with, or interest in, the matter in hand, no mention is made of them.

But if there be any thing strange in the supposition, that the testator looked to their being alive, or some of them being alive, at the death of both the wife and child; I think it is not so strange, as to suppose, he really did intend to create an estate tail. If we can see, from the whole will, that he did not intend it, we cannot (it seems to me) with any reason say that he did it by accident.

Where from the whole will, it is probable, that he intended to tie it down to a dying without issue, living his wife, surely the change in our system ought to turn the scale in favour of the intention. In England, in relation to real estates, if the matter was doubtful, as the issue could 417 *thus be provided for, perhaps the courts would permit the power to do so to incline the scales that way: but even if that were so there, are we to be so hampered, as that, in a doubtful case here, the change in our situation, the absence of this power, may not turn the scale the other way? Are we to be told, that some speculator has purchased an estate, hanging thus in doubt and equal balance, and that the rules of property will be invaded if the scales are not to be turned by a circumstance, which, in England, would turn them in his favour, but which here ought to belong to the other scale? Let him forbear his speculation, until he who offers to sell, and who is a volunteer, has ascertained his rights. Surely, if the case would be a doubtful one, under the whole will, according to english decisions, (and I think we are entitled here, to the benefit of the most liberal english decision) we ought not to doubt here.

This testator undoubtedly intended a benefit to his wife. But it may be well doubted, whether, taking all his will together, he intended, by this clause, to provide for the issue of his daughter, and to prevent her, if she had such issue at her death, from disposing of this estate as she pleased. If this intention is doubtful, why shall we presume it existed, in order to defeat intirely the clearly expressed intention in favour of his wife, and of those in remainder after her, should she leave no issue at her death?

I think the decree is erroneous, and that the wife, in the events that have actually happened, is entitled by the executory limitations of the will, to the whole estate.

CABELL, J. This case presents a contest about real estate, involving the question, so often raised in this court, as to the effect of a limitation over after a dying without issue. And before I proceed to the examination of the particular case, the course of the argument at the bar, renders it proper, that I should state the principles, which seem to me to be applicable to questions of this nature.

418 *By the common law, it was not allowed to limit a fee upon a fee. But it is natural to the possessor of property, to desire absolute dominion over it during his own life, and to render it inalienable afterwards, except on the terms which he himself may prescribe; and after the statute of wills, this disposition was so far indulged, as to allow a man, contrary to the principles of the common law, to limit a fee upon a fee, by his last will and testament. Pells v. Brown, Cro. Jac. 590. These limitations were called executory devises. But, as it was seen that they tended to a perpetuity, (for the estate was inalienable during the term allowed for the contingency, on which the limitation over was to take effect), no executory devise was tolerated, except where the contingency must happen, if at all, within a limited and reasonable period. And it became an inflexible rule also, that whenever a future interest was so limited by devise, as to fall within the rules laid down for the limitation of contingent remainders, such an interest is not an executory devise, but a contingent remainder. Carth. 310; Reeve v. Long, 4 Mod. 259; Purefoy v. Rogers, 2 Saund. 380; Butler's Fearn, 386. The consequence of this rule is, that every limitation after a fee tail, must take effect, if at all, as a contingent remainder, and not as an executory devise, and will be barred by whatever bars the entail.

As estates tail and all remainders thereon may be barred, in England, by fine and recovery, and are, in all cases, barred ipso facto by our statute, the first inquiry, as to all limitations of a future interest after a failure of issue, is, generally, whether the first estate be an estate in fee or in tail.

An estate tail is an estate limited to the issue of the donee. And as wills are to be construed according to the intention of the testator, it follows, that whenever it shall appear, from the whole will, to have been the testator's intention to give an estate descendible exclusively to the issue of the devisee, such estate will be deemed to be a fee tail, whatever be the words or form used by the testator. Thus, if the devise be to A. and his heirs, but if he die without issue then to B. and his heirs; the devise to A. and his heirs, taken separately, would give him an estate in fee simple; but the subsequent words shew, that he intended to give an estate to B. also, and that that estate was made to depend on A.'s dying without issue. The question naturally arises, why was the interest of B. made to depend on A.'s dying without issue? Was it, that the testator intended it as a mere contingency, on which the estate of A. was to be intirely defeated? or was it, that he intended that if A. died leaving issue, that issue should have the estate, so long as there should be any issue? The courts, whose province it is to expound wills, have, from the beginning, uniformly and invariably, considered that it proceeded from an intention in the testator, to provide for the issue of the first taker, which intention could not be effected without holding that he took an estate tail, and not a fee simple. Therefore, the words "if A. should die without issue," were held to controul the previous words "A. and his heirs," so as to give him a fee tail and not a fee simple. So, likewise, even where the devise is expressly to A. for life, but if he should die without issue, then to B. and his heirs, the courts, upon the same principles and reasoning, have uniformly considered it as indicating an intention in the testator, to provide for the issue of A. and, as that intention could not be effected, without holding that A. took an estate transmissible to his issue, they have uniformly and invariably held, that the words "if A. should die without issue," controul the operation of the previous words, "to A. for life," so as to enlarge his estate from an estate for life, to an estate tail. It is in vain to inquire now, whether this construction was originally right or wrong, as conforming to, or departing from, the testator's intention. It soon became an established rule of construction, that a limitation over after a general dying without issue, was as indicative of an intention to give the first devisee an estate tail, as if the estate had been given expressly to him and the heirs of his body. And this rule has never been departed from in a single instance.

420 If, however, there be any words in the will which clearly shew an intention in the testator, not to postpone the limitation over until an indefinite failure of the issue of the first devisee, but to confine it to a failure of issue at the time of his death; as, for example, where an estate is given to A. for life, or to A. and his heirs, but if he die without issue living at his death, then over; in such case, none of the preceding reasoning applies; for it is then manifest, that the testator did not intend, by the words dying without issue, to provide indefinitely for the issue of A. but merely to limit a contingency, on which the estate of A. was to be defeated, or that of B. to take effect. In such case, therefore, the previous words are left to their natural operation, unaffected by those that follow. Consequently, A. takes, in the first instance, an estate for life only, and in the second, a fee simple, which, however, will be defeated intirely by his dying without issue living at the time of his death. But unless there be some circumstances in the will, indicating a restrictive intention, the words "die without issue" are always considered as referring not to a failure of issue at the death, but to an indefinite failure of issue; and, thus, to create an estate tail for the benefit of the issue; and, consequently, to exclude the idea of an executory devise. And, as before observed, this rule has never been departed from. It is unnecessary to refer to authorities to establish a position, to which every lawyer will yield his assent.

Such is the law of England as to executory limitations, where the subject of the devise is real estate. Personal property cannot be entailed. But if it be granted or bequeathed in such a manner as that if it were real estate, the grantee or devisee would take an estate tail, in such case, the full and intire interest passes to the grantee or legatee, as it would have done if the grant or bequest had been in the most absolute forms known to the law. Nor can there be, in personal property, a remainder in the strict sense of that word; and, therefore, every future bequest of personal property, whether preceded or not by a 421 prior bequest, or *limited on a certain or uncertain event, is an executory devise or bequest, and falls under the rules by which that mode of limitation is regulated. Butler's Fearnie, 401. One of the most important of these rules is, that the contingency on which an executory devise or bequest is to take effect, must be such, that it must happen, if at all, within the compass of a life or lives in being, and twenty-one years and some months thereafter. And it matters not whether a term or other personal property be limited to the first devisee or legatee, indefinitely, or for life expressly, or to him and his heirs, or the heirs of his body, or to his issue or children; for the limitation over will be equally valid, under any of these circumstances; provided the contingency on which the limitation over is to take effect, be restricted to the period aforesaid. Id. 478.

In deciding, whether this rule, as to the restriction of the contingency, has been observed or not, it frequently becomes important to ascertain the meaning of the words, die without issue. I have before observed, that where real property is the subject of a devise, these words have been uniformly and invariably held to refer to an indefinite failure of issue, and not to a failure of issue at the death, unless there were circumstances in the will indicating a restrictive intention. The same rule of construction has been uniformly and invariably applied to limitations over of personal property, after a dying without issue; with this difference only, that, in cases of personal property, slighter circumstances will be regarded as evidence of a restrictive intention, than would be admitted in cases of real estate; such as the words, leaving, then, after, &c. &c. There must, however, be some evidence of restrictive intention, even in cases of personal property, other than that arising from the consideration, that the property is personal, and that it cannot be entailed: otherwise, the words dying without issue, are always held to refer to an indefinite failure of issue. And there is no difference, in this respect, between limitations of personal property, by such words as in the case of real

That our statute of 1776, turning estates tail into estates in fee simple, did not convert into executory devises, any remainders limited on estates tail created before the passage of that act, but utterly extinguished the interest of the persons in remainder, was most solemnly decided in the case of Carter v. Tyler. As the statute makes no difference between estates tail created before, and those created since, (the same words being applied to both,) the construction, as to the effect of the statute, must be the same as to both.

But an important question here presents itself: by what laws are we to be governed in deciding what is, or what is not, an estate tail? The answer to this question will depend, I think, on the date of the deed or will by which the estate may have been created. Deeds or wills made before the 1st January 1778, the date at which the revised act of 1785 was to take effect, will be construed according to the laws and rules of construction which prevailed on the 7th October 1776, the date of the act converting estates tail into estates in fee simple: and deeds or wills made since the 1st January 1787, will be construed in the same way, as if they had been made before; with the exception, however, of that change produced by the clause, in the act of 1785, dispensing with words of perpetuity.

As this question was discussed with much earnestness in the argument in this case, and as it has been frequently the subject of controversy before, I may be excused for a particular examination of it.

1st. As to deeds and wills made before the act of 1785. The terms of the act of 1776, are, that "any person who now hath, or hereafter may have any estate in fee tail &c. in any lands &c. whether such estate tail hath been, or hereafter shall be, created by deed, will &c. shall from henceforth, or from the commencement of such estate tail, stand ipso facto seized &c. of such lands &c. in full and absolute 423 fee simple, *in like manner as if such deed, will &c. had conveyed the same in fee simple &c." It was, undoubtedly, competent to the legislature of 1776, to define a fee tail, and to prescribe the rules of construction, by which to determine when a fee tail had been, or should be afterwards, created. But no such definition is made, and no rules of construction are given. The conclusion is inevitable, that the legislature of 1776 intended, that the courts should be guided by the former laws and rules of construction upon this subject. And this was the construction put upon the act of 1776, by the legislature of 1785. For the revised act of that session, in speaking of estates tail, created before its passage, declares, "that every estate in lands or slaves, which on the 7th October 1776, was an estate in fee tail, shall be deemed from that time to have been, and from thenceforward to continue, an estate in fee simple; and every estate in lands, which since hath been limited, or hereafter shall be limited, so that, as the law aforesaid was, such estate would have been an estate tail, shall also be deemed to have been and to continue an estate in fee simple:" thus adopting, in express terms, the law, as it aforesaid was, for the construction of deeds and wills made since the original act declaring that there should no longer be estates tail in Virginia.

But this question has been judicially decided also. It formally presented itself in the case of Tate v. Tally, on a will made since the act of 1776, and which if it gave an estate tail, at all, gave it by implication only. It was strongly contended, that those rules of construction by which estates tail were implied, were originally founded on a regard to the benefit of the issue in tail, and that, as estates tail were not now tolerated in this country, the reason of those rules no longer existed, and the rules themselves had become inapplicable, and that, therefore, no estate tail ought to be considered as having been created, since the year 1776, unless it be expressly created. But the court clearly established the principle, that in construing a will made since the act of 1776, we are not to be influenced by the *consideration, that estates tail cannot now exist in Virginia, but are to be governed by the rules of construction which prevailed before that act, notwithstanding the reason, on which some of those rules were founded, was done away by the abolition of estates tail. This principle has since been recognized and acted upon, in the case of Eskridge v. Fisher, and other cases cited at the bar. Nor is there, in my opinion, any decision of this court, that militates against the doctrine established by these cases. It is true, that the cases of Dunn v. Bray, 1 Call, 338, and Smith and wife v. Chapman, 1 Hen. & Munf. 240, have been sometimes referred to as opposing decisions.

Dunn v. Bray relates intirely to personal estate, and of course is not applicable to a case of real estate; for every body must admit, that there is a difference between real and personal estate, in respect to these executory limitations; slighter circumstances being relied upon as evidence of restrictive intention, in cases of personal estate, than would be allowed in cases of real estate. The case of Dunn v. Bray itself affords an instance of this difference; for the limitation over of slaves, in that case, was supported on the strength of the words leaving and then, which would have been insufficient in a case of real estate. It is true, that, in Dunn v. Bray, judge Pendleton adverts to a diversity that was formerly insisted on by some of the english judges, particularly by lord Talbot, in Atkinson v. Hutchinson, 3 P. Wms. 258, between a limitation over of personal property, by such words as in the case of real estate would give an express estate tail, and a limitation of the same, by such words as in the case of real estate would give an estate tail by implication only; and judge Pendleton seems to admit the distinction. But I have not found, that it has been recognized by this court in any subsequent decision; and it is certain that it has been long exploded in England. Butler's Fearn, 478-486.

As to Smith and wife v. Chapman: in that case, a testator devised, by express words, an estate for life, in lands 425 "and negroes, to each of his three children, with remainders to the children of each; and in case of the death of either without children, remainder over to the survivor or survivors of his said three children. The great question in the cause, was, whether the children of the testator, (the first devisees,) took estates for life only, or estates tail by implication? The court decided that, independently of the act of 1776 docking entails, and of the act of 1785 dispensing with words of inheritance or perpetuity, the children of the testator took, according to the doctrines of english law, an estate for life only, and not an estate tail. It is true, that three of the judges, Roane, Fleming and Lyons, speak of not implying an estate tail for the benefit of the issue, since the act of 1776. But the expressions of judges must always be understood in reference to the cases before them. It will be seen, that the case of Smith v. Chapman was one, in which it was perfectly clear, in the estimation of all the judges deciding it, that an estate tail would not be implied, even in England. The expressions of the judges, fairly construed, amount to no more than this, that, in a case where an estate tail would not be implied, even according to the principles of construction which prevailed before 1776, they would not now imply one, on the pretence of benefiting the issue. It is impossible to put any other construction on the opinion, even of judge Roane, who used the strong expression, that the act of 1776 had "cut up by the roots the pretence of implying an estate tail for the benefit of the issue;" for he afterwards, in the same opinion, refers expressly to Tate v. Tally, as having established, that, in construing what is or is not an estate tail, we should refer to the former laws; and he quotes, with approbation, the expression of Judge Fleming, in Tate v. Tally, "that the intention of the act of 1776 was not to alter the established rules of construction." He, moreover, expressly justifies the implication of estates tail, according to the former rules of construction, notwithstanding the reason of those rules has ceased.

And that this was what he really 426 intended, is *clearly proved by the opinion which he delivered in the subsequent case of Tidball v. Lupton.

It cannot be admitted, that a law ceases to exist, merely because the reason which gave rise to its adoption has ceased. If this were admitted, we should demolish at once, much of the venerable fabrick of the common law. Rules of construction of wills even become, when long established, indicia of intention, and rules of property; and, like other rules of law, should be permitted to survive the state of things which gave them birth.

It may not be unworthy of remark, as connected with this branch of the subject, that personal property is as incapable of being entailed in England, as real property is in Virginia; and that, in England, if such an interest is given in personal property, as would amount to a fee tail if the property were real, the grantee or devisee will take the intire interest, in the same manner as if had been given in the fullest manner known to the law. It becomes, therefore, frequently necessary to decide, whether the legatee of personal property takes such an interest in it, as would be a fee tail, if the property had been real: And it is very remarkable, that the rules for the construction of wills, by which estates tail are implied in real estate, have been applied by the english courts to wills of personal property, for inferring an intention in the testator to give such an interest therein, as would, if the property were real, amount to an estate tail. Thus, if personal property be given to one for life, but if he die without issue, remainder over, the legatee takes, not an estate for life, but the intire interest, merely because such a devise of real property would give an estate tail: and yet the reason for implying an estate greater than a life estate, is wholly inapplicable to personal property. Love v. Windham, 1 Vent. 79; Butler's Ferne, 486.

2dly. As to deeds and wills made since the act of 1785. That act, in the first part of its provisions on this subject, puts them on the same footing with deeds and 427 wills made before *the passage of the act, by declaring "that every estate in lands, which since [the 7th October 1776] hath been limited, or hereafter shall be limited, so that, as the law aforesaid was, such estate would have been an estate tail, shall be deemed to have been, and to continue, an estate in fee simple." This part of the act makes the same rules of construction common to estates created before and to those created since the act; namely, the rules of construction recognized by the law, as it aforesaid was. But it was surely competent to the legislature of 1785, to make any exceptions to or changes in those rules, that it thought proper: and it did make an exception, as to deeds and wills to be made after the passage of that act, by declaring in the sentence almost immediately succeeding, that "every estate in lands, which shall hereafter be granted, conveyed or devised to one, although other words heretofore necessary to transfer an estate of inheritance, be not added, shall be deemed a fee simple, if a less estate be not limited by express words, or do not appear to have been granted, conveyed or devised, by construction or operation of law." It must be admitted, that this section makes a most important change in one of the former rules of construction; and it is imperative on the courts. As to estates created since the act of 1785, the expression, "as the law aforesaid was," must, therefore, be understood as controlled by the clause just referred to. But, with this exception, there is no difference between the construction of deeds and wills made before the statute of 1785, and those made since.

As to the construction of the will in the case now before us: although it is some times permitted to transpose the different parts of a will, I concur with judge Carr in thinking, that it ought to be done with great caution, and that, in general, we are much more likely to arrive at the real meaning of a testator, by pursuing the order in which he has expressed his thoughts and intentions, than by inverting or changing that order. The testator, in this case, had a wife and a daughter, his only child. He seems to have regarded 428 *them as equal objects of his bounty.

From the first part of the will, it is perfectly manifest, that each, during her life, was to have an equal participation in his estate; and that, in case the wife should die without any more issue, the whole estate was to go to the daughter, and in case the daughter should die without any issue, the whole was to go to the wife. If there had been nothing more in the will, I think it could not be questioned, but that each of them would have taken by the will a fee tail in a moiety of the land, and an absolute interest in a moiety of the personalty. I do not think the last clause in the will, can have any influence in changing the construction of it, as to any part of the property, other than the particular property to which it professes to relate. That clause relates exclusively to the property which came by the wife; and as to that, the testator says his wife is to have the disposal of it, in case she "should marry and again have issue." The testator thought (whatever may be the legal construction) that the former part of the will would not give to his wife the disposal of any part of the property, before the death of his daughter without issue. But thinking it proper to give her greater powers, as to that portion of it which came by her, he declares, in the last clause of his will, that his wife shall have the disposal of it, in case she "should marry and again have issue." This clause was introduced, I think, for the sole purpose of placing the property that came by the wife, on a footing different from that on which, he thought, it stood under the former part of the will. He intended by the latter clause, to give to the wife, over the property that came by her, a power which he did not intend her to have over the rest of his estate. He intended to give her this power, in the event that she "should marry and again have issue." These last words, therefore, being used for a different purpose, can afford no criterion for construing the words in the first clause, "in case my wife should die without any more issue." Nor do I think that the generality of the expressions "die without any more issue," can be affected, 429 as to "the land, by the subsequent limitation over, on the death of both wife and daughter without issue, of the property that came by the wife, "to her brothers and sisters that may be then living," even if it would be so as to any of the personal property; as to which however I give no opinion. I therefore think, that the wife took a fee tail in a moiety of the land; and I concur in the opinion, that the daughter took a fee tail in the other moiety; both of which were converted into estates in fee by the act docking entails.

GREEN, J., being of opinion, that the daughter was entitled to a fee in one moiety of the land, and to the remainder in fee expectant on the wife's life estate in the other moiety; and Coalter, J., being of opinion, that the wife, in the events that have actually happened, was entitled to the whole; and Cabell and Carr, J., holding, that, by joint force of the will and of the statute abolishing entails, the daughter was entitled to one moiety in fee, and the wife to the other moiety in fee; the decree was in conformity with this last opinion.

430 *Dunlop & Co. v. Keith and Others.

[19 Am. Dec. 755.]

(Absent BROOKE, P., and CARR, J.*)

Foreign Attachment—Absent Defendants—Case at Bar.—A claim arising out of the official neglect of the clerk of a county court in Virginia, against the officer a non-resident of Virginia at the time the claim is asserted, is not a claim for debt, for which a foreign attachment in chancery lies. Same—Same—Same.—Neither is the non-resident officer, in such case, amenable to jurisdiction of the court of chancery as an absent defendant.

Dunlop & Co. alleged, that they had sustained heavy loss, by the official negligence or fault, either of Keith, clerk of the county court of Frederick, or of Stephenson, late sheriff of Berkeley. Keith, the clerk, had never given any official bond for the faithful discharge of the duties of his office; and he was now residing in the town of Alexandria in the district of Columbia. Dunlop & Co. proceeded by way of foreign attachment; exhibiting their bill in the superior court of chancery of Winchester, against Keith, as an absent debtor, against Tidball, his agent having money in his hands belonging to him, as garnishee, and against the representatives of Stephenson, the sheriff; setting forth the amount of loss they had sustained, and the official misconduct to which they imputed it; charging, that, though it might be disputed in actions at law, whether the loss were properly imputable to the official misconduct of the clerk, or to that of the sheriff, yet Keith the clerk appeared to be the officer really chargeable; and praying a decree against Keith for the amount of the loss, and the attachment and application of the moneys belonging to him, in the hands of the garnishee, to the satisfaction thereof.

Keith, and the representatives of Stephenson, in their respective answers, denied the official misconduct imputed to them. And Keith insisted, that he was not amenable, in such a case, to the jurisdiction of the court of chancery.

431 *The chancellor seemed somewhat inclined to sustain the jurisdiction; but he did not decide the point; for, finding it impossible, upon the proofs, to fix the imputed misconduct upon either officer, he for this reason dismissed the bill.

Dunlop & Co. appealed to this court.

Johnson, for the appellants, and Leigh, for the appellees, argued the cause upon the merits, as well as the question of jurisdiction. But, in the event, it turned wholly on the point of jurisdiction; and this depended on the construction and effect of the statute concerning proceedings in chancery against absent debtors and other absent defendants, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 123, p. 474.

CABELL, J., delivered the resolution of the court. If the chancellor had not jurisdiction of the case stated in the bill, it will be unnecessary to look farther.

As early as the year 1744, an act passed (5 Hen. stat. at large, p. 220), authorising a suit in chancery against persons out of the country, and others within the country having in their hands effects belonging to the absent defendants. But that act was intended to apply to those cases only, in which the plaintiffs and the absent defendants stood, towards each other, in the relation of creditor and debtor; for the act recites, as the motive for its adoption, the great difficulties that had arisen in the recovery of debts due to the inhabitants of this country, from persons residing out of it. At a long subsequent period, in the year 1787, (12 Id. 466, 7,) the legislature authorised proceedings against other absent defendants, similar to those which the preceding law had given against absent debtors. The provisions of both these laws, with some others on the same subject, are brought together in the Revised Code.

The bill of Dunlop & Co. states the case of a misfeasance of Keith in office; a mere tort, the action for which dies with the person. It is similar, in this respect, to 432 the case of an escape of a person in execution, by negligence of a *sheriff or jailor, which makes him personally responsible for the amount of the debt; but he was answerable at the common law, not as a debtor, but as a tortfeasor; and the action died with the person, upon the maxim actio personalis moritur cum persona. 11 Vin. Abr. 244, 5; Executors, H. a. pl. 1.

Is the case, as stated in the bill, within either that branch of the statute which gives relief against absent debtors, or that which gives against other absent defendants, relief similar to that which is given against absent debtors? The court thinks it comes within neither. Not within the first: for, although the term debtor should

*Debt—Claim Arising Out of Official Neglect of Clerk—Attachment.—In Maysville, etc., Co. v. Marvin, 59 Fed. Rep. 93, it is said, a claim arising out of the official neglect of a county court clerk was held not to be a "debt," within the meaning of the statute authorizing an attachment for "debt." Citing Dunlop v. Keith, 1 Leigh 430. See monographic notes on "Debt. The Action of" appended to Davis v. Mead, 13 Gratt. 118; "Attachments" appended to Lancaster v. Wilson, 27 Gratt. 624.

in the construction of this statute, be taken in its largest sense, as embracing every person against whom another has a claim for breach of contract, even where the compensation sounds in damages;* yet Keith cannot be embraced by it, since his case is that of a mere tortfeasor. If he had given an official bond, that would have varied the case. But it does not appear that he gave any. Nor can it come within that branch of the statute, which authorizes the same proceedings against other absent defendants, that are allowed against absent debtors. This part of the statute was not intended to extend the jurisdiction of equity to subjects over which it had not jurisdiction before; but, to enable the court of chancery to exercise over persons abroad a jurisdiction to which they would, if they were here, be jointly amenable with the home defendants, in cases in their nature proper for the jurisdiction of equity, such as partners, legatees, joint contractors, &c. Nobody would contend, that Keith, if in Virginia, would be liable to be sued in equity, on the case stated in the bill, either separately, or jointly with the other defendants. And the same remark applies to the representatives of the sheriff.

On this ground, the decree is affirmed.

433 *Cooke v. The Patriotic Bank of Washington.

October, 1829.

(Absent GREEN, J.)

Forthcoming Bonds—Notice—Variance in Name of Party—Effect.—In a notice of a motion to be made on a forthcoming bond the bond is described by mistake as executed by John when it was in fact executed by George M. Cooke: HELD, variance material, and notice insufficient.

A fiat facias, sued out of the circuit court of Stafford, by the appellees against George M. Cooke, having been levied on his property, he together with John Cooke, his surety, gave bond for the forthcoming of the property at the day of sale, in the usual form; which was forfeited. A notice was given to the true obligors, of a motion to be made for award of execution on the bond: but it was addressed to John M. Cooke (instead of George M. Cooke) and John Cooke; and it described the bond as the bond of John M. Cooke (instead of George M.), and John Cooke. It was objected at the hearing of the motion, that the notice did not truly describe the bond on which the motion was made, but on the contrary described a bond which did not exist; but, notwithstanding this variance, the circuit court awarded execution on the bond.

He was absent during the whole of this term, being a member of the convention, (which sat from the first Monday in October 1829, till the 15th January 1830) and constantly attending his duty there.

Forthcoming Bonds—Notice—Sufficiency of.—If the notice descends to particulars as to dates, sums and names, the documents referred to, when produced, must correspond with the notice or no judgment can be given. Board, etc. v. Parsons, 22 W. Va. 311, citing 1 Rob. Pr. (1st Ed.) 590; Drew v. Anderson, 1 Call 51; Cooke v. Patriotic Bank, 1 Leigh 433. See also, citing the principal case for this proposition, Shepherd v. Brown, 30 W. Va. 20, 3 S. E. Rep. 190; foot-note to Monteith v. Com., 15 Gratt. 172. See monographic note on "Statutory Bonds" appended to Goolsby v. Grother, 21 Gratt. 107.

The defendants applied to this court for a supersedeas, which was allowed.

Green for the plaintiffs in error, and Briggs for the defendants.

The only point was the misnomer in the notice, of the principal obligor—John M. instead of George M. Cooke; the effect of which was, that the notice described a different forthcoming bond from that on which the motion was in fact made.

This court held the variance material and fatal, and reversed the judgment of the circuit court.

434 *M'Kenny's Ex'ors v. Waller.

October, 1829.

(Absent GREEN, J.)

Sureties—Mere Indulgence to Debtor—Effect.—A mere indulgence given by a creditor to a principal debtor, the creditor not binding himself to suspend his proceedings against the principal for any time, though such indulgence be given at the very time the sheriff is about to levy the execution on the principal's property, and though in consequence of that indulgence the principal is enabled to remove his property out of the reach of future process, does not, even in equity, discharge the surety.

M'Kenny's executors having obtained judgment and award of execution, in the county court of Spottsylvania, on three several forfeited forthcoming bonds, against Joseph Waller the principal, and Curtis Waller the surety, therein bound, sued out thereupon three writs of fiat facias, dated in April 1822, and returnable to the June term following. These executions were put

Principal and Surety—Mere Indulgence Given Debtor—Effect as to Surety.—Mere indulgence, given by the creditor to the principal debtor, such as suspending the proceeding against the principal by withdrawing the execution from the hands of sheriff before levy, does not discharge the surety. For this proposition the principal case is cited in Alcock v. Hill, 4 Leigh 625; foot-note to Harnsberger v. Geiger, 3 Gratt. 144; Humphrey v. Hitt, 6 Gratt. 528, and note; Walker v. Com., 18 Gratt. 48, and note; foot-note to Shannon v. M'Mullin, 25 Gratt. 211; Armistead v. Ward, 2 Pat. & H. 512; Coleman v. Stone, 85 Va. 388, 7 S. E. Rep. 241; Ambler v. Leach, 15 W. Va. 607; Knight v. Charter, 22 W. Va. 429.

In Chichester v. Mason, 7 Leigh 262, in which case the court was equally divided as to whether the surety was discharged by the withdrawal of the execution it is said, by CABELL J., with whom BROOKE J. concurred: "I have carefully examined every case that has ever been decided by this court, having, as I supposed, any reference to the exoneration of sureties, from Croughton v. Duval, to M'Kenny's Ex'ors v. Waller; and I think I shall not be found to be mistaken, when I say, that there will not be found in any one of them, any allusion to the question, whether the release or withdrawing of an execution put into the hands of the sheriff, is or is not a discharge of the surety. Croughton v. Duval, 3 Call 69; Ward v. Johnson, 6 Munf. 6; Hill v. Bull, Gilm. 149; Bennett v. Maule, Gilm. 328; Norris v. Crumme, 2 Rand. 328, and Hunter's Adm'r v. Jett, 4 Rand. 104. In the first of these cases the question was as to the effect of the neglect or refusal of the creditor to sue the principal; and in all the others the question was, whether the surety was discharged by the creditor having given time, and thereby tied up his hands, so as to impair the remedies of the surety. When, therefore, the court in M'Kenny's Ex'ors v. Waller, refer to the principles heretofore decided by this court, as decisive of that case, the inevitable inference (as I conceive) is, that the attention of the court was directed solely to the question, whether the creditor had so indulged the debtor, as to tie up his hands, and thereby injure or impair the remedies of the surety. If this inference be correct, that case will be stript of much of its force as authority even in cases whether the circumstances may be precisely the same." The principal case is also cited in the same case at pages 261, 263, 264, 265, 266.

And in Asbby v. Smith, 9 Leigh 164, where the attachment which had been levied on the goods of

into the hands of the sheriff of the county. Joseph Waller, the principal, had, at the time, personal property in his possession, amply sufficient to satisfy the whole amount of debt. And the sheriff went to his house, three days before the return day, for the purpose of levying the executions on his property then and there, with the avowed design to take it into his own keeping, when Joseph Waller prevailed on the creditors to give him a short indulgence; and they, at his instance, without the consent or knowledge of Curtis Waller, the surety, gave written instructions to the sheriff, not to levy the executions till they should see him. These were the terms of the instructions; the creditors not binding themselves to suspend proceedings for any time, but giving a mere indulgence to be determined at their own pleasure. In consequence of the instructions thus given him, the sheriff forbore to levy the executions, and made return on them, Not executed by order of the plaintiffs. Very shortly afterwards, June 7th 1822, M'Kenny's executors sued out new writs of fieri facias; but, after these new executions were put into the sheriff's hands, Joseph Waller removed the greater part of his effects out of 435 "the county and beyond the reach of the process; so that the sheriff could not find enough of his property, to satisfy the amount of the three executions. What he could find of it, he took; and then, for the residue of the debt, he levied the process on the property of Curtis Waller, the surety.

Upon this state of facts, Curtis Waller insisted, that he was, in equity, discharged from his liability for the debts, by reason of the indulgence given by the creditors to his principal, without his consent or knowl-

the principal debtor was released, which was held to discharge the surety in equity, the court said, at page 172, that the cases of M'Kenny v. Waller, and Alcock v. Hill were rendered of doubtful authority by the opinions of BROOKE and CABELL, in Chester v. Mason. But in Humphrey v. Hitt, 6 Gratt. 528, BALDWIN, J., says: "I am for adhering to the decisions of this court in M'Kenny v. Waller, 1 Leigh 434, and Alcock v. Hill, 4 Leigh 622: which have not been shaken by any subsequent adjudication; and which establish a principal that furnishes a safe and certain guide. To overrule them would give rise to much litigation: and the present case is a strong illustration of the evil. Here a surety, though cut off from no remedy, is seeking to be discharged from his obligation, by speculative opinions of witnesses as to the probability that the principal had property sufficient to discharge the debt in part. If the f. fa. had been levied, without any specification or description of the property, or any information in regard to the validity of the title."

In Coffman v. Moore, 29 Gratt. 248, it is said: "The surety has a right to stand in the shoes of the creditor in the enforcement of such securities; and the creditor, as to such securities in his hands and under his power, is considered as trustee for the surety, and if he is unfaithful, he not only fails in his duty as trustee, but violates the rights of the surety, as against his principal, and is liable for the loss which the surety thereby sustains. These principles are firmly established by repeated decisions of this court. I need only refer to the following cases: Ward v. Johnson, 6 Munf. 6; M'Kenny v. Waller, 1 Leigh 434; Alcock v. Hill, 4 Leigh 622; Humphrey v. Hitt, 6 Gratt. supra, in which JUDGE BALDWIN, with the unanimous concurrence of the other judges sitting, gives a clear and forcible exposition of the doctrines on this subject. Then follows Harnsbarger v. Kinney, 18 Gratt. 511; and the recent cases of Shannon v. McMullin, 25 Gratt. 211; Harrison v. Price, Ibid. 553." 84 S. E. Rep. 686, upon the question of the sufficiency of an officer's return of process.

edge, at a time when the principal's property was, in effect, as he alleged, in the sheriff's hands, and could not have been exempted from the executions then in force, or withdrawn beyond the reach of future process, without the voluntary permission and order of the creditors to the sheriff. And he presented his bill to the court of chancery of Fredericksburg, setting forth this equity, and praying, that M'Kenny's executors should be enjoined from further proceedings on their executions against him.

The chancellor granted the injunction: the executors of M'Kenny answered the bill: depositions were taken by both parties, and the circumstances of the case, as above stated, were clearly proved: and, upon the final hearing, the chancellor decreed that the injunction should be made perpetual. M'Kenny's executors appealed to this court.

Harrison, for the appellants, cited Norris v. Crummey, 2 Rand. 328, and Hunter's adm'rs v. Jett, 4 Rand. 104.

Briggs, for the appellee, said, that this was a peculiar case, and ought to be decided upon its own circumstances. Here, the property of the principal, and that amply sufficient to satisfy the whole debt, was, in effect, in the sheriff's hands: and he was only prevented from taking it into his own keeping, by the express instructions of the creditors; who, of their own accord, relinquished their hold upon it, and thus gave the principal debtor the opportunity, of which he availed himself, to put that very property beyond the reach of future process. It surely could not be said, 436 in this case, as was said in Peel v.

Tatlock, 1 Bos. & Pul. 422, that the favor shewn by the creditor to the principal, did not work an injury to the surety. The injury was palpable and certain.

COALTER, J., delivered the resolution of the court, that, according to the principles of the cases decided by this court on this subject, there was no ground whatever on which the decree could be supported.

The decree was reversed, the injunction dissolved, and the bill dismissed.

Harwell*, 3 Leigh 89, the principal case is cited at page 92, and it is held that an action cannot be maintained on an executor's bond, at the relation of an assignee of a legatee of a decree for a legacy, such action can only be maintained at the relation of the person who has the legal right to the debt. Also, in Poage v. Bell, 8 Leigh 604, citing Elwes," against Simms and Flournoy, for debt, interest and costs, for which Wallack had recovered judgment against them, was delivered to Beatty deputy of Tolson late sheriff of Stafford, who made the following return upon it—"By virtue of this execution, I levied, and advertised according to law, the following property, to wit, Stock of horses, cows &c. household furniture, and plantation utensils; the sale of which was prevented for want of bidders. (Signed) R. Beatty deputy for B. Tolson sheriff &c."

Upon this, a writ of venditioni exponas, dated the 18th April 1825, and returnable the first day of May term following, was sued out, and delivered to the same deputy.

This process also ran in the name of 437 Wallack, but was indorsed "for the benefit of Elwes." The deputy made the following return upon it—"Levied this execution, together with two others which had previously come to hand, on the following property, subject to sundry taxes and levies due to me, to wit, One bureau &c." (enumerating divers articles of household furniture, and one cow and nine hogs); "all of which I sold according to law, to the highest bidder, the 16th May 1825, for 130 dollars 92 cents; which sum was applied to the discharge of two executions which came to hand previously to this, namely, one in favor of the representatives of John Bronaugh, and the other in favor of Ephraim Brent; and the balance of the amount of sales is retained to satisfy in part taxes and levies due me. This execution was also levied on the following property, which could not be found on the day of sale of the above-mentioned property, to wit, Two horses &c.") enumerating a few cattle and hogs, and some farming utensils; "which, when sold, shall be applied in part thereof. I had also levied on the following, to aid in discharge of this execution, to wit, One round tea table &c." (enumerating sundry articles of furniture and plate, a few cattle, mules and sheep, and some farming utensils); "which last mentioned property I am advised has been enjoined by Mr. Brent and others, as not being liable to the discharge of the debts of the said Simms, and which I cannot sell, unless I am indemnified in the sale thereof. (Signed) R. Beatty deputy for B. Tolson sheriff &c."

Hereupon, Elwes, for whose benefit these two writs had been sued out, gave a notice, in his own name, to Mr. Tolson the sheriff, that he would move the circuit court for judgment against him, for the full amount of the debt, interest and costs, mentioned in the venditioni exponas, with 15 per cent. per ann. interest thereon from the return day thereof until paid, according to the provisions of the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 134, § 48, p. 542.* And upon the 438 motion *made by Elwes pursuant to this notice, the circuit court gave him judgment, for 180 dollars 83 cents (the amount due on the venditioni exponas) with 15 per cent. per ann. interest thereon from the return day of the writ, and the costs of the motion. From which judgment Tolson appealed to this court.

The cause was argued here, by Harrison for the appellant, and Patton for the appellee.

Several points were discussed at the bar, which the court did not find it necessary to consider or decide. Among these was the question, Whether, as the statute gives this summary remedy by motion, only in case of such returns made by the officer, as entitle the plaintiff to recover against him, in an action of debt, the debt, damages or costs, mentioned in the execution, an action of debt might have been maintained against the officer upon the returns made on the executions in this case? And Carr, J., intimated an impression, but not a decided opinion, that debt would not lie: but the point was not decided, nor did the other judges give any opinion concerning it. The case eventually turned on the question, Whether Elwes, for whose benefit the 439 execution *was sued out, as appeared by the indorsement upon it, could maintain the motion, in his own name?

Harrison insisted, that, as the statute giving this summary remedy, at once dispenses with the ordinary course of the common law, and inflicts a heavy penalty in the form of interest allowed on the debt, it ought to be construed strictly. The statute gives the motion to the creditor at whose suit the execution shall issue. Now, Wallack, not Elwes, was that creditor. He alone was the plaintiff on the record: he alone could maintain debt or scire facias on the judgment: and if a forthcoming bond had been taken, it must have been made payable to him; and he alone could have moved for an award of execution upon the principal case at page 607, it is held that the creditor qui trust cannot maintain an action at law, in his own name against a party converting the property, but the action will lie only at the suit of the trustee.

Upon the authority of the principal case it is held in Leightons v. Hinchman, 1 Gratt. 157, that an action against a high sheriff and his sureties, upon his official bond, for the misconduct of his deputy in his proceedings on an execution in his hands, must be at the relation of the plaintiff in the execution: and cannot be sustained, at the relation of the parties for whose benefit the execution is issued. The principal case is also cited in note to the same case. See monographic note on "Assignments" appended to Ragsdale v. Hagy, 9 Gratt. 409.

*The statute provides, that "If any sheriff, under sheriff or other officer, shall make return upon any writ of fieri facias or venditioni exponas, that he hath levied the debt, damages and costs, as in such writ required, or any part thereof, and shall not immediately pay the same to the party to whom the same is payable—or shall make any other return upon any such execution, as will shew that such sheriff, under sheriff or other officer, hath voluntarily and without authority omitted to levy the same, or as would entitle the plaintiff to recover from such sheriff or other officer, by action of debt, the debt, damages or costs, in such execution mentioned, and such sheriff or other officer shall not immediately pay the same to the party to whom it is payable or to his attorney—then, or in either of the said cases, it shall and may be lawful for the creditor, at whose suit such writ of fieri facias, venditioni exponas, &c. shall issue, upon a motion made in the next succeeding general court, or other court from whence such writ shall issue, to demand judgment against such sheriff, under sheriff or other officer, or the securities of either of them, or their legal representatives, jointly, for the money or tobacco mentioned in such writ, or so much as shall be returned levied on such writs of fieri facias or venditioni exponas, with interest thereon, at the rate of 15 per cent. per ann. from the return day of the execution, until the judgment shall be discharged &c."—Note in Original Edition.

it. That the execution was indorsed "for the benefit of Elwes," could not help the case. It did not appear, that that indorsement was made by Wallack or by his direction, and it might have been the act of Elwes himself; and if it was the act of Wallack, it was not an assignment of the judgment or of the execution to Elwes; and indeed, neither of them was by law assignable, nor could a court of law take any notice of such an assignment. If the return afforded any foundation at all for such a motion, there could be no doubt, that Wallack might have made it; and if so, the judgment for Elwes could present no bar to a future motion by Wallack.

Patton said, that though originally choses in action were held not assignable either in law or equity, yet the broad ground was soon taken, that all such assignments were good in equity; and then it was held at law, that though such assignments do not transfer the legal title, they transfer every thing else; that they authorise the assignee to sue in the name of the assignor, and the assignor cannot control the proceeding; that the assignor's legal right is merely subservient to the equitable right of the assignee. Garland v. Richeson, 4 Rand. 268. Our statute gives the assignee of a bond or note a right to sue in his own name, but it does not change the nature of his title, for his title is still *not a legal but only an equitable one. Ibid. In the present case, the court must intend, that the indorsement on the execution, that it was for Elwes's benefit, was made by the clerk; and that, in making it, he was governed by the record, which shewed that the suit had been prosecuted for his benefit; for such is the constant practice and course of business. And then, as Elwes was the creditor in fact, at whose suit the original writ was purchased, so he was the creditor at whose suit the executions issued. Certainly, the sheriff was bound to take notice of the indorsement, and to account to Elwes for the money. If Wallack had a right to control the execution, or to receive the money made upon it, the right of an assignee to proceed in the name of the assignor to recover the debt assigned, is reduced to nothing. Elwes was "the party to whom the money was payable," in the strictest sense of the statute in question; the party to whom the injury accrued by the failure of the sheriff to make the payment, for which the statute gives the summary remedy. Could the statute have been intended to give the remedy, not to the party injured, but to the plaintiff on the record who is not injured? The statute does not give the motion to the plaintiff on the record, but to the creditor at whose suit the execution issues. Let its language be scanned: whenever the return is such as to entitle the plaintiff to an action of debt, then, not the plaintiff, but the creditor at whose suit the execution issues, whoever he may be, may move against the delinquent officer. This motion was not a proceeding to enforce the execution of Wallack's judgment; the execution was consummated; and the motion was made to recover the money of the sheriff, for his default, by the party to whom the injury accrued.

CARR, J. At common law, we know, choses in action were not assignable; nor could courts of law formerly take any notice of the equitable where it was distinct from the legal right. Courts of equity, however, held those assignments good, and enforced them; and, in later times, courts of law have so far relaxed, as, in some instances, to notice the equitable right. Thus, they will not suffer the assignor, whose name is used by the assignee in suing, to dismiss or in any way control the suit. Again, if the real owner of the debt, though not plaintiff on the record, be indebted to the defendant, the court will allow the defendant to set-off this debt against that for which he is sued. Thus the law stands in England, where there is no law permitting the assignment of choses in action. But the courts of law have never gone so far as to suffer the assignee to institute a suit in his own name. (I am not speaking of bills of exchange assignable by the law merchant, or of promissory notes made so by the statute of Anne, but of mere choses in action as contradistinguished from commercial paper.) Our statute declares "assignments of bonds, bills and promissory notes, and other writings obligatory whatsoever, valid, and that the assignee may sue in his own name" &c. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 125, § 5, p. 484. It will be seen at once, that judgments and executions are not embraced by this statute: they, therefore, remain as at common law. And it may be laid down, as a general proposition, that in no proceeding to carry a judgment or execution into effect, can the name of the transferee be substituted for that of the plaintiff upon the record. But this proposition, deduced from the general principles of law, is still more clearly and strongly established by the particular statute under which this motion is made; by the words of which, the motion is given to the creditor at whose suit the execution shall issue. This, it seems to me, can mean no other than the plaintiff on the record. I think, therefore, this motion could not be maintained in the name of Elwes.

This point being sufficient for the reversal of the judgment, it is not necessary to give an opinion on the other points discussed at the bar.

The other judges concurred, and the judgment was reversed.

and execution were for the benefit of Howver. The sheriff levied the execution on the defendant's property, and took a forthcoming bond from him, payable, not to the plaintiffs Mays & M'Clung, but to Howver. The bond was forfeited: and Howver moved the circuit court, in his own name, for judgment and award of execution upon it; and the court awarded execution accordingly. Meze applied to this court for a supersedeas, which was allowed.

Daniel, for the plaintiff in error. The bond is naught. The statute requiring forthcoming bonds to be taken payable to the creditor, intends, that they shall be made payable to the plaintiff on the record; 1 Rev. Code, ch. 134, § 1, 15, 16, p. 524, 530. The bond must pursue the judgment and execution, otherwise it has no foundation to support it: it is, in truth, a part of the process of execution.

No counsel for the defendant in error.

PER CURIAM. The statute first provides, that all persons who recover judgment in any court of record, may, at their election, prosecute writs of fieri facias &c. and then, that if the owner of the goods (taken on a fi. fa.) shall give sufficient security to the sheriff to have the goods forthcoming at the day of sale, it shall be lawful for the sheriff to take a bond from the debtor and sureties, payable to the creditor, reciting &c. The creditor to whom the bond is to be made *payable, is the person entitled to sue out the execution; the plaintiff on the record. No other person can be known to the officer, or to the court itself, as the creditor. To no other person, then, can the bond be taken. In Downman v. Chinn, 2 Wash. 189, a forthcoming bond made payable to the sheriff, was given up, on all hands, as faulty. The judgment of the circuit court must be reversed, and the forthcoming bond quashed.

Marriage Settlement—Mortgage of Slaves Conveyed in Settlement—Statute.—Deed of marriage settlement of slaves then in Hanover, where deed was made and duly recorded: husband, entitled to and holding possession under settlement, removes with the slaves to Richmond, and there mortgages them for debt of his own, contrary to terms of the settlement, within 12 months after his removal of them: the trustee of the subject under the settlement, fails to have it recorded in Richmond, within 12 months after removal of the slaves: but within the twelve months, he files a bill in chancery against the husband and mortgagee, asserting his legal title to the slaves and the trusts of the settlement: H&Ld. the mortgagee is a purchaser with notice of settlement within 12 months after removal of slaves to Richmond, and as to him, the failure of the trustee in the deed of marriage settlement, to have it recorded in Richmond, does not make the settlement void, under statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 99, § 11, p. 364.

Same—To Husband and Wife during Life—Condition That Shall Not Be Liable to Husband's Debts—Case at Bar.—Marriage settlement of slaves to use of husband and wife during their joint lives; remainder to wife, if she survive: remainder to whomsoever the wife shall appoint, if she die before husband; remainder, in default of such appointment, to husband for life, and after, to offspring of the marriage: to the intent, that the property shall not be subject to disposal, debts, contracts or engagements of husband: H&Ld. during wife's life, the property cannot be disposed of by husband, or applied to satisfaction of his debts.

By deed of marriage settlement, between Francis Pledge and Christian Hughes, made before the marriage, and bearing date the 18th July 1820, Christian Hughes, the intended wife, conveyed to William H.

444 Hughes, five slaves, her own *property, in trust, that he should permit the said Francis and Christian, after the marriage should be solemnized, to take and enjoy all the profits and use of the property, during their joint lives; and from and after the death of the said Francis, if he should die first, then upon trust, that the said William should assign the whole property to the said Christian; and if the said Christian should die before the said Francis, then in trust for such person or persons, as she should, by will or otherwise, direct and appoint; to the intent, that the subject should not be at the disposal, or subject to the control, debts, forfeitures or engagements, of the said Francis, the intended husband; and, in default of such appointment by the wife, at her death, then in trust for the said Francis, during his life, and after his death, for their offspring. The marriage took place. The deed was duly recorded in the county court of Hanover, on the 27th July 1820, the property being at the time in that county. Pledge the husband, within two months after, removed, and brought the slaves with him, to the city of Richmond; but the deed of marriage settlement, was not recorded, either in the hustings court of Richmond or in the county court of Henrico. And by indenture, dated the 22d January 1821, and duly recorded the same day in the hustings court, Pledge, the husband, conveyed them to Riddle, in trust, to secure a debt he owed to Shippard.

Riddle being about to sell these slaves, under this deed of trust, to satisfy the debt due to Shippard, and having actually advertised them for sale, Hughes, the trustee in the marriage settlement, exhibited his bill in the superiour court of chancery of Richmond, against Pledge the husband, and the trustee Riddle, setting forth the marriage settlement, and the other facts above stated, and praying, that Riddle, the trustee for Shippard, should be enjoined from selling or otherwise interfering with the property. This bill was filed, and an injunction awarded according to the prayer of it, June 12th, 1821. And on the 22d February 1822, an amended bill was filed, making Shippard a party defendant.

445 *Shippard, in his answer, insisted, 1st, that, though the deed of marriage settlement was duly recorded in the county court of Hanover, in which county the property was at the time, yet Pledge, the husband, having the possession of it, removed, and brought it with him, to Richmond, within less than two months afterwards, and the deed was never recorded there; and, therefore, was void as to him, a purchaser for valuable consideration without notice, according to the provisions of the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 99, § 11, p. 364. And,

*The principal case is cited in Armstrong v. Pits, 13 Gratt. 243; Dowell v. Anderson, 1 Pat. & H. 194; fool-note to Mundy v. Vawter, 3 Gratt. 518. See monographic note on "Husband and Wife" appended to Cleland v. Watson, 10 Gratt. 169.

2ndly, that, at least, the interest which Pledge had, or had a right to dispose of, in the property, under the marriage settlement itself, was subject to Shippard's claim, and ought to be applied toward the satisfaction of it; namely, the use of the property during the joint lives of the husband and wife, and the contingent interest limited to the husband after the wife's death without making any appointment.

Pending this suit, Shippard on his part exhibited a bill, complaining, that Hughes and Pledge had evinced a design to remove the subject beyond the jurisdiction of the court, and praying an injunction to restrain them from doing so; which was allowed.

The two causes came on together for a final hearing, in June 1826. The chancellor held, that the case stated in Hughes's bill was not proper for relief in equity, because if he had right, he had a complete remedy at law; founding this opinion against the jurisdiction of the court, upon his understanding of the authority of the case of Bowyer v. Creigh, 3 Rand. 25. And, therefore, he dismissed that bill with costs. As to Shippard's suit, he held, that the deed of marriage settlement, not having been recorded in Richmond or Henrico, whither the slaves had been brought soon after the marriage, and where they had ever since remained, was void as against Shippard; and, therefore, he perpetuated the injunction he had granted to Shippard, and decreed a sale of the slaves to satisfy the debt for which they were mortgaged to him.

Hughes appealed to this court.

446 *Scott, for the appellant, upon the question of jurisdiction, raised in the first suit, cited Allen v. Freeland, 3 Rand. 170, Randolph v. Randolph, 6 Rand. 194, Harrison v. Sims, Id. 506, directly in point to sustain the jurisdiction.

As to the omission to have the marriage settlement recorded in Richmond or Henrico, after the subject had been brought there, he said, 1st, That this deed was a conveyance by the wife of her own property only; and whether it had been recorded at all or not, it was good against the creditors of, or purchasers from, the husband, as he was not the grantor. Pierce v. Turner, 5 Cranch 154; Land v. Jeffries, 5 Rand. 211. 2ndly, That, supposing this the case of a deed respecting the title of personal chattels, which by law ought to be recorded, yet the statute only provided, that in case the person claiming title under the deed, should permit the person in possession of the subject, to remove with it to another county, and should not within 12 months after the removal, have the deed recorded there also, the deed should be void, so long as it should not be so recorded, as to all purchasers without notice and all creditors. Now, Shippard had full notice of this marriage settlement, within the twelve months allowed for recording it in Richmond or Henrico; for the bill of Hughes, the trustee, was exhibited, and the injunction to restrain Shippard's trustee, Riddle, from selling the property, was awarded, within nine months after it was brought to Richmond.*

*There are two provisions affecting this point, in 447 *Shippard, in his answer, insists, that Pledge, the husband was entitled to an interest in the subject, under the deed of marriage settlement; and that his interest in it, at least, ought to be held liable to his debts, and subject to his disposition. But, to allow any sale or disposition of his interest to interfere with or affect the trust for the joint use of the husband and wife, during their joint lives, would be to defeat the purposes, as well as the express intent, of the settlement. Scott and wife v. Gibson & Co., 5 Munf. 86.

CABELL, J., delivered the opinion of the court. The question as to the inefficacy of the deed, depends on the construction of the 11th section of the statute of conveyances. That section allows to the person claiming title under the deed, the term of twelve months, to have the deed recorded in the court of that county or corporation, to which the property may be removed. If, therefore, the deed be recorded there, at any time within the twelve months, it will defeat any previous sale which may have been made of the property. And as the main object of recording such deeds, is to afford the means of obtaining information as to the title of the property, it would seem that, as to that object, actual notice of the deed would be as effectual as if it

448 were recorded. *Accordingly, this section of the statute, so far as relates to purchasers, makes notice of the deed equivalent to recording it; for it vacates an unrecorded deed as to such purchasers only, as are purchasers without notice. In the cases before us, it is evident, that Shippard had notice of the deed within twelve months. On this ground alone—independently of any influence which the case of Land v. Jeffries may have on this; and admitting that the deed of 18th July 1820, in order to be effectual against the creditors of the husband, ought to have been duly recorded, (as it really was) in the county

§ 4 provides, inter alia, that "all deeds of settlement upon marriage, wherein either lands, slaves, money or other personal thing, shall be settled or covenanted to be left or paid, at the death of the party or otherwise—shall be void, as to all creditors and subsequent purchasers for valuable consideration without notice, unless they shall be acknowledged or proved, and lodged with the clerk to be recorded, according to the directions of the act."

§ 11 provides, that "every deed respecting the title of personal chattels, which by law ought to be recorded, shall be recorded in the court of that county or corporation, in which such property shall remain; and if afterwards, the person claiming title under such deed, shall permit any other person in whose possession such property shall be, to remove with the same, or any part thereof, out of the county or corporation in which such deed shall be recorded, and shall not, within twelve months after such removal, cause the deed aforesaid to be certified to the court of that county or corporation, into which such other person shall have so removed, and to be delivered to the clerk to be their recorded, such deed, for so long as it shall not be recorded in such last mentioned county or corporation court, and for so much of the property aforesaid as shall have been so removed, shall be void in law, as to all purchasers thereof for valuable consideration without notice, and as to all creditors."

This last section seems intended to protect from the claim of the grantee in the deed, the creditor of, or subsequent purchasers without notice from, the person in whose possession the chattels may be, and who is permitted to remove with it into another county or corporation.—Note in Original Edition.

court of Hanover; and without considering or deciding, whether, if the husband and wife were justly entitled to the possession and use of the slaves in the deed mentioned, and removed and held possession of them in the county of Henrico and city of Richmond, the case can come within that clause of the law, which speaks of the person claiming title permitting "any other person in whose possession such property may be, to remove the same," &c. or whether, if the wife, for her sole and separate use, was entitled to the possession of the slaves, and her husband had removed them, she could be considered as permitting their removal within the meaning and intention of the act—without considering any of these points, the court is of opinion to reverse the decrees in both cases; to perpetuate the injunction in the first case, and to dissolve the injunction and dismiss the bill in the second.

October, 1829.

(Absent BROOKE, P.)

Dower—Right of Widow to Enjoy Mansion House—
Quære.—As to the extent of a widow's rights to enjoy the mansion house, messuage and plantation, free of rent till dower assigned, under the Virginia Statute of Dower, I. R. C. ch. 107, § 2, p. 403.
Same—Same—Case at Bar.—But, where a widow obtain a decree against an infant heir, directing commissioners to assign dower, which she might have had executed immediately, but did not for a year, during which she remained in the mansion house, and consented to the cultivation of the land by the agent of the heir; and after her dower was assigned, received one-third of the rents of the messuage and plantation thereto belonging, accrued before dower assigned, claiming no more at the time; and subsequently brought her action to recover the other two-thirds of the rents: HELD, she was not entitled to recover them.

Grayson and wife brought assumpsit against Moncure, in the circuit court of Stafford for money had and received by him to the use of the wife when sole. Moncure pleaded the general issue. The parties agreed the facts of the case.

Mrs. Grayson's first husband, Cary Selden, late of Stafford, died late in 1822, intestate, leaving an infant daughter (about a month old) his sole heir, and seized and possessed of a tract of 2123 acres of land, on which his dwelling or mansion house stood, and that tract of land was the plantation belonging to the mansion. Administration of Selden's estate was granted to Moncure, who, in that character, took possession of all the personal property. At the time of Selden's death, there was growing on the land a crop of wheat and hay, which was reaped in the summer of 1823; and in the spring of 1823 there was a crop of oats sown, which was also reaped in the summer of that year. These crops were made and gathered by the united force of the slaves, horses &c. of the estate, under the direction of the administrator; and he sold the crops, and accounted for and paid the widow one-third of the nett proceeds before her second marriage. The widow exhibited her bill against the infant heir, in the county court of Stafford, in chancery, at March term 1823, praying a decree for her dower; the infant *defendant by a guardian ad litem appointed by the court, immediately put in her answer; and the court forthwith made a decree, directing commissioners to lay off and assign to the widow her dower, and to take an account of the rents and profits of the land since the husband's death, one-third of which the decree adjudged to the widow. But the widow's dower was not assigned to her, in pursuance of the decree, till March 1824. Meanwhile, she continued to reside at the mansion house. In maturing, reaping and carrying the crops to market, and disposing of them, Moncure acted as administrator of Selden, and agent of his infant heir, and with the assent of the widow previously given. She now contended, that she was entitled to all the profits of the land accruing in the year 1823 previous to the actual assignment of her dower to her. Moncure, on behalf of the infant, insisted, that she was entitled to only the third part thereof, which she had received in full.

The jury found a verdict for Grayson and wife for 814 dollars, subject to the opinion of the court upon the case agreed. The court held, that the law upon the case agreed was for the defendant, and gave judgment for him; from which Grayson and wife appealed to this court.

The cause was argued here, by Harrison for the appellants, and Conway Robinson for the appellee.

The argument turned chiefly on the general question, whether a widow is entitled not only to occupy in the mansion house, but to take all the rents of the messuage or plantation thereto belonging, until her dower be in fact assigned to her, by force of the provision in the Virginia statute of dower, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 107, § 2, p. 451.

403.* But, *in the view of the court, it was not necessary to decide that point; the case, in its judgment, turning on the peculiar circumstances of it; namely, the tender infancy of the heir; the assent of the widow to the employment by the administrator of the slaves &c. of the estate, in finishing the crops; and, especially, the fact that the widow as early as March 1823 had obtained a regular decree for her dower, which it was in her power to have carried into immediate execution.

Robinson insisted, that it was the widow's own fault, that her dower was not assigned to her till March 1824; that she could not complain of the infant heir failing to do that which she had the power to have had done when she pleased; and that this was conclusive against the claim of the widow in the present case.

Harrison, on the other hand, contended that it was the duty of the heir, to assign the widow's dower, in all events: the widow has a right to remain passive; the intermediate profits are given by the statute, to

*The first section of the statute provides that the widow shall be endowed of one third of her deceased husband's lands. The second section is in these words: "And till such dower shall be assigned, it shall be lawful for her to remain and continue in the mansion house, and the messuage or plantation thereto belonging, without being chargeable to pay the heir any rent for the same: any law, usage, or custom to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding."—Note in Original Edition.

quicken the heir in discharge of the duty he owes the widow; and its provisions are plain and general, that till dower be assigned her, the widow may occupy the messuage and plantation belonging to the mansion house, without being chargeable to pay the heir any rent for the same.

CARR, J. The general question, whether a widow is entitled to all the rents, issues and profits of the mansion house and plantation thereto belonging, from the death of her husband, until dower shall be assigned to her, is a very important one, and with us, so far as I can find, new. I should, therefore, if it were necessary to decide it in this cause, regret that we have but a bare court. But I do not think such necessity exists. The parties themselves have settled the matter; and upon principles which, under the peculiar circumstances of this case, seem so just, that I feel no disposition to disturb them.

The heir, it will be remembered, was only a month old when her father died.

Her mother was her natural guardian:

452 *no other has been appointed. How, then, could dower be assigned her?

The infant could not do it: and her mother must either, as guardian, have assigned dower to herself (of which the books shew us instances) or she must have applied to a court of equity to have it assigned. She chose the latter course. Her bill was filed three or four months after her husband's death, and might have been filed at the first court of the county; and when filed, the whole business might have been done at once. It was all matter of consent: the bill, answer and decree, were all entered at the same court. The commissioners might have assigned the dower the next day. In that decretal order, made at her instance, the court directs the commissioners to ascertain the issues and profits of the land, and decide that a third shall be paid to her in respect of her dower. But this trouble she saved the commissioners, by arranging the whole matter of profits with the administrator, Moncure. To this conduct in regard to the employment of the slaves &c. on the land, in making and perfecting the crops, and carrying them to market, she gave her assent; and this agreement between them was made early in the year 1823, probably at the commencement of it. She remained in the mansion house. The crops were, under the agreement, disposed of in the latter part of that year: she was paid her share: and thus the whole contract executed. It was probably a very judicious and convenient arrangement for her: at any rate it was one which she had a right to make. It was the settlement of a doubtful claim, which is a good consideration. She got a third, which was all she would have gotten, if dower had been assigned her the day after her husband's death, and it might have been so assigned her if she had chosen. She was the natural guardian of her child; and was the only person who could move in the business. She managed it all her own way, and seems to have been well content until after her second marriage, when this suit was brought. I think the judgment must be affirmed.

The other judges concurred.

November, 1829.

Usury*—Rate Charged—Case at Bar.—In a bill for relief against usury, plaintiff charges usury exacted at rate of two and a half or three per cent. per month; defendant, in his answer, admits he exacted usury, but says he does not remember the rate; and there is no proof to ascertain the rate: Held, that in this state of case, the court should consider the rate of usury two and a half per cent. per month.

Alexander Fulcher exhibited his bill in the superiour court of chancery of Richmond, against Baker and Bell, setting forth, that he had given his note for 200 dollars to Baker, and that the note was tainted with exorbitant usury, Baker having extorted from him, from time to time, on successive renewals of the note, a premium for forbearance, at the rate of "two and a half or three per cent. per month, he did not recollect which;" and that Baker had assigned this usurious note to Bell, who had instituted a suit upon it, which he had prosecuted to a judgment on a forthcoming bond. The bill prayed an injunction to stay proceedings on the judgment at law, and relief from the usury.

The injunction was awarded.

Baker, in his answer, said, that the debt was originally due to him from Joseph Fulcher, who had put the amount into the plaintiff Alexander's hands, to be paid over to him; that the plaintiff applied this money to his own use; and that the defendant, upon the plaintiff's own voluntary proposition, did, upon some (but not upon all) renewals of the note, which the plaintiff gave him for the debt, receive more than the legal rate of interest for forbearance; but he did not disclose the precise rate of the usury.

Bell, the assignee, denied all notice of the usury; and stated, that the note was transferred to him for a valuable consideration; and that after it came into his hands, he had given Fulcher a long indulgence for the debt, at his request, and upon his promise, if he failed to pay it before a time agreed upon, to confess judgment; that Fulcher had accordingly confessed the judgment at law; and, therefore,

454 *Bell insisted, that Fulcher had no claim to relief in equity as against him.

Chancellor Taylor directed a commissioner to ascertain, if practicable, the balance of principal due on the note; that is, in effect, to ascertain what usury had been paid to Baker; and to ascertain also, what consideration Bell had given Baker for the note; for which purposes, he directed that the parties should be examined, by the commissioner, in solemn form.

The commissioner reported, that both defendants had attended him; that Bell gave Baker 150 dollars for the note; but that he could get no information, by which he could ascertain the balance of principal due thereon, or the rate of usury that had been stipulated or paid.

Hereupon, the chancellor, finding he could get no certain information, upon which to adjust the rights of the parties, dissolved the injunction, and dismissed the bill. And Fulcher appealed to this court.

Lyons for the appellant; R. C. Nicholas for the appellees.

PER CURIAM. Decree reversed, and cause remanded to the court of chancery for further proceedings to be had therein, in which the appellant Fulcher, in the absence of other proof than that now in the record, should be credited with two and a half per cent. per month (alleged in his bill to have been paid by him, on the renewal of the notes) from the date of the first note to the date of the note on which the judgment enjoined was rendered, and that the injunction should be made perpetual as to that sum, and dissolved as to the balance if any balance should remain.

November, 1829.

Verdict—Separation of Jury before Rendering—Effect.*

—In assumpsit against an administrator issues are joined upon pleas of non assumpsit and fully administered; the jury, after retiring from the bar, without leave of court or consent of parties, separated and dispersed, and afterwards rendered verdict for defendant: HOLD, verdict ought for that cause to be set aside.

In an action of assumpsit, in the county court of Hanover, brought by Dunn & Co. against Anderson administrator of Howle, upon the assumpsit of the intestate, wherein issues were made up upon the pleas of non assumpsit and fully administered, the jury found a verdict for the defendant. The plaintiffs moved the court to set the verdict aside, and direct a new trial, upon the ground, "that, after the jury had retired from the bar, and before they rendered their verdict, they had left the jury room and dispersed over the court-yard, during a temporary recess of the court: but the court overruled the motion, and gave judgment for the defendant. The plaintiffs took the exceptions; and prayed and obtained a supersedeas from the circuit court of the county; which reversed the judgment, set aside the verdict, and remanded the cause to the county court, for a new trial to be had therein. And then Anderson appealed to this court.

Daniel, for the appellant, remarked that the bill of exceptions did not state, whether the jury had separated before or after they had agreed on a verdict: for aught that appeared, they might not have separated till after the verdict was agreed on. The court ought to take the case most strongly against the party who took the exception. The rules touching the conduct of juries, were formerly very strict; but they are now so modified, that the ease and comfort of the jury may be favoured, so far as indulgence is not dangerous to the fair administration of justice; and there are cases of acknowledged misbehaviour in the jury, for which they are liable to be fined, that will not vitiate their verdict, the party for whom it is given not being guilty of 456 *any misbehaviour himself. The mere separation of the jury, in a civil case like this, ought not to affect the verdict, especially as it does not appear, that the separation took place before the verdict was agreed on. He cited Cq. Litt. 227, b.; 3 Com. Dig. Enquest; F. pp. 563, 4; 6 Id. Pleader, Verdict; S. 45, 46, pp. 259, 261; Lester v. Stanley, 3 Day 287, and Howard v. Cobb, Id. 310, cases in which the verdict was set aside because of the separation of the jury, but it was separation before the verdict. State v. Babcock, 1 Conn. Rep. 401; Branden v. Grannis, Id. 402, in note; Brown v. M'Connel, 1 Bibb 265; 7 Bac. Abr. Verdict, H. pp. 10, 12, and the case there cited of Ld. St. John v. Abbot, Barnes 441.

Lyons, for the appellee, said it was misbehaviour in the jury to separate without leave of the court or consent of the parties, before verdict rendered; and, obviously, misbehaviour of a kind to expose a jury to improper influence. The only way to correct the evil of such misbehaviour, and to preserve the purity of jury trial, was to set aside the verdict. He cited Pleasants v. Ross, 1 Wash. 156; Hale v. Cove, 1 Str. 642; Metcalfe v. Deane, Cro. Eliz. 189; Id. 411; Baine v. Chambers, 1 Serg. & Rawle 169. He observed, that the law of Virginia was so jealous of the undue influence of conversations between the jury and others, that it expressly prohibited the sheriff from conversing with any juror, but by order of the court, after the jury have retired from the bar; 1 Rev. Code, ch. 75, § 16, p. 267.

PER CURIAM. The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

Verdict—Separation of Jury before Rendering.—In Ragland v. Wills, 6 Leigh 6, it is said, there remains to be noticed one case in this court, Howle v. Dunn, 1 Leigh 455. There, a motion was made for a new trial, on the ground, that after the jury had retired from the bar, and before they had rendered their verdict, they had left the jury room and dispersed from the court yard. The county court overruled a motion for a new trial and upon appeal to the circuit court the judgment was reversed, and the verdict set aside, which judgment was affirmed by this court. That case differed from the case at bar, inasmuch as, there, it did not appear whether the jury had agreed on their verdict, before their dispersion: here it was agreed on, written and signed. The present case, therefore, and the decision here made, will not, of necessity, overrule that. And on page 7 of the same case, TUCKER, P., says that the case at bar is clearly distinguishable from Howle v. Dunn, on the grounds aforesaid. On the same question the principal case is cited in Thompson v. Com., 8 Gratt. 648.

Executors and Administrators—Bill for Account—Laches.—In Hillis v. Hamilton, 10 Gratt. 304, it is said by SAMUELS, J., adhering to the decisions of this court and approving of the reasons upon which they are founded in the cases of Todd v. Moore, 1 Leigh 457, and Carr v. Chapman, 5 Leigh 164. I am of opinion to reverse the decree and dismiss the bill because of the staleness of the demand asserted. If anything else were needed to justify this conclusion it would be founded in the presumption that the claimants' demand has already been paid. the sale and purchase of the slave: the adm'r M. lives till 1822: and after his death T. and wife exhibit a bill against his representative, praying a settlement of M.'s administration account, in chancery, impeaching the sale and purchase of the slave in 1797, as irregular and illegal, and praying decree for the slave and her increase and for profits: HELD, this bill was rightly dismissed by the chancellor.

This was a bill exhibited by Todd and wife against Avery the administrator of Moore, in the superiour court of chancery of Richmond, setting forth, That Mrs. Todd was the only child of J. T. Lee, who died in 1795. That in the same year, administration of Lee's estate was granted to Moore, by the county court of Prince George. That he returned an inventory and appraisement of his intestate's chattels, but never settled his accounts of administration; and that he was indebted to the estate. That he permitted the sheriff to sell a female slave, named Eve, under execution for a debt due from the estate, at a time when he was himself indebted to the estate, on his account of administration, to a greater amount than would have satisfied the execution; and purchased the slave himself at the sheriff's sale, and continued, ever afterwards, to hold her and her increase now thirteen in number. The bill prayed, an account of Moore's administration of Lee's estate, and a decree for the balance which should appear due; that the sale of Eve should be set aside; that that slave and her increase should be decreed to Todd and wife, and that an account should be taken of their profits, and the amount thereof also decreed to them.

458 *Avery answered, that his intestate Moore had early settled his accounts of administration of Lee's estate, before commissioners of the county court of Prince George, and the account had been reported to the county court; but owing (as he believed) to the negligence of the clerk, it has never been recorded, and was now lost or mislaid. That his account was fair and just; and Moore had paid the balance to Mrs. Todd, or her guardian. That at the time of the sale of Eve, under execution, the administrator Moore had no other assets of his testator's estate applicable to the debt; that the sale of Eve was therefore unavoidable; and that the purchase by Moore was perfectly fair, and the proceeds all accounted for.

Chancellor Taylor ordered Avery to render an account before a commissioner of the court, of his intestate Moore's administration of Lee's estate.

Avery appearing before the commissioner to render an account, produced an office copy of the account, which had been taken before the commissioners of the county court, and which was supposed to have been lost or mislaid in the clerk's office of Prince George, but had been recently found on record there. This account had been audited and returned as early as the year 1801, and it fully sustained Avery's answer. But the commissioner, by restating the account, and charging interest from the proper dates, (as he supposed) which were anterior to those from which the county commissioners had computed it, shewed, that, at the date of the sale of the slave Eve, there was a balance due from Moore the administrator, very nearly though not quite equal to the debts for which that slave was taken in execution and sold. The commissioner reported, that Moore had paid the guardian of Mrs. Todd, the full balance reported by the county commissioners.

The sheriff's sale of the slave Eve, and Moore's purchase of her, took place in 1797. There was nothing unfair in the sale itself. But, according to the depositions of two witnesses, Moore acknowledged 459 at the time that he was *indebted to his intestate's estate, and said, that he permitted the sale, and made the purchase, to save the property for the infant distributee, Mrs. Todd, who was his niece; and that when she should attain to full age or marry, it would be delivered to her. She married Todd in 1810, while she was yet an infant; and Todd was very soon afterwards informed of every fact concerning Moore's purchase of Eve and advised to bring a suit; but, though Moore lived till 1822, Todd and wife never asserted any claim against him in his lifetime: the bill in this case, was exhibited against his administrator, soon after his death, viz. in 1823.

The chancellor, upon the final hearing, dismissed the bill, with costs: and Todd and wife appealed to this court.

Spooner, for the appellants, endeavoured to shew, from the state of the accounts, that Moore was indebted to his intestate Lee's estate, in a balance sufficient to pay the debts for which the slave Eve was sold under execution in 1797, and ought to have paid those debts, and prevented the sale: and for that reason, if for no other, he ought to be regarded as a trustee of this property for the distributee. He was an administrator too, purchasing at a sheriff's sale, property belonging to his intestate's estate; and could not, any more than any other trustee, or in any other mode of sale, purchase the trust subject for his own benefit: in this view also, he ought to be regarded as a trustee for the distributee. Finally, Moore himself understood the transaction in the same light, and declared that he purchased for the benefit of the distributee. His subsequent assertion of a right to hold the property for himself, was a breach of trust, and a fraud. No lapse of time could give sanction to such a right, or bar the just claims of the cestui que trust; especially, as she had been, all the time, under the disability first of infancy, and then of coverture. He cited Redwood v. Riddick, 4 Munf. 222; Hunter's ex'ors v. Spotswood, 1 Wash. 145.

460 *Shanda, for the appellee, insisted, that the administration account, regularly audited and settled by the commissioners of the county court in 1801, ought not, at this late day, and under the circumstances of the case, to be opened; and that, if it were proper to open it, it was correctly stated: And this account shewed the perfect fairness of Moore's conduct. He examined the evidence; and controverted the proof of Moore's declaration that he purchased the slave Eve for the benefit of the distributee; but, it was in proof, that Todd was informed of the evidence now adduced of this declaration of Moore, and of every other fact of the transaction, soon after his marriage in 1810, and yet he never asserted this claim during the twelve years that Moore lived; a plain proof, that he himself had no confidence in its justice. To shew the impropriety of opening the accounts, he cited Hudson & al. v. Hudson's ex'or, 3 Rand. 117. As to the purchase by the administrator himself, of the property of his intestate, fairly made, at a sheriff's sale, at a time when there was no money in his hands to pay the debts for which such property was taken in execution; he cited Anderson & al. v. Fox, 2 Hen. & Munf. 245, to shew that such purchase could not be impeached. And, surely, after the long acquiescence of the appellants in these transactions, and that with full knowledge of every fact on which they now rely; coming at this late day, into a court of equity, to assert a claim against Moore's administrator, which they never ventured to assert against him in his lifetime; they could have no right to the relief they ask. See Sugd. law of Vend. ch. 14, § 2, III., pp. 483, 4.*

CARR, J., recapitulated the facts, and said, he was of opinion, that the decree dismissing the bill was right. It is due to the quiet of families, and to justice, that the old settlements should be suffered to sleep in their graves, and not be dug up, to frighten and disturb the descendants 461 of *those who were parties. Lee died in 1795. In the same year, Moore qualified as his administrator: and he lived till 1822. Mrs. Todd married in 1810; and in that year, her husband was told all the facts concerning the sale of Eve, and that he ought then to sue; yet this suit was not brought till late in 1823, thirteen years after, and after Moore the administrator had died. He could probably have explained many things which now have a bad appearance. The slave Eve was bought in 1797. Ever since that time, she and her increase have been at the risk of the purchaser: if all of them had died, his would have been the loss. He had them twenty-six years, before this suit was brought, and thirteen years after the present plaintiff knew the facts, and ought to have sued: all this time, he has been the insurer of their lives. And now it is asked, of equity, that he shall restore the slave and her thirteen children and pay hires for them. I am against the whole bill; and think (as lord Hardwicke said, in a case not stronger) that it would be setting the worst example, that could be set, for the disturbance of families, to encourage such attempts.

The other judges concurred, and the decree was affirmed.

November, 1829.

Forthcoming Bond—Motion for Award of Execution on Particular Ground Overruled—Reversal of Judgment.—Where county court overrules motion for award of execution on forthcoming bond, on particular ground, which renders all other defence unnecessary, and this judgment is reversed by circuit court for error in the particular point: HOLD. circuit court ought not to proceed to award of execution immediately, without giving defendant opportunity to make other defence, unless it appear from record he had no other defence to make.

Same—Same—Appeal.—Where county court overrules motion for award of execution on forthcoming bond, and circuit court reverses this judgment and awards execution, an appeal lies from such judgment of circuit court, as of right; aliter, where circuit court affirms judgment of county court awarding execution, or itself gives original judgment awarding execution, on such bond.

A fieri facias, dated November 18th 1826, and returnable the second Monday in January following, was sued out by Leitch & Co. against Anderson, upon a judgment of the county court of Buckingham, and delivered to the sheriff of the county; who returned it with the following indorsement and return thereon, viz. "Came to hand November 20, 1826"—"January 6th 1827, levied on two negro men Edmund and Spencer, the property of Anderson; forthcoming bond taken and forfeited." The forthcoming bond was dated January 6th, and the day appointed in the condition for the delivery of the property for sale, was February 14th 1827; and it was returned with the execution, indorsed "February 14th 1827, forfeited." Leitch & Co. gave a regular notice to Anderson and his sureties in the forthcoming bond of a motion to be made at the ensuing April term of county court, for an award of execution thereupon, upon the trial of which, the sheriff was allowed to amend his return on the fieri facias, by striking out the last two words "and forfeited," upon condition that such amendment should not affect the motion then pending. The county court overruled the motion for award of execution on the bond. Leitch & Co. appealed to the circuit court of Buckingham; which reversed the judgment of the county court, and proceeded 463 itself to give judgment awarding execution *on the bond. Anderson prayed the circuit court to allow him an appeal from its judgment; which that court, considering that it could not allow an appeal in such a case, § refused to allow. And then Anderson applied to this court for a supersedeas, which was granted.

CABELL, J., delivered the resolution of the court. The record shews, plainly enough, the grounds of the judgment of the county court, viz. that according to the original return of the sheriff on the execution, it appeared that the forthcoming bond, taken under that execution, was forfeited on the 6th January 1827, whereas the bond on which the motion was made, could not have been forfeited sooner than the 14th February 1827, that being the day on which the property was to be delivered to the sheriff; and, consequently, it did not appear, that there was any execution to justify the taking of the bond on which the motion was made. And although the court, before it pronounced judgment in the case, permitted the sheriff to amend his return on the execution, by striking from it the words "and forfeited;" yet it considered, that that amendment, not having been made until after notice given and proved on the motion, ought not to affect the judgment to be given under a notice.

If the return of the sheriff were susceptible of the construction put upon it by the county court, the judgment of that court would be correct. But it cannot admit of that construction. The date mentioned in the return (January 6th 1827) refers to the time when the execution was levied, and when the bond was taken; and not to the time when the bond was forfeited. The forfeiture of the bond was, of necessity, posterior in point of time. The return was correct and required no amendment.

464 The county court ought, *therefore, to have awarded an execution on the bond, unless the defendants had shewn some valid objection thereto.

But the circuit court, although it correctly reversed the judgment of the county court, committed an error in the judgment which it proceeded to render. The cases of Irrin, Galt & Co. v. Eldridge, 1 Wash. 162, and Lewis v. Thompson, 2 Hen. & Munf. 104, shew, that a superior court in reversing a judgment of an inferior court which overruled a motion for award of execution on a forthcoming bond, ought not to give final judgment for award of execution, where the motion had been overruled by the inferior court, on a ground, which rendered it unnecessary for the defendant, in the inferior court, to give evidence of payments, or make any other objections than those involved in the opinion of the inferior court; unless, indeed, the record shews that the defendants had no such evidence, and no such objections. In the case before us, it is possible that the defendants may have made payments, or may have had other objections than those founded on the sheriff's first return on the execution.

The plaintiff in error was also entitled to an appeal, as a matter of right; for the inhibition of arbitrary appeals from judgments of the circuit courts, applies only to original judgments rendered by those courts awarding executions on forthcoming bonds, or to judgments affirming judgments of inferior courts that had awarded such executions, not to a judgment like the present, by which a judgment of the county court, overruling a motion for award of execution, is reversed by the circuit court, and award of execution is then adjudged by the circuit court.

The judgment of the circuit court is therefore reversed, with costs; and the cause is remanded to the circuit court for that court to proceed to judgment on the bond, when the plaintiff in error and his sureties are to be at liberty to oppose the same by proof of payment, or by other legal objections than those founded on the sheriff's original return on the execution.

at which period, I wish James to have all the stock, and Polly the house that is to be left to Amy her life. If Amy and James should die I wish Polly and Ned to have the stock and house."

The will was signed but not sealed by the testator; and was proved by four witnesses to be wholly in his handwriting, and was thereupon recorded, in the hustings court of Richmond, at October term 1819; and Shiphard, the executor therein named, duly qualified as such, according to law.

By deed, dated January 4, 1820, Shiphard, the executor, in pursuance of "the especial desire and direction of his testator, in his will expressed, emancipated and set free the woman Amy, free from the claims of any and all persons whatever claiming by through or under him as executor &c." By another deed of the same date, he emancipated and set free James, the child of Amey. And by another deed, dated January 6, 1820, he emancipated and set free Ned the brother of Amey. Neither of these deeds of the executor was recorded, according to the provisions of the statute.*

467 "At May term 1821, of the hustings court of Richmond, one Mitchell recovered a judgment against Shiphard the executor of Campbell for 575 dollars, with interest and costs, to be levied of assets quando acciderint; and this judgment was assigned to the appellant Dunn. At November term 1822, upon a scire facias suggesting assets, judgment was recovered for the debt, interest and costs, to be levied de bonis testatoris. In December 1822, May 1823, and June 1824, writs of fieri facias were sued out in Mitchell's name, without effect: the last of them was returned nulla bona. In May 1826, another writ of fieri facias was sued out, and levied on the appellees, Amey, James and Ned, as goods of the testator liable to be taken to satisfy his debts.

Hereupon, Amey, James and Ned, exhibited their bill in the superiour court of chancery of Richmond, setting forth the facts above stated; and alleging, that personal and real estate of the testator had come to the hands of the executor, amply sufficient to pay all his debts, without touching the slaves which he bequeathed to be emancipated; that the executor, sensible of this, had early assented to this legacy of freedom, by his deeds of emancipation, and they had enjoyed their freedom for more than six years, unmolested; that all the other estate of the testator, real and personal, should be exhausted, before they should be sold into slavery to pay the debts. The judgment creditors, Mitchell, and Dunn, the assignee of the judgment, and Shiphard, the executor, were made parties defendants; and the bill prayed that Shiphard should be ordered to render an 468 account of *his administration; that the real estate remaining unsold, should be sold, and that the proceeds of the real, as well as of the personal estate, should be applied to the satisfaction of the debt, for their relief; that meantime, the creditors should be enjoined from proceeding to make sale of the plaintiffs as slaves; and general relief.

The injunction was awarded May 23, 1826, upon condition that the plaintiffs should remain in custody of the officer, till otherwise ordered by the chancellor.

Dunn, in his answer, insisted, that the plaintiffs, if they had right, had a complete remedy at law, and therefore the case was not properly relievable in equity: and, further, that the will of Campbell did not emancipate the slaves in question; that the deeds of the executor were ineffectual to emancipate them, because they were not recorded according to the statute; and that if they were emancipated, they were yet subject to the testator Campbell's debts by the express provisions of the statute: that, as to the six years' freedom they had enjoyed, they claimed that state under unrecorded deeds which could not confer freedom; and, by failing to record the deeds, had contrived to remain in Virginia, unquestioned, contrary to the laws which forbid any slaves emancipated to remain here more than a year; their residence was a fraud upon the law; and if they were emancipated, they were for this cause liable to be sold by the officers of the commonwealth, for the benefit of the literary fund: Nevertheless, if there was any other property of the testator Campbell, applicable to this debt, and sufficient for the payment of it, the defendant would gladly take his satisfaction out of that; but he knew of none.

Mitchell answered, that the judgment had been assigned to Dunn for valuable consideration; and insisted on the legal rights of the creditors of Campbell, to demand satisfaction out of his property, whatever disposition he might make of it by his will.

At June term 1826, before the executor, Shiphard, had answered, the other defendants moved the court to dissolve 469 *the injunction. Chancellor Taylor was of opinion, that the plaintiffs were emancipated by Campbell's will, which was duly recorded: that the executor's deed of emancipation were only evidence of his solemn assent to this legacy of freedom: that the first judgment of Mitchell against the executor, was recovered in May 1821, after the actual emancipation, and was a judgment of assets quando acciderint; so that the creditors, as well as executor, then considered the plaintiffs free; that the creditors had allowed them to enjoy their freedom undisturbed for five years; and the time which had thus elapsed, if it was not in itself a complete bar to the proceeding of the defendants, yet taken in

*The statutory provisions affecting this case, are the 53d and 54th sections of the statute concerning slaves, free negroes and mulattoes (1 Rev. Code. ch. 111, pp. 433, 4), which are as follows:

"§ 53. It shall be lawful for any person, by his or his last will and testament, or by any other instrument in writing, under his or her hand and seal, attested and proved, in the county or corporation court, by two witnesses, or acknowledged by the party in the court of the county where he or she resides, to emancipate and set free his or her slaves, or any of them, who shall thereupon be entirely and fully discharged from the performance of any contract entered into during servitude, and enjoy as full freedom as if they had been particularly named and freed by this act."

"§ 54. Provided, nevertheless, That all slaves so emancipated shall be liable to be taken by execution, to satisfy any debt contracted by the person emancipating them, before such emancipation is made."—Note in Original Edition.

connexion with the statutes on the subject, and in aid of the other circumstances of the case, was a protection to the plaintiffs: and that the plaintiffs would have had a right to be discharged upon habeas corpus. Therefore, he overruled the motion to dissolve the injunction, declared the plaintiffs free, and ordered, that they should be discharged; and, being under an impression that they had not been properly advised as to their duty to remove from the state, he gave them six months from the date of the decree, to remove &c.

Dunn prayed an appeal from the decree, which the chancellor refused to allow; but on his petition, an appeal was allowed him by a judge of this court.

Daniel, for the appellant, contended, 1. That if the appellees claimed freedom under Campbell's will taken alone, the will was not so made or so proved as to confer freedom, since the statute required, that such a will, in like manner as any other instrument of emancipation, should be sealed and proved by two witnesses, meaning attesting witnesses. 2. That if the will was duly made and recorded, yet it did not of itself emancipate the slaves; it only directed the executor to emancipate them; and rightly left the act to be done by him, for it depended on the situation of the estate with respect to creditors to be as-470 certain by the executor, *whether any act of emancipation could avail.

3. That the appellees must claim under the deeds of the executor; and these deeds not being recorded, were wholly nugatory; Givens v. Manns, 6 Munf. 191; Lewis v. Fullerton, 1 Rand. 15. But, 4. Whether they were emancipated or not, and if emancipated, whether by the testator's will, or by the executor's deeds, they were, by the express provision of the 54th section of the statute, liable for the testator's debts, and liable too, to be taken in execution to satisfy them; which differed this case from the common case of a specific legacy assented to by an executor and in the legatee's hands, which creditors could only reach with the aid of a court of chancery. 5. That, as to the lapse of time, that could not affect the case; there was no such lapse of time as barred the creditor's remedy against Campbell's estate, and these appellees were, so far as creditors are concerned, part of his estate, and liable for any claim for which any other part of it was liable. 6. He questioned the jurisdiction of the chancellor to interpose in such a case as this, where there was a plain remedy at law; since, if the appellees were emancipated, at all, whether by the will or by the executor's deeds, their right to freedom was a legal right, which required no assistance from equity.

Scott, for the appellees, said, that though a will emancipating slaves ought to be duly made and duly proved and recorded, yet it was to be made and proved like other wills; and, in Virginia, even a will of lands need not be attested by subscribing witnesses, if proved to be wholly in the testator's hand-writing, as was the case here: the sealing of the act of emancipation, and the proof by two witnesses is only required where the emancipation is by deed. He insisted, that the appellees were emancipated by the will; for the will contained devises and bequests to them as free persons. The executor was only to give them the formal instrument, which should signify his assent to the legacy; and, as he ought to have had this instrument recorded, 471 that *very defect was properly relievable in equity, and was enough of itself to give the court of chancery jurisdiction. But there could be no question as to the jurisdiction: the chancellor may interfere to prevent a sale of slaves under execution, at the instance of the owner complaining that they are not liable for the debt; much more may he interfere to prevent the sale of persons claiming to be free. But these people, though completely and regularly emancipated, were yet liable to the claim of the appellant against their testator, unless by his own conduct he had lost his right to hold them subject to the claim. He first took a judgment against the executor when assets, in May 1821. Upon a sci. fa. suggesting assets, he recovered judgment de bonis testatoris, in November 1822; and, instead of diligently pursuing the executor, and charging him and his sureties with a devastavit, he waited till June 1826, and then levied his execution on these persons, who had been actually free ever since January 1820. Meantime, the executor, who ought to pay the debt, may have become insolvent; and the appellant who ought to have anticipated such insolvency by the diligence of his proceedings, ought to bear the loss of his debt, rather than that the appellees, who could take no steps against the executor, should sustain the loss of their freedom.

CABELL, J., delivered the opinion of the court. It was, unquestionably, the intention of the testator Campbell to emancipate the appellees; and his will is sufficient for that purpose, although it is not sealed. It is not important to inquire, whether the will, ipso facto, emancipated the appellees, or whether that object remained to be accomplished by formal deeds to be executed by the executor. For the mere intention of the testator that the executor should emancipate them, conferred a right to freedom, which, though it could not be asserted in a court of law, ought to be enforced in a court of equity. Dempsey v. Lawrence, Gilm. 333.

472 *But the right to emancipate slaves is subordinate to the obligation to pay debts previously contracted, by the express provisions of the statute. Admitting, therefore, that the will, in this case, conferred as perfect an emancipation as any known to our laws, still the appellees remained liable to the payment of Campbell's debts; and although the assent of the executor to their emancipation, might possibly protect them from an execution at law (a point which need not be decided) in like manner as his assent to the bequest of a personal chattel, would exempt that chattel from a similar execution, yet the assent of an executor to any legacy, can never defeat the right of a creditor to pursue, in a court of equity, the assets of a testator, in the hands of the legatee, if necessary for the payment of his debts.

In this case, therefore, an account ought to be taken of the assets, both real and personal, of Campbell, (for we are of opinion, that the will subjected the real estate to the payment of his debts,) and of the administration thereof by the executor; and if it shall appear that the debts of the testator can be satisfied without resort to the value of the appellees, then the appellees should be considered and declared free; but if that cannot be wholly accomplished, then the appellees should be sold for such term of years as may be sufficient to raise the adequate fund; as was directed in the case of Patty v. Colin, 1 Hen. & Munf. 519.

The decree of the chancellor is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded to be proceeded in according to the principles here declared.

November, 1829.

Pleading—Pleas—Rejected When Object Is Delay—Case at Bar.—In debt against an ex'or after judgment by default duly entered, at the next term, defendant tenders four good pleas in bar, to all which plaintiff instanter puts in proper replications tendering issues; but defendant refuses to join the issues, or to rejoin, or to demur; whereupon the court rejects defendant's pleas and proceeds to judgment: Held, under the circumstances, the pleas were rightly rejected.

Same—Same—Issuable—Case at Bar.—In debt against an ex'or defendant pleads that his testator was in his lifetime guardian of an infant, that accounts of the guardianship had been settled by county court commissioners, which shewed a large balance due to the ward, and that this was a debt of higher dignity than that claimed by plaintiff: Held, this was not an issuable plea.

Debt on bond, for 6000 dollars, by Woodlief against Cocke executor of Wyatt, in the circuit court of Prince George. Judgment by default having been regularly entered and confirmed at the rules, Cocke at the next term, demurred to the declaration generally, and tendered five special pleas. 1st, One plea was, that his testator Wyatt, in his lifetime, qualified as guardian of one G. W. Wyatt in Dinwiddie county court, and that since his death, the accounts of the guardianship had been sent to a commissioner in chancery to be examined and audited, and that the commissioner had reported a balance due from the testator to his ward, of 8000 dollars which was a debt of superiour dignity to that claimed by Woodlief. This plea was rejected by the court, as not being an issuable plea. 2dly, He tendered a plea of payment: 3dly, No assets: 4thly, Fully administered: 5thly, A judgment debt of superiour dignity, and no assets beyond what was required to discharge it. The four last pleas were regular, and concluded with a verification. Woodlief replied to each, severally, denying the matters pleaded, and concluding to the country. But Cocke refused either to make up issues, by adding the similitur to the replications, or to demur; and thereupon the court refused to allow the pleas to be put in; and, overruling the demurrer to the declaration, proceeded to give judgment for the plaintiff for the debt &c. Cocke appealed to this court.

474 *Allison, for the appellant, made a faint effort to sustain the plea, which was rejected by the circuit court, as not being issuable. And, as to the rest, he said, that Woodlief having tendered issues, in all the replications, he might himself have added the mere form of the similitur, and thus have made up the issues, or he might have gone to trial, and if he obtained a verdict, that would have cured the want of the similitur. Brewer v. Tarpley, 1 Wash. 363. The court ought not, therefore, on account of the obstinacy of the defendant or of his counsel, which produced no hindrance or delay of justice, and not the least inconvenience to the plaintiff, to have deprived the party of the benefit of pleas, acknowledgedly good in form and substance.

Spooner, for the appellee, said that the plea rejected by the court, was rightly rejected: it was not an issuable plea: it did not aver, either that there had been any judgment or decree for the debt therein mentioned, or that it had been paid, or that it was in fact due, or that there were no assets beyond what was necessary to satisfy it. Wyche v. Macklin, 2 Rand. 426; 1 Chitt. Plead. 485; 2 Id. 454-8; 1 Wms. Saund. 333, n. 7. In respect to the other point, he said the object of the defendant in refusing to make up the issues, most plainly, was delay; and his conduct could not be countenanced by the court. He cited Nadenbousch v. M'Rea, Gilm. 228; Petrie v. Fitzroy, 5 T. R. 152; 1 Sellon's Prac. 345.

The demurrer to the declaration was not mentioned in the argument: the declaration was clearly good.

PER CURIAM. The appellant's object in the court below, and his only object, was, unquestionably, delay; his conduct can be ascribed to no other motive. And, considering the time at which he tendered his pleas, when it was in the sound discretion of the court, to admit them, if necessary to the justice of the case, or to reject them if they were not issuable, or if they were 475 obviously designed to produce embarrassment *or delay, the court, under the circumstances, by which delay manifestly appeared to be intended, did right to resort to the rigour of the rule, and to reject them all. Downman v. Downman, 1 Wash. 27. It is clear from Nadenbousch v. M'Rea, that the replications did not of themselves make up the issue. In Petrie v. Fitzroy, which was an action of debt on a bond, there was a plea and replication, and there being no rejoinder, the plaintiff took judgment by default, as for want of a plea, not of a rejoinder: And the question, in effect, was, whether upon the failure of the defendant to rejoin, the plaintiff had a right to strike out the proceedings already entered, and to sign judgment. It was argued, that here was a plea, and then a replication, and that a subsequent default in not answering the replication, could not destroy the plea so previously put in. But the court said, "The master says, that, in such cases, it is the practice to strike out all the pleadings; and, in truth, if the defendant do not rejoin, it is considered as an abandonment of the plea." And so the practice is now settled:

*The principal case is cited in foot-notes to Downman v. Downman, 1 Wash. 27; Nadenbousch v. M'Rea, Gilm. 228.

Bury v. Bishop, 1 Wms. Saund. 318; Tidd's Prac. 439; Archibold's Prac. 126. In the case before us, the court advised the party either to make up the issues by adding the similiter to the replications, or to demur to them; he would do neither. The judgment is to be affirmed.

Hawkins v. Gibson.

November, 1829.

Affidavits—Bail—Whether Should Be in Writing.—Semble an affidavit before a justice to found an order requiring bail ought to be in writing.
Same—Same—Filing with Process—Quere. Whether such affidavit ought to be filed with the process.
Bail—When Motion to Discharge Is Too Late.—After judgment by default and writ of inquiry awarded, and after the defendant has left the state: HELD, a motion to discharge the bail comes too late.
Same—Proper Proceeding to Discharge.—To obtain an order to discharge bail, the proper course of proceeding is by rule to show cause why the bail should not be discharged.

Gibson brought assumpsit against Homer in the hustings court of Richmond. And, on the capias ad respondendum, which was dated the 5th June 1822, and returnable to the ensuing August term, an alderman of the city indorsed an order requiring appearance bail, in the following words: "June 6th 1822. Upon proper affidavit made before me, the sergeant will hold the within named M. Homer to bail, in the sum of 150 dollars." Homer was arrested, and Hawkins became bound as his appearance bail. The process was duly returned. But the affidavit, upon which the order of the alderman requiring bail, was founded, was not returned or filed; nor did it appear whether the affidavit was in writing or not. Gibson filed his declaration at the October rules 1822; and the defendant failing to appear, judgment by default was entered at the rules, against him and Hawkins as his appearance bail; which, at the November rules, was confirmed, and a writ of inquiry awarded. At the November term ensuing, Homer, without setting aside this office judgment, applied for and obtained a continuance; and the case was continued from term to term, till July term 1824; when Hawkins moved the court to discharge him from his obligation as appearance bail, on the ground, that no sufficient affidavit had been filed in the cause to justify the order requiring bail (Homer being now, not an inhabitant of Virginia). The court refused to discharge the bail. Then Hawkins being allowed to defend the suit for the principal, pleaded the general issue. The jury found a verdict for Gibson, for 112 dollars; where-477 upon the court gave *judgment against Homer and Hawkins his appearance bail. And Hawkins appealed to the circuit court of Henrico.

The circuit court adjourned the following questions to the general court: 1. Whether, under the statute authorising a judge of the general court, or a justice of the peace, to require bail in actions wherein appearance bail is not demandable of right, it is necessary that the judge or justice should return the affidavit required by the statute, to the court from which the process issues? 2. Whether, if it be necessary to return it, and it be not so returned, the appearance bail can in such case be relieved, and if so, whether he can be discharged on motion? 3. Ought the bail to be discharged, in this case, upon the whole matter appearing in the record?*

*The general court certified its opinion to the circuit court (not deciding the first two questions adjourned) that "the bail ought not in this case to be discharged." Whereupon the circuit court affirmed the judgment: and Hawkins appealed to this court.

Bacchus, for the appellant. The statute giving a special authority to a judge or justice in vacation, upon proper affidavit, to require bail, it ought to appear that that authority was exactly pursued. 2 Salk. 475, pl. 14; 3 Stark. on Ev. part iv. pp. 1197, 8. The affidavit ought then to be in writing (indeed, the word affidavit imports a written oath) and it ought to be filed; since, unless it be in writing and filed, it cannot be inspected by the court, to ascertain, whether it is a proper affidavit or not; whether it verifies the justice of the action, and shews probable cause to apprehend that the defendant will depart from the jurisdiction of the court, so as to avoid process of execution. Neither is there any alternative but either to require that the affidavit shall be in writing and filed, or to hold that the single justice, who makes the order, is the absolute judge of the propriety of the affidavit on which he founds it, subject to no controul or supervision, and that if a perjury be committed in such an affidavit, however palpable, the offender shall be exempt from prosecution. Our statute does not, indeed, in express terms, require, that the affidavit shall be in writing and filed; yet the very particularity with which the statute prescribes what the affidavit shall contain, in order to justify the justice in ordering bail, evinces, that it was the plain intent of the statute to require both.

*See 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 42, 43, 44, 45, 50, pp. 499, 501. § 42 provides, that "in all such actions wherein bail may not lawfully be demanded, the plaintiff, or his attorney, shall, on pain of having his suit dismissed with costs, indorse, on the original writ or subsequent process, the true species of action, and that bail is not required in order that the sheriff may be informed how to govern himself in the execution thereof."

§ 44 provides, that "in all other personal actions, it shall be lawful for any judge of the general court, or any justice of the peace for any county or corporation, upon proper affidavit, verifying the justice of the plaintiff's action, and shewing probable cause to apprehend that the defendant will depart from the jurisdiction of the court so that process of execution cannot be served upon him, to direct bail to be taken, by indorsement on the original writ, or subsequent process, and the sheriff shall govern himself accordingly."

§ 45 provides, that "in all cases, where bail shall so have been required, by the indorsement of the plaintiff or his attorney, or of a judge or justice, the sheriff shall return on the writ, the names of the bail by him taken, and shall return the bail bond or a copy thereof, to the clerk's office, on the day of appearance."

§ 50 provides, that "in any personal action, in which bail shall not have been required, the court may at any time before final judgment, for good cause shewn, rule the defendant to give special bail, and, on his failure to do so, may refuse him permission to plead, or may set aside any plea already pleaded by him, and award a writ of inquiry, or otherwise proceed to judgment according to law, or may cause him to be arrested and committed to prison."—Note in Original Edition.

statutes expressly require, that the affidavit on which bail is ordered, shall be returned and filed, and prescribe when this shall be done, by whom, and to whom. 1 Tidd's Prac. ch. 8. Our statute is silent as to all these particulars; it requires only, that there shall be proper affidavit

479 made to authorise a justice to *order bail, and that when bail has been required by order of a justice, as well as when required by the plaintiff, the sheriff shall return on the writ, the name of the bail by him taken, and the bail bond or a copy of it, to the clerk's office, on the day of appearance. If the court shall hold it necessary to return and file the affidavit, it must go farther, and prescribe when, by whom, and to whom, it shall be returned; which were not to interpret but to make law. But suppose the affidavit ought to be filed: the bail could not be discharged, on motion made at the calling of the cause for trial, without even a notice of the motion: this motion was a surprise on the plaintiff: the proper course was, to have asked a rule on the plaintiff to shew cause why the bail should not be discharged, and thus to have given him an opportunity to produce the affidavit, or shew other cause. Again, the application to discharge the bail in this case, came too late; two years after bail required and entered, after judgment by default and writ of inquiry awarded, and after the defendant was gone, so that if the court discharged the appearance bail, it could not have made any effectual order requiring special bail. Desborough v. Copinger, 8 T. R. 77; 2 Com. Dig. Bail, K. 3, pp. 22-6.

Bacchus, in reply. In our practice, the plaintiff is always in court: wherefore, then, require notice of the motion, or a rule to shew cause? If the motion was unexpected, the court might have obviated the surprise, by giving time to the plaintiff, if he had asked time, to produce the affidavit, or to shew that it was lost, and to prove its contents. This is an objection to form, not to substance. But, in truth, if it was necessary that a proper affidavit should not only be made, but returned and filed, then, no proper affidavit being returned and filed, the case was the same, as if there had been no affidavit; as if, in short, bail had been taken, when it had not been required, or had been unlawfully required. And, in such cases, the bail is taken at the plaintiff's peril; he is bound to proceed regularly, and not to require bail 480 *without lawful authority to do so, upon pain of having his suit dismissed with costs, at any time when the fact is shewn to the court.

BROOKE, P. This case turns on the question, whether the hustings court erred in refusing to discharge Hawkins, the appearance bail? The motion was put, in that court, on the ground, that no sufficient affidavit had been filed in the case, to authorise the alderman's order requiring bail. It is not necessary to decide, whether the justice must have a written affidavit to justify his requiring bail? nor, whether that affidavit must be filed? The term affidavit in the statute, imports an oath in writing; but the statute is silent as to the filing.

There are two other grounds, on which, I think, the judgment must be affirmed.

1. The objection could not be taken on motion; since it involved matters aliunde and not on the face of the record. It could only be made on a rule to shew cause why the bail should not be discharged, on the return of which the other party might be prepared to shew the affidavit, and that it was a proper one, in the terms of the statute.

2. The objection came too late; being made two years after the writ of inquiry, and (it appears) after the defendant had left the state. In Desborough v. Copinger, the objection to the affidavit was held to be too late after the writ of inquiry.

On these grounds the judgment is to be affirmed.

481 *Sturdivant's Adm'r v. Raines's Ex'or.

November, 1839.

Administrators—When Verdict Insufficient to Found Judgment De Bonis Testatoris.—Debt on bond against an adm'r: issues joined on pleas of payment and fully administered; verdict for plaintiff on first issue, and on the last, "that assets more than sufficient to pay the debt &c. came to defendant's hands to be administered:" HELD, verdict on last issue insufficient to found judgment de bonis testatoris.

Debt on bond, by the executor of Raines against the administrator of Sturdivant, in the circuit court of Prince George. Pleas, payment and fully administered; on which issues were made up. The jury found the following verdict: "We of the jury find for the plaintiff the debt in the declaration mentioned, to be discharged by the payment of £18. 16. 8. with interest from the 4th January 1806 till paid &c. And we further find that assets more than sufficient to pay the debt, interest and costs came to the hands of the defendant to be administered." Whereupon the court gave judgment against the defendant, for the debt, interest and costs, to be levied de bonis testatoris. The defendant appealed to this court.

Allison, for the appellant, objected, that the verdict of the jury was insufficient to sustain the judgment; because it did not find assets in the hands of the administrator, unadministered by him, sufficient to pay the debt; but only that assets enough came to his hands; which might be true, and yet the administrator might have fully and duly administered all the assets. He cited Booth's ex'or v. Armstrong, 2 Wash. 301; Rogers's adm'r v. Chandler's adm'r, 3 Munf. 65; Eppes's adm'r v. Smith, adm'r of Bagley &c., 4 Munf. 466; Gardner's adm'r v. Vidal, 6 Rand. 106.

Executors and Administrators—When Verdict Insufficient to Found Judgment De Bonis Testatoris.—In an action of debt on bond against an administratrix, the plea was fully administered, and the verdict was in general terms that the defendant had not fully administered: upon which verdict judgment was rendered for the debt demanded, to be levied de bonis testatoris, and it was held that such verdict was insufficient to warrant the judgment. Brizendine v. Tisdale, 1 Leigh 481. Gardner v. Vidal, 6 Rand. 106. To the same effect the principal case is cited in foot-note to Booth v. Armstrong, 2 Wash. 301, by TUCKER, P. in Burnett v. Harwell, 3 Leigh 96. See also Rogers v. Chandler, 3 Munf. 65; Eppes v. Smith, 4 Munf. 466. See monographic note on "Executors and Administrators" appended to Rosser v. Depriest, 5 Gratt. 6.

In the cases cited for the appellant, the finding was assets equal to the debt, or assets sufficient to pay the debt: here the finding is that assets more than sufficient to pay the debt, came to the administrator's hands; inferring, that, in law and in 482 fact, *there were ample assets. Gardner v. Vidal goes a step beyond the other cases; for it is there held, that the jury must find assets sufficient at the time of the plea pleaded.

Allison. The case of Booth's ex'or v. Armstrong, is decisive against the distinction now suggested, founded on the finding that more than sufficient assets to pay the debt came to the hands of the administrator.

CARR, J., reviewed the cases cited at the bar, and then added—Without stopping to inquire whether this court went too far in Gardner v. Vidal, in requiring that the verdict should find the amount of assets, at the time of plea pleaded, it seems clear to me, from the whole tenour of these decisions, and the reason on which they stand, that the verdict before us must be pronounced insufficient. All the cases decide, substantially, I think, that it must appear from the verdict, that at the institution of the action, there were in the hands of the representative, assets not bound by superior claims, sufficient to discharge the debt due the plaintiff; or if not sufficient, that the amount of such assets must be found. Here it is found, that assets more than enough to pay the debt came to the defendant's hands; but whether he had them at the institution of this suit; whether before that he had not properly disbursed them; or whether, if he still held them, they were not bound by prior judgments &c. does not appear at all. There is, therefore, all that uncertainty and insufficiency, for which, in the other cases, the verdicts were set aside; and I think this must share the same fate.

The other judges concurred, and the judgment was reversed.

November, 1839.

Written Instruments—Proof—When Evidence of Party's Handwriting Admissible.—Where the subscribing witness to an instrument is dead, and it is shewn to be impracticable to prove his hand writing, evidence of the hand writing of the party himself is admissible.

Bills of Exception—Uncertain—Cause Sent Back.—Where a bill of exceptions is uncertain, so that the true state of the case and question in the court below, cannot be gathered from it, this court will for that cause reverse the judgment, and send the cause back for new trial.

Debt on bond, by Raines against Philips executor of Philips, in the circuit court of Prince George. Philips pleaded that the bond was not the deed of his testator. At the trial, the counsel for Raines proved, "that the subscribing witness to the bond was dead, and then stated to the court that every inquiry had been made in the neighbourhood where he resided, to ascertain whether any person was acquainted with his hand writing, but after the most diligent search, no person who knew it could be found: and then he offered testimony to prove the hand writing of the obligor: but the court decided, that under this statement, Raines could not be allowed to go into evidence of the hand writing of the supposed obligor." To this opinion Raines excepted. Verdict and judgment for Philips. Raines appealed to this court.

The cause was argued here, by Allison for the appellant, and the Attorney General for the appellee. They differed as to the meaning of that part of the bill of exceptions, in which it was stated, that "under this statement" the court refused to admit evidence of the hand writing of the obligor: Allison contending, that the words "under this statement," imported that taking the statement to be true, the evidence was inadmissible: and the Attorney General insisting, that those words imported, that upon the statement made by the counsel at the bar, verified by no evidence of any kind, not even by the oath of the party, the secondary evidence was inadmissible. 484 *Stark. on Ev. part II. § 144, 147; Ben v. Peete, 2 Rand. 539; Gilliam's adm'r v. Perkinson's adm'r, 4 Rand. 325, were cited at the bar.

BROOKE, P., delivered the resolution of the court. It is now the settled rule, where the witness to an instrument is dead, and it is impracticable, after all possible diligence has been used, to prove his hand writing, to admit proof of the hand writing of the party himself. (See Gilliam's adm'r v. Perkinson's adm'r and the cases there cited.) But upon this bill of exceptions, it is difficult to say on what ground the evidence was rejected by the court. There is a great want of precision in its language. The judge said, that under the statement cannot ascertain the exact state of the case, nor consequently the import and effect of the instruction, it is a settled practice, to reverse the judgment, to set aside the verdict, and remand the cause for a new trial. Bowyer v. Chestnut, 4 Leigh 4, citing Raines v. Philips, 1 Leigh 483; Thompson v. Cumming, 2 Leigh 321.

In McDowell v. Crawford, 11 Gratt. 398, it is said by MONCURE, J.: "That when an opinion of an inferior court admitting or excluding evidence, or giving or refusing an instruction, is excepted to, the court must take care so to state the case in the bill of exceptions as that the appellate court may supervise the opinion, and determine whether it is right or wrong: otherwise, the judgment must be reversed in order that the case may be correctly stated. Therefore, the judgment must always be reversed where the bill of exceptions to an opinion of the court, admitting or excluding evidence, is defective in not setting out the evidence admitted or excluded. The cases of Fowler v. Lee, 4 Munf. 373; Hairston v. Cole, 1 Rand. 461; Raines v. Philips, 1 Leigh 483; Bowyer v. Chestnut, 4 Leigh 1, are cases in which exceptions were taken to the admission or exclusion of evidence. Barrett v. Tazewell, 1 Call 215; Beattie v. Tabb, 2 Munf. 254; Brooke v. Young, 3 Rand. 106, are cases in which exceptions were taken to instructions given or refused by the court. In all these cases the judgments were reversed on the ground that the statement of facts in the bill of exceptions was too imperfect to enable the appellate court to determine the question." See monographic note on "Bills of Exception" appended to Stoneman v. Com., 25 Gratt. 887.

Written Instrument—Proof—When Evidence of Party's Handwriting Admissible.—It is a general rule that the evidence of a subscribing witness to an instrument is the best, and must be adduced, if it can be had; and if it cannot, proof of the handwriting will be required: but, if the subscribing witness merely makes his mark, if he is dead, proof of the handwriting of the party executing the instrument, will be proper. Gilliam v. Perkinson, 4 Rand. 325. See monographic notes on "Wills," and "Evidence" appended to Lee v. Tapscott, 2 Wash. 276.

Bills of Exception—Certainty.—Whenever a bill of exceptions to an instruction of the court to a jury, is so vague and imperfect, that the appellate court made by the counsel for Raines (who, it seems, had proved, that the witness was dead) he could not be allowed to go into evidence to prove the hand writing of the supposed obligor. If we are to understand, that he admitted the truth of the statement, if it is to be inferred, from the circumstance that the counsel had proved the death of the witness (it is to be presumed on oath), that he made the statement in question, in like manner (that is, on oath); then the judge might be understood as denying the rule before stated. On the contrary, if the fact was, that it was a mere statement not on oath, his objection was, that the facts necessary to entitle the plaintiff to go into evidence of the hand writing of the obligor, were not proved. But, whether he considered the statement as proved, and denied the rule, or admitted the rule, and objected to the statement because it was not proved, is so doubtful, that we think the safest course will be to reverse the judgment, as the court has often done for uncertainty in a bill of exceptions, and send the cause back for a new trial, in which, if the question again occurs, the objection to the admission of proof of the hand writing of the obligor, may be more precisely stated.

Judgment reversed.

485 Commonwealth v. Jackson's Ex'or & al.

November, 1829.

Bond Taken by Court without Authority of Law—Effect as to Surety.—Hustings court of Williamsburg, without any authority of law for the act, appoints a collector of the public taxes, for the city, and takes his bond with surety for due collection &c. payable to the governor and his successors: Held, such bond is not valid and obligatory on the surety.

The hustings court of the city of Williamsburg, in August 1816, appointed Jackson to collect all public taxes imposed by law on the city; and took a bond from him with Browne as his surety, in the penalty of 30,000 dollars, payable to Wilson Cary Nicholas, then governor, and his successors, with condition that Jackson should well and truly collect, account for and pay the taxes &c. Jackson failed to pay the amount of taxes, by him collected, into the treasury, and the commonwealth recovered a judgment for the same against him in the general court, and sued out execution without effect.

Upon a bill exhibited in the superior court of chancery of Richmond, by the attorney general and auditor, against Browne as the executor of Jackson and as his surety in the bond, and several others, the case turned eventually on the single question, Whether the bond was valid and obligatory upon the surety?

The chancellor held that it was not, and dismissed the bill; and from that decree an appeal was taken for the commonwealth to this court.

Bond Taken by Court without Authority of Law—Effect as to Surety.—For the proposition, that a bond taken without authority of law and also against the policy of the law is not valid and obligatory on the surety, the principal case is cited in Monteith v. Com. 15 Gratt. 186; Gibson v. Beckham, 16 Gratt. 224; Morgan v. Hale, 12 W. Va. 726; Porter v. Daniels, 11 W. Va. 255. See monographic note on "Statutory Bonds" appended to Goolaby v. Strother, 21 Gratt. 107.

The Attorney General, for the commonwealth, said, that the first question was, Whether the hustings court had authority to appoint a collector of public taxes for the city, and to take bond and surety for the due collection, accounting for and paying them into the treasury? And he referred to the acts of May 1778, ch. 17; 9 Hen. Stat. at Large, p. 468; May 1779, ch. 20; October 1781, ch. 40; 10 Id. pp. 85, 501, 6; May 1782, ch. 30, § 3, 11; 11 Id. pp. 66, 8, which statutes, he said, gave this power to the 486 hustings *court; and these acts had never been repealed. But, supposing that the bond was not good as a statutory bond, another question would still remain, whether it was not a good and obligatory bond by the common law, as well to the surety as the principal? The surety ought not to be allowed to deny the obligation of the bond, since, by joining in it, he had enabled his principal to get the public money in hands and convert it to his own use. There were many cases, in which bonds taken as statutory bonds, had been held not to be good as such, and yet good and obligatory by the common law both upon principal and surety. Johnstons v. Meriwether, 3 Call 523.

B. Browne, contra, submitted that the statutes referred to by the attorney general were not permanent laws, being enacted for the particular occasion. And, he said, as there was no existing law at the time this bond was executed, authorising the sergeant of the hustings court to collect public taxes, or the court to appoint a public collector for the city, or to take a bond from him, the bond was null and void as to the surety at least. Branch v. Commonwealth, 2 Call 510; Stuart v. Lee, 3 Call 421; U. States v. Morgan, 3 Wash. Circ. Court Rep. 10. Then, supposing the bond in question not good as a statutory bond, how could it be good under the common law? The bond is taken to the governor and his successors: if not put in suit during the term of office of the governor to whom it was made payable, no suit could ever be brought on it; for, surely, the governor's successors could not maintain the action without express authority of law. This alone was conclusive. But as the collector was appointed, so the bond was taken, by the hustings court, contrary to the policy of the law; which has ever been to confine the collection of the public revenue, to officers appointed by the law itself; sheriffs, or coroners, or collectors appointed under special circumstances in the manner prescribed by law. This was an unauthorised interference of the hustings court in the collection of 487 the public *revenue; and it would be of mischievous consequence to give any countenance to such a practice.

This court concurred with the chancellor, and affirmed the decree.

Clarke and Wife v. Buck.

November, 1829.

Wills—Construction—Legacy and Debts Charged on Real Estate—Case at Bar.—B. owning real and personal estate, makes his will, beginning "It is my

will and desire that all my just debts be paid; after that, I wish that C. have 1000 dollars, provided my estate will admit of it;" then he bequeaths to the same C. the greater part of his personal chattels, specifically, making no mention of his real estate, which descends to his heir at law: the whole personal estate proves insufficient to pay debts and the legacy of 1000 dollars: Held, that both the testator's debts, and C.'s legacy, are charged by the will on the real estate descended.

James U. Blair made his last will and testament in these words: "It is my will and desire, that all my just debts be paid—After that I wish that Miss Lucy Collins have 1000 dollars, provided my estate will admit of it. I also leave and bequeath to her one tea caddy, one bed and such clothes to the bed as she may think proper to take. I also, in addition, leave her what bank stock I may die possessed of, also what turnpike stock in the same manner; one bible in the name of my sister Glassel—I also leave to Lucy, all the plate left in the house—I also leave one set of elegant china and tea board, to Lucy Collins—I wish that Miss Collins to provide for Diana and make her comfortable—I leave one chest of drawers, which my mother always deposited her clothes in, to Miss Collins—I also leave to Miss Collins, the china dishes and plates left at my death, the large looking glass in the drawing room, and one of the round ones in the chamber, and one salver."

Administration with the will annexed was granted to Buck, the appellee.

488 *The testator had real estate, which not being disposed of by his will, descended to his heir at law, who was the same Buck, the administrator.

Miss Collins, the legatee, married Charles Stewart; and Stewart and wife first exhibited, in the superior court of chancery of Fredericksburg, a bill against Buck, in his character of administrator with the will annexed, praying an account of the personal estate of the testator and of the administration thereof, and a decree for the legacy of 1000 dollars. The administrator answered, that the personal estate had been applied to the payment of debts, and that a very trivial balance if any would remain to be paid to the legatee. And this, upon an account of the administration ordered by the chancellor, and reported, was found to be true: it appearing, by the report, that the value of the whole personal estate, including the articles specifically bequeathed to Miss Collins, did not amount to 1000 dollars; and that the balance, after paying debts, was only 123 dollars.

Stewart having died pending the suit, Mrs. Stewart, the legatee exhibited a supplemental bill against Buck, as the heir of the testator, praying to charge the legacy on the testator's lands descended to him. To this bill, Buck demurred; and thus presented to the court the question, whether the legacy could in any way be charged on the real estate descended?

Chancellor Browne held that it could not, and dismissed the supplemental bill. And funeral expenses, and all my just debts be paid." This in the commencement of a will, has often been decided to be a charge upon the realty. Trent v. Trent, Gilin. 174; Clarke v. Buck, 1 Leigh 487. On this question, the principal case is cited in Read v. Cather, 18 W. Va. 207; note to Black v. Scott, 3 Fed. Cas. 516. See monographic note on "Wills."

Mrs. Stewart having since the decree married Clarke, Clarke and wife applied to this court for an appeal from the decree; which was allowed them.

Harrison, for the appellants, contended—1st, That the will charged the testator's real estate with the legacy. It directs, that his debts shall be paid, and after that, that Miss Collins shall have the legacy of 1000 dollars, provided his estate will admit of it; meaning his whole estate, real and personal; for, as it appeared, that almost 489 his whole personal *estate was specifically bequeathed to the same legatee, in the sequel of the will, it could not be imagined, that he intended the legacy of 1000 dollars to be satisfied out of that. Kightley v. Kightley, 2 Ves. jun. 328; Williams v. Chitty, 3 Ves. 551; Shallcross v. Finden, Id. 738; Keeling v. Brown, 5 Ves. 359. 2dly, If the will should not be construed to charge the legacy on the testator's real estate, it certainly charged the real with his debts; and then the debts ought to have been thrown on the real, and the personal estate left to discharge the legacy. Foster v. Cook, 3 Bro. C. C. 347; Aldrich v. Cooper, 8 Ves. 382; Trimmer v. Bayne, 9 Ves. 209. And this even though the bill had not been framed with that view. Gibbs v. Ougier, 12 Ves. 413. 3dly, In all events, the specialty debts which bound the real, in the hands of the heir, ought to have been thrown on it, and the legatee let in for satisfaction out of the real, at least to the extent to which the personal had been applied to such debts.

Patton, for the appellee, argued, that the will did not charge the legacy on the real estate of the testator, which he did not mention in his will, but left to descend to the heir at law: that the testator having only the personal estate in his mind, and meaning to dispose of that alone, referred to the adequacy of the personal estate, when he said that the legatee should have the legacy, "provided his estate would admit of it." He might have had a larger personal estate when he made the will, than he left at his death: he might then have had ample personal estate, besides that specifically bequeathed, to pay his debts and this legacy too: he might have underrated his debts, and overrated his wealth; a very common case.

He said the real question was, whether the will charged the real estate descended, with the testator's debts, so that the personal assets being exhausted in the payment of the debts, the legacy ought to be charged on the land, on the principle of substitution? The will contained only 490 a simple *direction that the debts should be paid, without any indication that the real estate was intended as a fund for the payment of them. That was not devised or even mentioned in the will. Now, he said, there was no case, in which lands descended, had been charged in the hands of the heir, with the debts of the ancestor, by a mere direction in his will, to pay his debts; and he examined the cases cited by Harrison, to shew, that they did not support any such proposition. He cited Powell v. Robins, 7 Ves. 209; Davis v. Gardiner, 2 Cox's P. Wms. 187.

As to the claim to marshal the assets, and charge the specialty debts on the real estate, and to relieve the legatee pro tanto, he said that claim was asserted here for the first time: there was no suggestion of the kind in the bill.

CABELL, J. The court is of opinion, that, by the will of J. U. Blair, his real estate was charged with the payment of all his debts; Trent v. Trent's ex'x &c., Gilm. 174. And as it would be against equity, that those who have the choice of two funds, should defeat the just claims of others, by selecting that which is the only fund accessible to others, the appellant, Mrs. Clarke, (formerly Lucy Collins) ought, on the principle of marshaling the assets, to be let in to have satisfaction out of the real estate of the testator, for her general and specific legacies, so far as the same have been broken in upon, or interfered with, by the application of the personal estate to the payment of any of the testator's debts. Aldrich v. Cooper, 8 Ves. 382; 1 Madd. Chan. 615, and seq. and the cases there collected.

But this is not all; for the court is also of opinion, that, by the testator's will, the pecuniary legacy of 1000 dollars to Miss Collins, now Mrs. Clarke, is a direct and absolute charge upon his real estate, not indeed by the express terms of the will, but by strong and necessary implication. It appears from the commissioner's report, that the whole of the personal estate did not amount to 1000 dollars; and the will shews that much of this was specifically 491 bequeathed to Miss *Collins. The testator surely intended that she should have that. The whole of the personal estate was not much more than sufficient for the payment of the debts of the testator. Yet it was certainly his intention that Miss Collins, the sole object of his bounty, should have, in addition to the specific legacies, the sum of 1000 dollars, after the payment of all his debts. This object could not be accomplished but by resort to the real estate. Such must have been the intention of the testator; and that intention ought to be carried into effect. The case of Trent v. Trent's ex'x is a strong authority on this point also; for, in that case, the legacy or annuity to Mrs. Trent was not expressly charged on the real estate; yet this court held it to be charged thereon, by the intention of the testator implied from the known insufficiency of the personal estate.

On these grounds, the decree of the chancellor is reversed, and the cause remanded, to be finally proceeded in, according to the principles now declared.

Covenant—Oyer of Covenant—When Variance Cannot Be Taken Advantage of.—In covenant, defendant takes oyer of the covenant, and afterwards pleads covenants performed: HELD, that defendant by oyer has made the covenant itself a part of *Debt on Single Bill—Oyer—Waiver of Objection for Variance.—In Thompson v. Boggs, 8 W. Va. 70, it is said: "If the defendant in debt on single bill or single bills, craves oyer of the same, and afterwards pleads to issue, he by oyer, has made the single bill, the record, and cannot at trial of the issue, object to the covenant as evidence, on the ground of variance between it and the covenant set forth in the declaration.

Award—Presumption in Favor of.—All fair presumptions shall be made in favour of an award; and if on any fair presumption the award may be brought within the submission, it shall be sustained.

This was an action of covenant brought by Archibald Armstrong against Richard and Archibald Armstrong, in the hustings court of Richmond. The declaration set forth a covenant between the plaintiff and the defendants, for submitting all matters in dispute between them, to O. Manson and F. A. Mayo, whose award the parties 492 covenanted to "submit to and abide by; the actual arbitration of the matters in dispute; an award by the arbitrators, that the defendants should pay the plaintiff 127 dollars, subject to a deduction of 16 dollars, and half the costs of a suit, then pending in the name of Richard Armstrong; and notice to the defendants of the award; and then the declaration alleged as a breach of the covenant, that the defendants had not paid the plaintiff the sum so awarded to him.

The defendants took oyer of the covenant, the substantial part whereof was thus: "Whereas a certain dispute has taken place between the parties, in relation to killing a parcel of hogs, the parties, being desirous of settling the matter of difference between them, have chosen O. M. and F. A. M. to settle, arbitrate and determine all difference between them, and to fix the amount to be paid by either party; and in case they may not agree, then they shall call in a third person as umpire; and their award shall be binding between the parties." And then the defendants pleaded, that the arbitrators "made no award of and concerning the or single bills, a part of the pleadings and record; and, if, after oyer is taken and granted, he pleads payment, he cannot, at the trial of the issue, object to the single bill or single bills as evidence, on the ground of variance between the single bill or bills and the single bill or bills set forth in the declaration.—Armstrong v. Armstrongs, 1 Leigh 491."

And in Bennett v. Loyd, 6 Leigh 818, it is said: "The bond declared on, is recited as bearing date in 1811; that produced, and made part of the declaration upon oyer, is dated in 1810. That the variance is matter of substance, and fatal, appears by the case of Cooke v. Graham's Adm'r (3 Cranch 229). It appears by that case, too, that the error is not cured by pleading oyer: for the defendant there, pleaded conditions performed, as the defendant did here; the plaintiff replied, and assigned a breach, and the defendant rejoined a bad rejoinder, to which the plaintiff demurred: the court went back to the first fault, and entered judgment on the demurrer for the defendant. The case of Armstrong v. Armstrongs, 1 Leigh 491, is not in conflict with this opinion; in that case, the question was upon the trial of the issue before the jury; here, it is upon demurrer; and upon demurrer, where the defendant has taken oyer, he may take advantage of the variance. Macon v. Crump, 1 Call 575." See also, citing the principal case, foot-note to Sterrett v. Teaford, 4 Gratt. 84. See monographic note on "Bonds" appended to Ward v. Churn, 18 Gratt. 801.

*Awards—Presumption.—In Fluharty v. Beatty, 22 W. Va. 705, it is said, presumptions are not to be raised for the purpose of overthrowing an award; but they are to be liberally construed so as to give effect and operation to the intent of the arbitrators, where it can be done, and every reasonable intention is to be made in their support. Smith v. Smith, 4 Rand. 95; Gas Co. v. Wheeling, 8 W. Va. 321; Richards v. Brockenbrough, 1 Rand. 449; Armstrong v. Armstrongs, 1 Leigh 491. To the same effect the principal case is cited in Pollock v. Sutherland, 25 Gratt. 95. See monographic note on "Arbitration and Award" appended to Bassett v. Cunningham, 9 Gratt. 664.

The plaintiff in his replication set forth the award in hæc verba, and averred that the defendants had not paid the sum of money awarded to him. The award was in these words: "On settlement of accounts between Archibald Armstrong & Co. as per bond &c." (describing the instrument of submission to arbitration) "it appears, that A. Armstrong junior" (one of the defendants) "is indebted to A. Armstrong senior, 127 dollars; that is to say, allowing A. A. junior all the lard taken or made by the said firm—and whereas Richard Armstrong" (the other defendant) "one of the parties to the said bond" (the submission) "has sued A. Armstrong senior, on his own account, now pending in the mayor's court of Richmond, we hereby award, that 16 dollars, and one half the costs shall be deducted from the balance due A. A. senior above stated—and the balance shall be paid over to A. A. senior, by the above parties—and the said R. A. shall withdraw 493 his suit above mentioned." *This award was signed by the two arbitrators; and then signed and sealed by all the parties to the submission, and to this act of the parties both the arbitrators were attesting witnesses; but the fact of the parties having signed the award, was not specifically pleaded or relied on in the replication.

To this replication the defendants demurred generally. The court overruled the demurrer. And then the defendants were allowed to put in the plea of covenants performed, on which an issue was made up.

At the trial, the defendants objected to the admission of the arbitration bond in evidence, on the ground of variance between the instrument itself and the covenant described in the declaration. But the court overruled the objection; and the defendant excepted.

There was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff for 109 dollars with interest &c. The defendant appealed to the circuit court of Henrico; which held that the replication to the first plea of No award, was not sufficient in law to maintain the action; and therefore reversed the judgment. And then the plaintiff appealed to this court.

Lyons, for the appellant, said, that there was, in truth, no variance between the covenant as set out in the declaration, and the instrument of submission offered in evidence; for, though the covenant recites, that the dispute in relation to killing a parcel of hogs was the cause or motive of the reference, yet the arbitrators are appointed to determine all difference between the parties. But if there was a variance, it was an immaterial one. Wroe v. Washington, 1 Wash. 357; M'Williams v. Willis, Id. 199; Peter v. Cocke, Id. 257; Hammitt v. Bullett's ex'ors, 1 Call 567. Or, at any rate, after oyer prayed by the defendants the covenant was made part of the record, and after in reference to that very covenant they had pleaded that there was no award made in pursuance of the same, they cannot object to the paper as evidence: they cured the defect of the declaration, if itself a part of the declaration. 1 Chitt. Plead. 644; Macon v. Crump, 1 Call 575. Surely, the court could not exclude a paper which was already part of the record. On this point, then, there was no error in the judgment of the hustings court.

Was this a good award? There are three requisites to a good award: that it be mutual, that it be certain, that it be within the submission. As to mutuality, properly understood, he said, there was no want of it in this award; and if there was, the old doctrine on this point may be regarded as exploded; Kyd on Awards, 147, 153; 1 Com. Dig. Arbitrament, Award, E. 14, p. 672, and the notes; Horrel v. M'Alexander, 3 Rand. 94. That this award was not certain enough could hardly be pretended. Then, was it within the submission? The court will not presume that an award is without the terms of the submission; it must clearly appear to be so; all presumptions are to be made in favor of the award. What is conclusive of this point, is, that the parties to the submission have signed and sealed the award, and thereby shewn that it was within the submission as they themselves understood and intended it. But the point of the objection was, that the arbitrators awarded the 16 dollars due from A. A. senior to R. A. to be discounted from the debt due by A. A. junior & Co. to A. A. senior, and that R. A. should pay A. A.'s separate debt. Now, admit that, in this particular, the arbitrators went beyond the submission, and that the award was so far bad; it was still good in other respects as to which it was within the submission. 1 Com. Dig. Arbitrament, E. 8, p. 668; 2 Wms. Saund. 293, note 1; Richards v. Brockenbrough's adm'r, 1 Rand. 449. And, on the plea of No award, the defendant was bound to shew, that the award was wholly bad; for if there was an award in fact, and that good in part, the plea was falsified. 1 Chitt. Plead. 545. But, in truth, the arbitrators were right in awarding that R. A. as well as A. A. should pay the debt; for if he was not originally bound as principal or as surety, he was

495 bound by the very terms of *the submission bond, as a surety at least; and then the case of Richards v. Brockenbrough sustains the award. J. S. Myers, for the appellee, premising that the plea of no award, in effect, denied that there was a good award, objected, 1. that this award was neither mutual nor final; and 2. that it was not within the terms of the submission. As to the mutuality requisite in awards, so much of that doctrine as was merely technical had indeed been exploded; but not the doctrine itself: the modern cases had only explained it, and made it reasonable. In this controversy between A. A. of the one part, and R. and A. A. (who were joint parties) of the other part, the arbitrators ascertained what one of these joint parties owed to A. A. and what A. A. owed to the other of them. How could the money so awarded satisfy A. A.'s demands against R. and A. A. jointly, or satisfy R. and A. A.'s joint demands against A. A.? But he relied chiefly on the second objection, that the award was not within the submission. He thought it impossible to doubt, that the only matter of difference referred to the arbitrators, was that which grew out of the contract about the killing of the hogs; the recital explaining the general words used in the sequel. Com. Dig. Obligation, p. 194; Hassell & al. v. Long's ex'ors, 2 Mau. & Selw. 363. And, most certainly, the submission was only of matters in difference between the plaintiff and the defendants jointly, not the defendants severally, or either of them. Now, the award does not ascertain what the defendants jointly owed the plaintiff, or that they owed him any thing; it does not ascertain what the plaintiff owed the defendants jointly, or that he owed them any thing. It ascertains, that one of the defendants owed the plaintiff 127 dollars, and that he owed the other defendant 16 dollars; and then, it not only applied this money due to R. A. alone to the satisfaction in part of the joint debt of R. and A. A. but it directed that R. and A. A. jointly, should pay the plaintiff the debt which A. A. alone owed him. Therefore, the departure from the submission, 496 *was entire and obvious. He said, the court could only judge by the submission and award themselves, taken alone; the question being presented by a demurrer to the replication, nothing could be intended but what was averred in the replication. It appeared, indeed, that the parties put their signatures to the award; but this only appeared by the award being set forth in hæc verba; and those signatures were not averred in the replication, or in any way relied on to sustain the plaintiff's case; neither could this matter have been replied to sustain the claim asserted in the declaration.

CARR, J. The declaration describes the covenant, as submitting all matters in difference between the parties, to the arbitrators. Upon oyer prayed, the bond of submission is set out in hæc verba, and it appears to be a bond for the submission, not of all matters in difference generally, but of the matters of difference arising out of the killing a parcel of hogs. If the defendants had intended to take advantage of this variance, the proper mode, as prescribed by the books on pleading, would have been, after oyer, to have demurred for the difference between the covenant described, and that set out. 1 Chitt. Plead. 415. Instead of this course the defendants after oyer, pleaded that the arbitrators made no award of and concerning the premises in the covenant mentioned. The plaintiff replied setting out the award and charging the non-performance of the award as a breach of the covenant. To this there was a general demurrer, which being overruled, the defendants pleaded covenants performed; and on the trial of that issue, moved to exclude the bond. The court overruled the motion: and, without touching the general question whether the variance was material, I think the court was right, upon the ground, that the defendants by their oyer, made the bond a part of the record, indeed, (the books say) a part of the declaration; and could not afterwards object to its going to the jury. It was to the bond set out that they pleaded.

1 Chitt. Plead. 420; 1 Wms. Saund. 316; 497 Jeffery v. White, 2 Doug. 476; * Ld. Raym. 1541; Cro. Car. 209. Therefore, upon the first point, I think there was no error in the hustings court.

This, indeed, was not the point on which the superior court reversed the judgment. It says, "it seems to the court here that the said judgment is erroneous in this, that the appellee's replication to the appellants' plea, and the matters therein contained, are not sufficient in law, for the appellee to have and maintain his action." &c. in other words, that there was no good award. This is the serious question in the cause.

Two objections were taken to the award; 1. that it was not mutual; 2. that it was of matters not submitted, and so beyond the authority of the arbitrators. This last I think is the only question which need be considered: for the only object of the mutuality here spoken of, is, that by a compliance with the award, both parties shall be discharged, and all matters settled; and, in the case before us, if the arbitrators had power to award that the defendants should pay the money to the plaintiff, a payment under the award would discharge the bond of submission, and clear them forever of the demand.

The question then is, did the arbitrators overstep the limits of their power? Our cases as well as the English say, that awards are to be literally and favourably construed; that all the provisions of the statutes of jeofails apply strongly to these judgments given by this domestic forum, these judges of the parties own choosing. Thus in Richards v. Brockenbrough, this court said "Every thing is to be presumed in favour of awards." Let us look at the submission. Who are the parties submitting? "Archibald Armstrong of the one part, and Richard and Archibald Armstrong of the second part." They say "a dispute has taken place between the said parties in relation to killing a parcel of hogs in Richmond, and the parties being desirous of settling the matter of difference between them &c. have chosen O. M. and F. A. M. to settle all difference between the said parties, and fix the amount to be paid to 498 either party," &c. To be *paid to either party, by whom? by the other party, of necessity—there are but two parties; A. A. the one; R. and A. A. the other. The arbitrators say, "On settlement of accounts, between A. Armstrong & Co. as per bond &c. it appears that A. Armstrong junior is indebted to A. Armstrong senior, 127 dollars, that is, allowing said A. A. junior, all the lard taken or made by said firm—And whereas R. A. one of the parties to the said bond, has sued A. A. senior on his own account &c. we do order and award, that 16 dollars and half the costs, shall be deducted out of the balance due A. A. senior, and the balance to be paid over to him by the above parties," &c. The objection (as I understood it) is, that the arbitrators, after finding that A. A. junior owed this money, have awarded, that he and R. A. shall pay it—and also have undertaken to arbitrate concerning a demand of R. A. in his own right, against A. A. senior. As to the first, I did not understand it to be charged as misbehaviour, or partially in the arbitrators, to direct R. A. to pay the debt of A. A. junior: and how could it be going out of the submission? Richard and Archibald junior make but one party: and they bind themselves to pay whatever shall be adjudged to the other party; not that Archibald junior shall pay what he may owe, and Richard what he may owe, but that they two, as one party, shall pay—Why did Richard join with Archibald junior? Surely, either as a part of the firm, on which Archibald senior had this demand, or as surety for Archibald junior. In either capacity, it was proper that the award should bind him to pay as this court said in Richards v. Brockenbrough. We are also to make all fair presumptions in favour of the award. Must we not then presume, that the arbitrators had before them unquestionable evidence, that R. A. was bound (either as principal or surety) for this debt? Can we presume, that they would say A. A. junior alone owes this debt, yet we will make R. A. jointly liable with him? This would be to presume against, instead of in favour of, their award. Again; is not this presumption assisted by the fact, that after 499 "the award was rendered, the parties all signed and sealed it, and the arbitrators attested this. Was not this a sort of assent to the award? If Richard had been unjustly and contrary to his submission, awarded to pay the debt of A. A. junior, would he not at once have revolted? As to the 16 dollars private debt of Richard, if we say he was bound for the whole 127 dollars to Archibald senior, this part of the award is wholly in his favour, and he cannot object; in his favour, because it gives him a judgment for his whole demand, and makes it a discount from the 127 dollars, which he is awarded to pay.

The other judges concurring, the judgment of the circuit court was reversed, and that of the hustings court affirmed.

Martin v. Lindsay's Adm'rs.

November, 1829.

Usurious Debt—Secured by Deed of Trust.—M. borrows money of L. on usury, and by deed of trust conveys land to a trustee, with power to sell the subject, when required after debt should fall due, and raise money to pay it; the lender dies; his adm'rs require trustee to sell trust subject; the borrower exhibits a bill in chancery, charging the usury, requiring defendants to answer the charge, insisting that the deed of trust is null and void, and praying injunction to restrain trustee from

Usurious Debt—Deed of Trust to Secure.—The principal case follows (CARR, J. dissenting) Marks v. Morris, 2 Munf. 407, which case holds that, where a bill in equity is filed to stay proceedings upon a usurious deed of trust, on the ground that the complainant had no opportunity at law to plead the usury, and prays for no discovery, but on the contrary, is ready to prove the fact, the court ought not to grant him relief against the usury, upon the condition of his paying the principal sum of money (without interest), but should altogether enjoin the trustee from selling, until, by some proper proceeding to be instituted by the cestui que trust, he establishes the validity of his contract: in which case, the injunction should be dissolved; and, in the contrary event, perpetuated.

In Fitzhugh v. Gordon, 2 Leigh 627, 629, the principle of the principal case and Marks v. Morris is reviewed, and the court was divided. The principal case is cited and approved in Turpin v. Povall, 8 Leigh 97, 100, 108. It is also approved by Brooke, J. in Bank of Washington v. Arthur, 3 Gratt. 186. The selling; the adm'rs of the lender and the trustee disclaim all knowledge of the usury; but the usury is proved by one witness: HELD, that in such a case, the court of chancery should enjoin the trustee from selling the trust subject, till the creditors claiming under it should establish its legal validity in some proper forum where the debtor may have opportunity to contest it—dissentiente CARR, J.

This was a bill in the county court of Orange, in chancery, exhibited by Martin against the administrators of Lindsay and Sale—setting forth, That on the 6th October 1818, he borrowed of Lindsay, in his lifetime, 320 dollars, upon usury at the rate of twelve per cent. per annum; and conveyed a tract of land to Sale, in trust to secure the payment to Lindsay of 358 dollars and 40 cents (being the sum borrowed with one year's interest at twelve per cent.)

500 *On the 6th October 1819. That Lindsay being dead, his administrators had required the trustee, Sale, to sell the land, under the deed of trust, to satisfy the debt; and he had advertised it for sale accordingly. And that the deed of trusts being usurious, was therefore null and void. The bill called on the defendants to answer its allegations on oath; and prayed, that the trustee might be enjoined from proceeding to sell the trust subject; and general relief.

The injunction was awarded.

The administrators of Lindsay, in their answers, disclaimed all knowledge of the usury; and declared, that they asked and wished no more than the principal and such legal interest as was justly due. The trustee, Sale, (though he wrote the deed of trust) also answered, that he had no knowledge of any usury.

The usury was explicitly proved, as charged in the bill, by one witness.

The county court decreed, that the injunction should be so far dissolved, as to allow the defendants to raise, by sale of the trust subject, the principal sum borrowed, viz. 320 dollars, without interest; and they gave the plaintiff the costs of this suit, to be set-off against the debt.

From this decree, Martin appealed to the superiour court of chancery of Fredericksburg; which corrected the details of the decree in some particulars, but approved and affirmed the principle of it. And then Martin appealed to this court.

The case was argued here by Michie for the appellant; there was no counsel for the appellee. The question presented by the case was as to the mode and measure of relief; and it brought in review, the cases of Marks v. Morris, 2 Munf. 407; Stone v. Ware, 6 Munf. 541; McPherrin v. King, 1 Rand. 172; Young v. Scott, 4 Rand. 415.

CARR, J. This case is exactly that of Marks and Morris, and brings under review the correctness of that decision.

501 *It is there decided, that the third section of our statute against usury, is limited to the case of bills of discov-principal case is discussed in Davis v. Demming, 12 W. Va. 265, 266, 267, 274, 275, 276, 280, where it is held that, the 10th section of chapter 141, Code of Va. of 1860 is applicable only to bills to prevent the sale of property conveyed by a deed of trust to secure a usurious debt. The principal case is also cited in Spengler v. Snapp, 5 Leigh 499, 508. See monographic note on "Usury" appended to Coffman v. Miller, 26 Gratt. 698.

ery, where, from defect of evidence, the plaintiff is compelled to resort to the conscience of the defendant; that the bill there, was not of that class, because it did not offer to return the principal, nor pray that the usurious notes, might be given up; and so far from a defect of evidence, averred, that the plaintiff could prove the usury, by a witness whom he names: and the court decided, that, as the case was not within the statute, as the plaintiff wanted no discovery, but only that the trustee should be stayed from selling, till the usury could be inquired into at law, the chancellor ought not to have imposed on him the loss of the principal sum, but should have enjoined the sale, until the defendant should before some competent tribunal, establish the validity of his contract; in which case, the injunction should be dissolved; and, in the contrary event, perpetuated. This case was decided in November 1812, by three judges, who were unanimous. In March 1820, the case of Stone v. Ware and Smith was decided by four judges, unanimously. Ware owed Smith a debt: Stone the younger owed Ware a debt: Ware (by the terror of an execution) obliged Stone to agree to give him fifteen per cent. for a forbearance of twelve months—and to procure his father to execute as principal (with Stone the son, and Ware, as sureties) a bond to Smith (who was ignorant of the usury) for the debt with the fifteen per cent. included. Smith got a judgment on the bond; and the Stones filed a bill injoining it on the ground of the usury. The cause was argued in this court twice, very elaborately; the second argument was by direction of the court on two points, 1. Was the contract usurious? 2. If so, must there be a forfeiture of the whole debt, or only of the usurious interest? In the last argument Marks and Morris was expressly brought to the view of the court. The decision was, that the bond to Smith, being taken to secure a just debt, without any knowledge of the usury, was not affected by it: but that as to Ware 502 *the usury being proved upon him, the Stones must be relieved, upon the terms, however, of their paying to Ware "the principal justly due him with legal interest." This case I know, was considered by some of the profession at the time (and I think justly considered) as shaking Marks and Morris, in a material point. That case had decided that where the borrower wants no discovery, but from the form of the contract has no day in court, equity will give him a day, without making him pay the principal sum. In Stone and Ware, the borrower had no day in court, for it was decided that the usury could not avail against Smith. Yet equity, (as the price of its aid) made him pay the principal sum with interest.

Next came McPherrin v. King, heard April 1822, by three judges. This was in all its material features like Marks and Morris. The loan was secured by deed of trust, and the bill stated that the usury could be proved by disinterested testimony. The opinions of the judges, (each differing from the others) shew how unsettled the law of the subject was: and they all declare, that the great question discussed could not be decided by a bare court, but would be held open for future consideration: and judge Roane remarked, that "the question was very important, and its importance enhanced by the circumstance, that the counsel have arrayed two of the decisions of this court against each other." (These were Marks and Morris and Stone and Ware.) The publication of this case, tended still further to impeach the authority of Marks and Morris.

In 1826, the case of Young v. Scott was decided. There were only three judges. Two were of opinion that "in all cases, where a party applies to equity for relief against usury, whether he calls for a discovery, or avers his ability to prove the usury, he can only be relieved on the terms prescribed by the third section of the statute."

I have stated these cases to shew the exact situation of the subject. They clearly evince, that Marks and Morris has long been considered an open case, and the 503 measure of *relief in cases of usury, a question wholly unsettled. And this being so, I sincerely lament, that the point has again come before us, when one of our brethren, and all the elder members of our bar, are attending a higher duty in another place. I shall however, give, as briefly as I can, my view of the case of Marks and Morris.

The opinion of the court represents the bill in that case, as seeking no relief from the usury, by the decree of the court of equity, but merely that equity would injoin the sale, till the fact of usury should be tried in some proceeding at law. It struck me, as strange that a bill should be thus framed by counsel; for so far as my researches have gone, the annals of jurisprudence furnish no precedent for it. I was therefore induced to examine the original record; and it is now before me. After stating the case, with the facts constituting usury, the bill proceeded thus: "And your orator is advised, that by the laws of the land, the aforesaid deeds of trust, being conveyances and assurances for the payment of money loaned, on which a higher interest is reserved, than six dollars for the forbearance of a hundred dollars, and after that rate; such deeds are not merely voidable, but are ipso facto utterly and absolutely void; and, consequently, that any sale under them, would be of no effect in law or equity." And the prayer was, "that the sale of property might be forthwith stopped; that all proceedings under the said deeds of trust might be enjoined, and the trustee inhibited from selling, and the same by a decree of this court declared null and void." General relief is then prayed. This seems to me, not an application merely to stay the trustee, till another forum could decide on the usury; but a direct appeal to equity for ultimate and final relief.

But, upon the supposition that in this I am wrong and the court right, I will proceed to examine the reasons of their opinion.

The court lays it down, 1. That, in a bill to perpetuate testimony touching a question of usury, equity will not impose

504 *conditions on the plaintiff, and cites, in support of this position, Suffolk v. Green, 1 Atk. 450. It is very true, that in that case lord Hardwicke overruled a demurrer to a bill to perpetuate testimony as to a bond charged to be usurious. The demurrer was on the ground, "that the bill sought to subject the defendant to a penalty and though, on the plaintiff's own shewing, there was a large sum lent, he does not offer to pay what was really due." The demurrer was overruled, because it went too far, and being bad in part, was void in toto. But is there any resemblance between a bill to perpetuate evidence, and the bill in Marks and Morris? To my understanding, they are wholly different. That is a proceeding merely to enable a party to examine a witness de bene esse; to guard against the accident of death, in a case where he cannot immediately have an investigation in a court of law. The only reason why the bill need state the subject, and the facts to which the witness is to be examined, is, to shew the plaintiff's interest, and therefore his right, to perpetuate the evidence, and also to shew, that he who is made defendant is interested in the subject matter. But the defendant is not called on to answer: if he be, he may demur. Thus in the case of Suffolk v. Green, lord Hardwicke says, "so far as the present bill, prays the defendants to put in an answer, so far it is a bill of discovery, for the answer must necessarily go to the usury charged in the bill. The defendants (he adds) have demurred to so much of the bill as seeks any discovery, and to perpetuate the testimony. As to the first part, that it would subject the defendants to a penalty, the demurrer is proper, and if it had gone no farther, must have been allowed as an usual case." Now, in Marks and Morris, the bill, after setting out the usurious contract, and making defendants, prayed, "that they on their corporal oaths, might full, true and perfect answer make. to the premises, as fully as if the same, were therein again, particularly set forth and expressed;" thus directly demanding an answer to the very fact of usury.

(And the bill in the case be-505 fore us has the *same demand.)

It is possible, then, to bend the case of Suffolk and Green, into an authority supporting Marks and Morris? On the contrary, does it not shew, that Marks and Morris, demanding an answer to the usury, without waiving the penalties, was demurrable; unless you could bring the case within the third section of our statute, where the law waves the penalties, and thereby, perhaps, dispenses with the necessity of a waiver in the bill; but the court went upon the express ground, that Marks and Morris was not within the third section.

2. The next position of the court was, that on a bill for a new trial, where the judgment has been obtained, by surprise or accident in a case of usury, equity will impose no conditions, but simply grant the new trial, in which the whole contract may be vacated, if the usury be proved. I understand the court here to mean, that upon the new trial, if the jury find the usury, the court of law will render judgment for the defendant, and make an end of the cause, without certifying the verdict to the court of chancery, to be proceeded on there. This is new doctrine to me; and seems to violate both principle, and practice. I find it laid down in many books, that equity cannot set aside a judgment at law: it can on a final hearing order a plaintiff to enter satisfaction; but this is not acting on the judgment directly. It is a power which equity exercises over the person, and evil conscience of the party: but the party may refuse, and stand out in contempt. So, equity may decree a perpetual injunction; but this operates in the same way; not touching at all the jurisdiction of the common law courts, or assuming appellate power. Thus in Barnes v. Powell, 1 Ves. sen. 284, lord Hardwicke says, "though this court cannot set aside a judgment of a common law tribunal, obtained against conscience, yet it will decree the party to acknowledge satisfaction on the judgment though he has received nothing." Every new trial which is granted, is of necessity preceded by setting aside the judgment (if one has been rendered) and verdict, and reinstating 506 the cause. The court of law, *without these steps, cannot have possession of the cause, as it had before. But as equity cannot set aside the judgment, how can it replace the cause on the law docket, and enable the law court to render another judgment on it? It has not the power (as I conceive) nor can I find, that it has ever attempted to exercise it. What it does in such cases, is, to entertain the bill, injoin the judgment at law, till further order, and if a proper case is made, direct a new trial of the issue. This it may do, either in the same or a varied form, and in the same or any other court: in all such cases, the law court has nothing to do, but preside over the trial of the issue, and certify it to the chancery court; which, on the final hearing, administers relief (if at all) on its own principles. Wilson v. Rucker, 1 Call 500; Ross v. Pynes, 3 Call 568. Thus, if judgment be recovered on a bond given on a usurious contract, and the obligor files a bill, stating the usury, and that he had summoned a witness who would have proved it, but he fell sick on his way to court, which, not being known to him, a judgment was obtained on the bonds &c. equity will award an injunction. If the defendant by his answer, confesses the usury, an end will be made of the case at once: if the answer denies the usury, the court will order a new trial of the issues; and if usury be found, will (as I suppose) dissolve the injunction, except as to the usury, interest on the principal sum, and the costs in equity. Or, perhaps, the more correct practice would be, to grant the injunction at first, only for the usurious excess, the interest, and such a sum as would probably cover costs. But, in no such case, could the court of law, or would equity "vacate the whole contract." This would violate two of the fixed and fundamental maxims of equity: that he who asks equity shall do it to the same person; and, that equity will never lend its aid to enforce a penalty. It is under this second head, that unless the bill waves all penalties, a demurrer will hold. Under the first, it is the uniform, unvarying practice of courts of equity, never to relieve against judgments, no matter 507 how gross the fraud *by which they were obtained, but upon the terms of the defendant paying what is justly due; and the same rule applies to any other security binding at law: he who asks equity must do it. It is scarcely worth while to quote cases to prove this: it is laid down in Smith v. Burroughs, 2 Vern. 346, and many other books. Nor does the measure of this relief depend at all on any appeal to the defendant's conscience, or discovery made by him: the rule is precisely the same, whether the case be made out by the discovery of the defendant, or by evidence aliunde. These are mere modes of arriving at truth, and do not affect the principle on which the court proceeds. In all cases, the plaintiff has a right to compel a disclosure from the defendant, provided he does not thereby subject himself to fines, forfeitures, pains or penalties. These are the only grounds of exception; and his confession entitles him to no advantage, save this, that to overweigh his answer (where in his own favour) there must be two witnesses or one with circumstances. These principles are general, and apply as well to cases of usury as others. A defendant, therefore, by confessing the usury, gains nothing, nor can a plaintiff by proving it aliunde, absolve himself from the necessity of doing equity when he asks it.

That this rule* requires of a borrower to return the principal sum, courts of law, so far as their forms will permit, and courts of equity throughout, have proclaimed. We know, that there are actions at law, which are called equitable actions: assumpsit for money had and received, is of that class, and has been likened to a bill in equity. The case of Tomkins v. Bernet, 1 Salk. 22, was an action of assumpsit for money paid on an usurious contract: and lord Mansfield, speaking of it (in Jones v. Barkley, 2 Doug. 697,) says, "the case must have been to recover back what had been paid in part of principal and legal interest upon an usurious contract; and, therefore, the action would not lie; for so far as principal, and legal interest went, the debtor was obliged, in natural justice, to 508 pay; therefore, *he could not recover it back. But for all above legal interest, equity will assist the debtor to retain, if not paid, or an action will lie to recover back the surplus if the whole has been paid." Again; in Fitzroy v. Gwillim, 1 T. R. 153, goods were pawned as a security upon an usurious contract: the borrower brought trover for the goods: lord Mansfield said, "This is an equitable action brought by the plaintiff, in order to be relieved from an usurious contract. She must come, therefore, with clean hands, according to the principle laid down in Bosanquet v. Dashwood, that those who seek equity, must do equity. It was there determined that a court of equity would afford relief in such cases upon payment of principal and interest. A lender upon an usurious contract, is precluded from recovering any thing upon such contract; but if a borrower seek relief, he must first do what is right as between the parties. Here the plaintiff did not tender what had been actually advanced, and cannot therefore have the benefit of this equitable action." Buller and the court agreed with him. This is the language of the court of law.

Turning now to the cases in equity, I shall cite a few to shew that they have been uniform and decisive to the same point. And here the difficulty is, which to select among the multitude that offer. In Henkle v. Royal Exchange Co., 1 Ves. sen. 317, lord Hardwicke lays it down as a general rule, that neither law nor equity will relieve a party to an illicit contract: "But (he says) one exception occurs, in which equity differs from the common law; and that is the case of usury, in which equity suffers the party to the illicit contract to have relief. But that depends on a distinct reason; that whoever brings a bill in a case of usury, must submit to pay principal and interest due, on which the court lays hold, and will relieve; with this further reason, that this court considers usurious contracts, in somewhat a different light from what a court of law does; which considers them upon the foot of the statutes, but this court, as a fraud and advantage taken of necessitous persons." In 509 Brownword v. Edwards*, 2 Ves. sen. 246, and Pit v. Cholmondeley, Id. 567, lord Hardwicke speaks the same language. In Scott v. Nesbit, 2 Bro. C. C. 649, and 2 Cox. 183, there was a judgment at law, and application to equity to set it aside for usury: and lord Thurlow said, "I take it to be a universal rule, that if it be necessary for you to come into this court, to displace a judgment, you must do it upon the equitable terms of paying the principal money really due, with lawful interest; and upon the best consideration I have been able to give the case, I have no idea of doing it upon any other terms." After a few other remarks he concludes thus: "But at any rate, I consider it as a universal rule, that you shall not, in this court, set aside a judgment at law, without offering complete equitable terms, that is to pay principal, with legal interest." In ex parte Scrivener, 3 Ves. & Beam. 14, lord Eldon holds the same language: "at law (he says) you must make out the charge of usury; and in equity, you cannot come for relief, without offering to pay what is really due; and must either prove the usury by legal evidence, or have the confession of the party."

With respect to the case of Cook v. Jones, 2 Cowp. 727, relied on by this court in Marks v. Morris, it is one of a class of cases, of which the books furnish us with some six or seven, viz. Middleton v. Hill, Cro. Eliz. 588; Bush v. Gower, Ca. Temp. Hardw. 233, 2 Stra. 1043; Machin v. Delaval, Barnes's notes 52, 277; Mathews v. Lewis, 1 Anstr. 7; Edmondson v. Popkin, 1 Bos. & Pull. 270; Hindie v. O'Brien, 1 Taunt. 413. These were judgments confessed on warrants of attorney; and an examination of them will shew, how fluctuating and unsteady the practice of the common law courts has been with respect to them. In one, after the jury had found the usury, they ordered the power of attorney and bond to be delivered up: in another, they refused to interfere, saying it was usurping equity jurisdiction: in Hindle v. O'Brien, on a motion to set aside the judgment and direct an issue to try the usury, the 510 other *party admitted the usury; and this rendering an issue useless, the court granted relief upon the principles of a court of equity, compelling the defendant to pay what was really due with legal interest. In Cook v. Jones, the issue was directed; but we have no farther report of the case, and therefore do not know what was the result, whether the usury was proved, and if so, what relief the court of K. B. gave; but when we remember the opinions of lord Mansfield and the court, in the two cases above quoted, we may presume, that they would give none but equitable relief. But, whatever may be the course of the law courts, it is surely no precedent to regulate courts of equity, which administer relief upon their own principles. This very case of Cook and Jones, was cited in the argument of Scott and Nesbit, before lord Thurlow: in his opinion, he merely mentioned the case, and remarked, that there were several cases, where, upon judgments, the courts of law had directed issues to try the question of usury; and then he went on to lay down the universal rule in equity, in the strong language above quoted.

The case of Fanning v. Dunham, 5 Johns. Ch. Rep. 122, was precisely like Marks and Morris; the usurious debt was secured by a mortgage having a power of sale, by which it could be executed without coming into equity; the sale was advertised, and the borrower filed his bill for relief: chancellor Kent reviewed all the cases both at law and in equity, and concluded that there is no relief in equity but upon paying principal and interest. "It is perfectly immaterial (he says) in respect to the application of the principle to the case of the debtor who sues here, whether the usury be confessed by the defendant in his answer, or be made out by proof. The plaintiff must still consent to do what is just and equitable on his part, or the court will not assist him, but leave him to make his defence at law as well as he can."

3. It is laid down by the court in Marks and Morris, that, from the power of the trustee to sell, the borrower is deprived of the possibility of defending himself at law by proving the usury, and the statute 511 repealed as to deeds of *trust, unless equity will, without imposing conditions, stop the trustee, until a court of law can try the usury. But is it true, that the borrower has no mode of defending himself, and pleading the usury without this interposition? I think not. He has given a deed of trust on his land; but he retains possession; that is never taken from him till the sale. Let him hold on still, and forbid the sale; and if the trustee sells, the vendee must bring ejectment, and on the trial of that, I hold that the defendant may shew the usury and defeat the deed, and the whole proceeding under it. This cannot be denied. But it is said, this course would subject the borrower to the hazard of great loss; because the sale of the land, under such a cloud, would be at far less than its value, and then he might fail in the proof of the usury, and the vendee recover in the ejectment. But, how can we suppose he could fail in the proof, when it is a part of his case that he is full handed, and therefore wishes no discovery; and when it is solely because he wants no discovery, that his case is attempted to be taken out of the third section of the statute? And suppose it conceded, that deeds of trust do deprive the borrower of all chance of shewing the usury at law, and do so far elude the statute as to ensure to the usurer his principal, in all cases where these securities are given: would this authorise the court to remove the great land marks, to reverse the fundamental principles of equity? to make it the instrument of enforcing penalties, instead of relieving against them? I trust, that in the appropriate forum, none are prepared to go further than I, in enforcing the statute of usury to its full extent; and I may refer to the case of Whitworth and Adams and others, as evidence of this: but even to effect this important end, I cannot consent to violate principles, which chancellors hold sacred, and to transfer to equity the functions of the law courts. If this is to be done we must call in the legislature. It is the folly of the party to execute such a deed as places him beyond the reach of the law courts. He is just in the same situation, as if he had paid the usurious

512 *claim instead of resisting it; in which case, he can recover back only the usurious excess. The law has put it in the power of every one, who has not deprived himself of the means, to plead the usury, and avoid the whole contract: but if by his own act, or by accident, he has lost these means, he has still the power, by the aid of equity, and under our statute, to procure relief from the usurious exaction, by the payment of the principal received, clear of all interest and costs. In this situation of things, though anxious for the suppression of usury, I am still more anxious to restrain equity within those limits, and to preserve to her those attributes, which have been consecrated by the wisdom of ages.

I have proved (if authority can prove any thing) that, in England, where there is no statute law to that effect, the courts of equity had, before the passing of our statute, established the rule, that a borrower at usury, may be relieved, on the terms of doing equity; that is, paying principal and interest. Can it be doubted, then, that this rule, this practice, of the english courts, was meant to be made law by the third section of our statute? I cannot doubt it. The law in my opinion is as broad as the practice, taking in every case, where the aid of equity is asked, whether from defect of evidence, or any other cause.

But, if it were admitted, that the third section of our statute was restricted to bills of discovery, the conclusion would by no means follow, that in every other case the plaintiff would be absolved from paying the principal borrowed: on the contrary, the equity rule being that in all applications to that tribunal for relief from usury, the borrower must pay principal and interest; if our statute takes bills of discovery only out of that rule, it follows that in all other cases, both principal and interest must be paid. But my opinion is that our act takes in all cases.

Upon the whole, I am firmly convinced, that Marks and Morris is not law, either taken generally, or restricted in its application to deeds of trust. In the case before us, I think the decree ought to be affirmed.

513 *BROOKE, P. The facts of this case bring it within the principle on which the case of Marks and Morris was decided. After the lapse of seventeen years, during which that case has been considered as settling the principle in all similar cases, it was to be expected, that it would not be disturbed, especially as it has been indirectly sanctioned by the omission of the legislature to interfere, a great portion of the members of which have been conversant with it.

It is of more importance to decide the causes in this court, than to settle or unsettle the law: therefore, I shall review the case of Marks and Morris, very briefly.

I cannot think, that that case violated any of the principles of equity, which have been so much insisted on. The court that decided it, were not unmindful of those principles; and its capacity to distinguish and apply them, will best be tested by a short examination of the case itself.

It did not (as I understand it) violate the principle, that a court of equity will not lend its aid to enforce a penalty. In the cases to which that principle is applicable, equity refuses its aid, because it is the peculiar province of the courts of law to enforce penalties; and there has been no necessity, in any of the cases which have been determined on that principle, for equity to open the door of the courts of law, to the party asking its aid. The principle, that he who seeks equity must do equity, had as little application to the case of Marks and Morris; for, there, no relief was to be granted on the merits, though prayed for in the bill. Neither did the case touch any principle applicable to bills for discovery of usury, or to bills to perpetuate testimony: the aid afforded by the court, was not at all of the nature of the aid prayed in a bill to perpetuate testimony; and the bill was not framed on the third section of our statute against usury, relating to bills for discovery of usury. The court only gave its aid, to prevent a sale of the plaintiff's property, under a deed of trust charged to be usurious, until that controversy could be tried in a court of law, or until the defendant should himself

514 resort to the court of equity, *to ask its aid to sell the trust subject under the deed of trust, as in the case of a mortgage, and thus present the question in controversy to the chancellor for adjudication. The court said to the defendant, You shall not execute your deed of trust, by a sale of the plaintiff's property, before he has had an opportunity to contest the validity of the contract, before some competent tribunal; which, but for the contract being in the form of a deed of trust, you could not deprive him of; and you shall not avail yourself of the mere form of the contract, to deprive him of the opportunity to contest the validity of it. Acting diverso intuitu, the court would not, and it did not, forestall the merits of the controversy: it would not look to the consequences of a trial of them: it only held, that there ought to be some opportunity afforded for a fair trial of them. It would not subject the plaintiff, complaining of the usury, to the alternative, of submitting, in silence, to the sale of this property under an illegal contract, before he had had any opportunity of controverting it, or of contributing to that sacrifice of his property, which would result from giving notice of the usury, in the event that he should not be able, after the sale, to prove the usury in a court of law. To impose the first alternative on the plaintiff, would have been to subject him to a penalty, for not paying the money secured by the deed of trust; that is, to a sale of the trust subject, before the validity of the contract was tried in some competent court, as in the case of a mortgage; and the latter alternative would have exposed him to a controversy with the purchasers under the deed of trust, which ought not to have preceded the controversy concerning the validity of the contract; and would have exposed the purchasers to danger, in the event that the usury charged should have been afterwards proved.

The deed of trust, in short, presented a new case, that was to be met by a principle, which, violating none of the established rules of a court of equity, was essential, as well to the policy of the law, as to the justice of the particular case; the principle, namely, that a party shall not, 515 by the *form of his contract, evade a controversy concerning its legal validity, and thereby subject his adversary to consequences from which the law intended to protect him. The interference of the court in Marks and Morris, was, then, clearly within the province of a court of equity; which, though it would not, in such a case, enter into the merits of the controversy, would so far aid the plaintiff, as to send or leave the case to the proper forum.

CABELL and COALTER, J., concurred in the opinion of the president: and the decree of this court reversed the decrees both of the chancellor and of the county court, remanded the cause, and ordered, that the injunction should be reinstated, until the appellees should establish the validity of the contract in some proper tribunal; and in that event, that the injunction should be dissolved, and in the contrary event perpetuated.

*Officers of State Navy.—Half Pay.—The principal case is cited in Lilly v. Com., 1 Leigh 585. Com. v. Marston, 9 Leigh 39, and Tatum v. Com., 9 Leigh 58, by PARKER, J., and approved.

†The reporter hesitated, whether this and Lilly's case (which follows it) were proper to be reported: since they depend on laws and on circumstances prisoner of war unexchanged till end of war, entitled to half pay for life, under act of May session 1779.

Same—Same—Interest.—Officers of state navy entitled to half pay for life, not to be allowed interest on the same.

Same—Same—Full Pay for Five Years in Lieu of.—Officers of state navy not entitled to the commutation of five years full pay with interest thereon, in lieu of half pay for life.

William Duval administrator of James Markham deceased, who was a captain in the state navy of Virginia during the war of the revolution, presented a claim against the commonwealth, to the auditor of public accounts, for the amount of the decedent's half pay for life, under the acts of assembly of May session 1779, ch. 6, and May 1780, ch. 27 (10 Hen. stat. at large, pp. 25, 298,) or for the commutation of five years full pay. The auditor rejected the claim. Markham's administrator appealed from his decision, to the circuit court of Henrico, by which it was approved and affirmed; and from this judgment he appealed to this court.

The case was argued here, by Stanard, J. M'C. Wickham and Leigh, for the appellant, and the Attorney General, for the commonwealth. The state of the case, the several acts of the legislature, and of the executive, on which it depended, and the points of argument, are very fully stated in the opinion of the court, which was delivered by 517 GREEN, J. The facts of this case appear to be these: *James Markham was a captain in the Virginia navy as early as 1779, and continued in actual service until April 1781, when commanding the Tempest, lying in James river, not far below Richmond, his ship was captured, and he taken prisoner, by a detachment of the british army, under the command of general Philips; and he, together with some officers of the Chesterfield militia, and one of his lieutenants, taken prisoners at or about the same time, were paroled on the 28th April 1781. He continued an unexchanged prisoner of war, until the return of peace. The copy of the instrument of parol in the record is dated Camp Osborne's, April 28, 1780. But this is an obvious mistake in the year: for the instrument states, that the prisoner was made so by the british troops under the command of major general Philips, and that Markham was a captain of the navy, commanding the Tempest. The certificate of major Harris, one of the prisoners, states, that he and Markham, with several others, were made prisoners by a detachment of general Philips's army, under the command of general Arnold, and paroled on the 27th April 1781. It is too, an historical fact, that Arnold invaded Virginia late in December 1780, and was in Richmond early in peculiar and local, and therefore involve no general principle: but having observed, that the want of reports of former cases of the kind, had proved very inconvenient and troublesome, both to bench and bar, he thought it best to report them. They are reported here, earlier than in the chronological series of decisions they should be, in order to give early, general and accurate information, to persons having like claims, dispersed over this and many other states of the union.—Note in Original Edition.

January 1781, when he returned to Hampton, where he remained until the arrival of general Philips in April; when the whole force under the command of general Philips moved up James river. And the particular engagement, in which several vessels were destroyed, and these prisoners were taken, is noticed in the histories of the war. Besides, it appears, from the cotemporary acts of the government, that in June 1780, the Tempest was not in a condition for service, and with other ships was then ordered to be repaired, manned, and made ready for the defence of the bay and sea coast, against the apprehended invasion which afterwards took place.

The act of May 1779, ch. 6, "concerning officers, soldiers, sailors and marines," provided, that the officers of the army, both in the state and continental lines, who should serve until the end of the war, 518 and also supernumerary officers, *under certain circumstances, should be entitled to half pay during life, to commence from the termination of their command or service. This act did not extend to the officers of the navy. But, in the session of May 1780, an act passed (ch. 27,) founded upon a series of resolutions, reported by a committee; two of which were in these words: "Resolved, that there be a reform in the navy officers, retaining in the service as many as shall be necessary to command the armed vessels belonging to the commonwealth, of such as are most able and best qualified for the navy service; and that, for the purpose of making this reform, a board shall be constituted, to consist of the commissioner of the navy, and six navy captains, the most approved for their ability, which six captains, shall previous to their appointment to this board, be fixed in their command by the governor with the advice of council"—And, "resolved, that all commissioned officers, the master surgeon and surgeon's mate, in the service of the navy, be entitled to half pay during life, under the same restrictions and limitations as are included in the act of assembly 'concerning officers, soldiers, sailors and marines.'" The act founded upon the string of resolutions, of which the foregoing are a part, followed them, in the main, literally; and, in those respects in which it departed from the phraseology of the resolutions, were indistinct as to the particulars, in which the resolutions were distinct. It seems indeed as if it had been framed under the mouths of the enemy's cannon. Thus, the matter of the two resolutions above quoted, are framed in the act, in this form: "And whereas it is necessary, that no officer should be retained in the marine department, but such as are properly qualified, in order, therefore, to produce this reform, Be it enacted, that a board shall be appointed by the governor with the advice of council, to consist of the commissioner of the navy, and of six of the captains the most approved for their ability, any four of whom, together with the said commissioner of the navy, shall be sufficient to constitute the said board, having 519 been first fixed *in their command in the navy, by the governor with the advice of council; and which said six captains, previous to their appointments to the said board, and before they proceed to business, shall take the following oath: I, A. B. do swear, that I will well and truly discharge the trust in me reposed, for the purpose of producing a reform in the navy, agreeable to the intention of this act, and that I will do the same to the best of my skill and judgment, without favour, affection or partiality." And this is every word in the act touching this subject of reform in the navy. The act proceeds (pursuant to another of the aforesaid series of resolutions) to authorise the appointment of captains and other officers and the enlistment of marines; and then proceeds: "And be it further enacted, that the said captains, together with the subalterns, and all other commissioned officers of the navy, the master surgeon and surgeon's mates, shall be entitled to the same pay and rations, the same privileges and emoluments, and rank in the same degree with the officers of the like rank belonging to the regiments heretofore raised for the internal defence of this state." What was done under the provisions of this act in respect to reforming the officers of the navy, does not appear, the journals of the executive council, from about the time of the passing this act, until January 1781, being lost or destroyed. But it is clear, from the subsequent act of November 1781, ch. 19, (10 Hen. stat. at large, pp. 462, 7,) that it was executed: for the 14th section of that act provides, "that the officers and seamen of the navy of this state, as they stand arranged by a late regulation, shall be entitled to the same advantages, as the officers belonging to this state in the land service agreeable to their respective ranks." The late regulation here referred to, could be no other than that made under the act of May 1780, for the reform of the naval officers. And the above recited clauses of the acts of May 1780 and November 1781, and one found in the act of October 1782, ch. 35, § 3 (11 Hen. stat. at large, p. 161,) providing, that "all officers, seamen, marines, or their representa-

520 tives, *shall be entitled to the same bounty in lands, and other emoluments, as the officers and soldiers of the Virginia line on continental establishment," are the only legislative provisions, under which the officers of the navy could claim to be entitled to half pay for life, under any circumstances. And if any were entitled thereto, it could be only such as were selected and remained in service, according to the regulation made by the board organized under the act of May 1780.

If, therefore, captain Markham was taken prisoner and paroled in April 1780, he could not be so entitled without proof, that he had been so selected; for it cannot be presumed, that in selecting officers for immediate and active service, one in his situation, a prisoner on parole, would have been preferred. But if, as I think was clearly the fact, he was taken prisoner commanding the Tempest in April 1781, he was one of those so selected, and entitled to every right conferred on the officers of the navy by the before recited clauses of the acts of 1780, 1781 and 1782.

Was one of those rights that of receiving half pay for life, upon the conditions prescribed by the act of 1779?

It was insisted, that the legislature had recognized this right as existing in favour of the officers of the navy, in the instance, in which; by a joint resolution of November 31, 1782, they allowed half pay to commodore Taylor for life. That case is however open to this remark, that it appears from the recitals of the resolution, that this was a bounty in consideration of his having received a severe wound in battle, and not as the concession of a right; for he had, in consequence of that wound, retired from the service as early as 1778, and could claim half pay under no construction of the laws whatever. The legislature, however, seemed to admit this right by the act of May 1738, ch. 22 (11 Hen. stat. at large, p. 265,) which directed, "that the auditors should yearly issue to such of the officers of the state line and navy, as are by law entitled to half pay, their warrants for 521 the same." And *the executive have made the same admission, repeatedly; as, by the order in council of January 17, 1782, directing the organization of a board of officers, for the purpose of discriminating such officers, both of the army and navy, as by unworthy conduct or otherwise, be thought unfit to be considered as entitled to half pay, in pursuance of the act of November 1781, ch. 19, § 10, although the act, by its terms, confined such inquiry and discrimination to the officers of the army only: and again, by an order of council of May 13, 1784, organizing a board of officers, for making such a discrimination between officers of the navy only, in respect to whom the former order had not been executed by the former board.

Under this last order of May 1784, the board of officers acted, and made a report, which the executive approved, and transmitted to "the auditors, as their guide in granting half pay to the officers of the navy."

In the mean time, the legislature, by a joint resolution of both houses, having the form of a law, on the 22d December 1783, directed "the auditors not to issue any more warrants for the half pay of the officers of the state line, until the further order of the general assembly." And no further order has since been given by the assembly upon the subject, except that, by the act of October 1790, ch. 21 (13 Hen. stat. at large, p. 131,) it was provided, that, "whereas doubts have arisen whether certain officers hereinafter described, have a right to the compensation of half pay; for the removal of such doubts," it was enacted, "that the same compensation of half pay should be extended to those officers of the state line, who continued in actual service to the end of the war, as was allowed to the officers of the continental line; and also to those who became supernumerary and being afterwards required did again enter into actual service and continue therein to the end of the war; any act or acts to the contrary notwithstanding." The act of May 1783 authorised warrants for half pay to issue to officers of the state line and navy. The resolution of December 522 1783, *prohibited their issuing to officers of the state line only; not in terms embracing those of the navy: a distinction for which I can conceive no possible reason. The order in council of May 13th 1784, before mentioned, and another of May 27th, transmitting the report of the board of officers to the auditors, as their guide in allowing half pay to the officers of the navy, indicate, that the executive did not consider the resolution of December 1783, as extending to the officers of the navy, nor in respect to them, as suspending the execution of the act of May 1783. But it seems to me, that the case of the officers of the navy came within the reason of that resolution, and was consequently embraced in it; and if so, that resolution being revoked by the act of 1790, as to such officers of the state line as came within the description of that act, was also, upon an equitable construction, revoked as to the officers of the navy of the same description, the revocation being in the same terms as the prohibition—officers of the state line. The only difference between holding that the officers of the navy were, or were not, embraced in that prohibition and revocation, is, that, if not embraced in it, they might claim under the act of May 1779 (if they could claim at all) when they had served to the end of the war, from that time or from the date of their commissions, or being supernumerary, again entered into the service, if required so to do, and continued therein until the end of the war: but if embraced in it, then they could claim (if at all) only under the act of 1790, by shewing that they continued in actual service to the end of the war, or being supernumerary did again enter into actual service, and continue therein to the end of the war—the difference between the two acts, so far as related to an officer who was a prisoner upon parole, being that arising from the difference between the expressions “in service,” and “in actual service.” This difference in the phraseology of the two acts, does not, I think, vary their construction, in respect to the case of a prisoner of war upon parole, who, as was held by the court of appeals in Nelson's case, decided in 1791, was in actual *service, within the spirit of the act of 1790. Neither the resolutions of December 1873, nor the last mentioned act, presented any impediment to Markham's claim to his warrant for half pay during his life, under the act of May 1783, if he was an officer legally entitled thereto. And being an officer of the navy, selected and retained under the act of May 1780, and having served thenceforth to the end of the war, he was entitled, if any officer of the navy could be entitled, under any circumstances.

I have already noticed that there is no act, which in terms allowed half pay in any case to any officers of the navy. They were allowed the same privileges, emoluments and advantages, as the officers of the army. And but for the cotemporary construction given to those terms by the act of May 1783, and the proceedings of the executive before noticed, I should have thought it extremely doubtful, whether those expressions included the contingent half pay, as there were many privileges (such as an exemption from taxes during service) emoluments (such as the right to a supply of necessaries of all sorts, at prime cost, through the agency of public functionaries &c.) and advantages (such as having their pay made good from the 1st January 1777, according to the scale of depreciation) to which those expressions might be applied, without embracing the contingent bounty of half pay. And there are other circumstances which seem to indicate, that half pay was not contemplated by the provisions. Yet, upon the whole, the question, as an original one, is so doubtful, that I think the cotemporary interpretation adopted by the legislature and executive, ought now to prevail; and that captain Markham should be declared to have been entitled to half pay during his life, to commence from the time of the general exchange of prisoners, which was the 1st May 1783. Consequently, that the first half pay was due May 1, 1784, the act of May 1783, directing the warrants for half pay to be issued yearly.

After this opinion was announced, two other questions arose, and were argued at the bar: 1. Whether captain 524 *Markham's representative was entitled to half pay for his life, or to the commutation of five years' full pay? 2. Whether he was entitled to interest?

GREEN, J. In all the cases, in which, after the passage of the act of 1790, the district court gave judgment in favor of officers claiming half pay, they were allowed the commutation of five years' full pay, with interest, from the date of the proclamation of peace, at the rate of six per cent. in lieu of half pay. This was founded upon the idea, that the expression in the act of 1790, “as was allowed to the officers of the continental line,” was intended to give those of the state line, the same commutation, which had been given by congress, to the officers of the continental line. And the court of appeals sanctioned this construction; for whilst they reversed almost all the judgments of the general court upon the ground that the officers in question, had not served until the end of the war, and were, therefore, not entitled under the act of 1790, or the previous laws, yet they affirmed the judgments in three cases, in which they held that the parties had served to the end of the war. One of these, was that of Churchill Gibbs, who was taken prisoner in May 1781, and continued a prisoner of war from that time till the end of the war. It was only by force of the provisions of the act of 1790, that commutation and interest, in lieu of half pay for life, could be allowed. That act was confined, in its terms, to officers of the state line, not extending to those of the navy, and the former laws, putting the officers of the navy upon the footing of those of the army, in respect to all privileges, emoluments and advantages, referred only to such as were then allowed them, and not to such as might thereafter be allowed; consequently, officers of the navy could not claim commutation under the act of 1790, and Markham was entitled to half pay from the 1st May 1783, when he was exchanged, until his death, according to the opinion originally given in this case; but without interest, for the reasons assigned in Lilly's case.

525 *Commonwealth v. Lilly's Adm'r.

April, 1830.

(Absent CABELL, J.)*

Officers of State Navy—Half Pay.—An officer of the state navy of Virginia during the war of the revolution, who became supernumerary before and so continued till the end of the war, entitled to half pay for life, under the act of May 1779.

Same—Same—Limitations.—The act of limitations does not apply to such a claim: nor does the lapse of time, from 1783 when the claim accrued till 1826 when it was asserted, under the circumstances of the case, afford any presumption of payment or of abandonment of the claim.

By the act of assembly of May session 1779, ch. 6, (10 Hen. stat. at large, p. 25,) it was among other things enacted, that "all general officers of the army, being citizens of this commonwealth, and all field officers, captains and subalterns commanding or who shall command, in the battalions raised for the immediate defence of this state, or for the defence of the U. States, and all chaplains, physicians, surgeons and surgeons' mates, appointed to the said battalions, or any of them, being citizens of this commonwealth, and not being in the service of Georgia, or of any other state, (provided congress do not make tantamount provision for them) who shall serve from henceforward, or from the time of their being commissioned, to the end of the war—and all such officers, who have or shall become supernumerary on the reduction of any of the said battalions, and shall again enter into the said service, if required so to do, in the same or any higher rank, and continue therein until the end of the war—shall be entitled to half pay during life, to commence from the determination of their command or service."

And by the act of May 1780, ch. 27, (Id. p. 298,) it was provided, that "the captains, together with the subalterns and all other commissioned officers in the service of the navy [of the state], the master surgeon and surgeon's mates, shall be entitled to the same pay and rations, the same

526 *privileges and emoluments, and rank in the same degree with officers of the like rank belonging to regiments heretofore raised for the internal defence of the state."†

*He was nearly related to persons deeply interested in the question.

‡Statute of Limitations.—See monographic note on "Limitation of Actions" appended to Herrington v. Harkins, 1 Rob. 591.

§The words of the two acts of May 1779 and May 1780, are here quoted, because much of the argument at the bar, and of the reasoning of the judges, depended on a critical examination of them. There are various other acts, both of the legislature and of the executive, that relate to the subject: laws, resolutions, and proceedings of the assembly, and orders of council: but these are referred to in the opinion of the court in the preceding case of Markham, and in the following opinions of the judges in this case; and, therefore, it is unnecessary to recite them in this place.—Note in Original Edition.

Thomas Lilly was a captain in the state navy, and was commissioned as early as August 1776, and served, if not to the end of the war, at least as long as there was any naval service, in which he could be employed. He certainly retained his commission till the war was ended. He died in 1798.

In 1826, John Chowning his administrator presented a claim against the commonwealth, for captain Lilly's half pay for life, or for the commutation of five years' full pay, to the auditor, who rejected it. The claimant appealed to the circuit court of Henrico, which reversed the auditor's decision, and ordered him to issue a warrant on the treasury, for the amount of five years' full pay, with interest from the 22d April 1783. From this judgment, the attorney general took an appeal, for the commonwealth, to this court.

The case was argued here, by the Attorney General, for the commonwealth, and by Stanard, J. M'C. Wickham, and Leigh, for the appellee.

I. The attorney general insisted, that the claim was barred by the statute of limitations, as the auditor alleged in assigning his reasons for rejecting the claim; and if that statute did not present a positive bar, the lapse of forty-three years (from 1783 to 1826) was a sufficient reason, in the absence of any positive limitation, for rejecting 527 ing the claim. The *counsel for the appellee answered, that there was not a single provision of the statute of limitations, that could, by any violence of construction, be held applicable to this claim; and that as that statute could never be pleaded against, so neither could it be pleaded for, the commonwealth. And as to the lapse of time affording a reason for rejecting the claim, that could only have such an effect, by affording a presumption of payment; and this presumption was not merely rebutted by the evidence: there was conclusive proof that the debt had never been paid. Neither had it been abandoned: the courts of justice had repelled the claim of some of Lilly's brother officers, and he remained silent in despair.

II. The question of fact was discussed upon the evidence, whether captain Lilly continued in actual service, till the end of the war, or ceased to be employed in actual service before the end of the war, in consequence of the reduction of the naval establishment? And upon this question, two of the judges inclined to the opinion, that he continued in actual service till the end of the war, and that he became a supernumerary, before, and so continued till, the end of the war. So that

III. The principal questions remained, and were very earnestly contested: Whether, supposing him a supernumerary, he was entitled to half pay for life? or to commutation of five years' full pay? and if to either, whether his representative was entitled to interest?

CARR, J. This is the case of a naval officer of the revolution, suing for his half pay. I shall take it for granted, that he stands on the same ground with an officer of the state line.

Two questions were presented, and were most ably and elaborately argued: 1st, Did Lilly serve to the end of the war? 2nd, If he did not, is he entitled to Half pay, under the act of 1779, as a supernumerary officer?

Upon the first question, taking all the circumstances into view; the high reputation of Lilly for zeal and activity; 528 *his appointment as one of the board of officers; the report of that board in his favour; the application of himself with others, at an early day, when every thing was fresh, to be permitted to establish his claim, professing to be then ready to do so; the long lapse of time since; and the testimony of five witnesses, that they believed he served to the end of the war: taking all these things into view, I feel much inclined to think, that the safest conclusion would be, to say, that he did serve to the end of the war: but, though inclined to this conclusion, I cannot rest upon it, with the confidence necessary to make it the ground of my decision. I am, therefore, reluctantly driven to the examination of the second question—I say reluctantly—for I believe there are few men, less disposed than myself, to disturb the decisions of this court, made by the enlightened judges who have gone before us. Cases, however, do sometimes arise, in which our respect for their decisions must yield to a more imperious duty. It is under a strong feeling of this duty, and a due sense of the responsibility of this step, that I proceed to the discussion of this question.

Let us advert to the words of the act of 1779. (Here the judge quoted the act verbatim.) It is clear to me, that it was not the effect or intention of the act of 1790 to repeal this act of 1779; and this was properly admitted by the attorney general (whose zeal and ability in the discharge of his duties, deserve all praise). It is by this act then, that the claim of the supernumerary must stand or fall.

Before we come to a strict analysis of the words of this law, let us advert for a moment, to the situation of the country at its passage. We were in the fourth year of the revolutionary war; a gloomy period, strongly marked with danger, difficulty, and depression: Virginia, without money, except a paper currency fast hastening to its dissolution, had to raise and keep on foot troops, for continental service and state defence: her armies and navy had been in the service several years, almost without pay or clothing, and their situation was wretched indeed. What was the 529 *state to do? She had but one resource; to draw largely on the future; to promise liberality; to hold out alluring prospects. The numerous expedients she resorted to for that purpose, may be seen by all who will turn to the laws of that day. To retain in the service experienced officers, was a most important object; nor was it found easy to effect this, after the first fire of enthusiasm had been cooled by three years' suffering, while their present pay was almost nothing, and the ability of the state to make good its promises, was a problem only to be solved by the event of the struggle. Hence, we find various laws adding new inducements as the difficulty increased; promising additional bounties, and lands, and half pay for life, and other advantages. To this class, the law before us belongs. It promises half pay for life: let us inquire to whom, and on what terms? First, to officers in service, who shall serve to the end of the war. If the law had stopped here, there could have been no doubt. All officers found in service at the close of the war would have been clearly entitled. But there was another class, for whom the assembly felt it to be just and thought it important to provide, "all such officers, who have, or shall become supernumerary," &c. What is a supernumerary? He is just as much an officer as any other: but his battalion, or corps has been reduced or disbanded, or so arranged in some way, as to leave him, for the present, no command; and the state, to save the expence of full pay and subsistence, discharges him from actual service. This is no reproach to the officer, and does not in the slightest degree affect his standing: he is supernumerary to-day, because it suited the purposes, or was compelled by the necessities of the state: to-morrow she calls him to the camp, and he is an officer in actual service. At the passage of this act, the history, and the laws of the period tell us, there were a great number of supernumeraries; men inferior to none; men to whom the state was as deeply indebted for past service, and whose future services she deemed it as important to retain, as those of the officers in actual service:

530 *for these men, under the name of supernumeraries, in contradistinction to officers in actual service, the law meant to provide: "all such officers, who have, or shall become supernumerary on the reduction of any of the said battalions, and shall again enter the said service, if required so to do, in the same or any higher rank, and continue therein until the end of the war, shall be entitled to half pay during life," &c. Now, I ask, how does this sentence strike the plain common sense of every man? And we must not forget, that it was to the common sense of the country this law was addressed; and that an important object of it was, to hold out inducements to those in the service, to continue there, and to others to enter into it. Did the assembly mean to say to the supernumeraries, we have put you out of actual service to suit our convenience: we hold you bound to return the moment we call you, and if we should choose to call you into service again, and you continue in it to the end of the war, you shall have the half pay; but if we do not recall you, you shall have nothing? Would this have been just? Would it have had the effect intended, to induce the supernumeraries to hold their commissions? Or can the words be tortured into such a meaning? If it had not been intended to provide for supernumeraries, not again called into service, why mention them at all by that name? When they enter the service again, they cease to be supernumeraries: they are officers in service, and if serving at the end of the war, they come directly within the first clause of the law, which says, "that all officers who shall continue to serve to the end of the war, shall be entitled to half pay." But let us look again at the law. "All officers who are now supernumerary, and shall again enter the service if required so to do." What do these words "if required so to do" mean? Are they surplusage? If not, they must operate as a condition, limiting the effect of the preceding words: for example, strike out the words "if required so to do," and the sentence is, "all supernumeraries, who shall again enter the service &c.

shall be entitled to half pay"—making 531 ing *the re-entering into service, an absolute, unqualified prerequisite to the claim of half pay. Insert the words, and it is "all supernumeraries if required so to do," &c. shall have half pay—making requisition a preliminary, a condition precedent, that without which the failure to re-enter the service, should present no objection to the claim of half pay. Is not this the plain vernacular, as well as legal meaning? Does not the conjunction if, always import a condition? The plain meaning of the sentence, then, (to my understanding) is this: Supernumeraries, if never again called into service, are entitled to half pay, to commence from the determination of their command; but, if again called, they forfeit their claim, unless they enter again into the service, and continue therein to the end of the war. And was it not just in the legislature, to place supernumerary officers on this footing? To hold out to them this inducement to retain their commissions? To say to them, "you have served us faithfully, until we put you out of actual service, for no fault of yours, but for our convenience. This, however, shall do you no injury: We do not know how soon we may want your services again; we, therefore, retain the power of re-calling you into service; if we do so, you will then stand on the ground of all other officers: so that, either as supernumeraries, not again called on, or as officers serving to the end of the war, you shall have a right to claim half pay." Ought we to put such a construction on this law, as would give the right, after all actual hostility was over, to reduce her armies to a regiment or a company, discharge the great mass of her officers as supernumerary, and then repel their claim to half pay, by telling them, you are supernumeraries, never called again into service; and, therefore, not within the law. To me it seems, that to suppose the legislature meant, under the cover of the words used, to conceal such a power, would be to dishonour them, by a charge of premeditated deception. I beg to be distinctly understood: I mean to express simply what I should feel, understanding the words of the law, to hold out the meaning, 532 *which to me they seem to do. I have (and I trust I need hardly say so), the highest possible respect, both for those judges who heretofore have, and for my brethren who now hold opinions opposite to my own, on this subject. We differ as to the meaning of the law; that is all.

But, it is said, a supernumerary could not again enter the service, without being required, nor refuse to enter, if required; and that, therefore, the words, "if required so to do," are mere surplusage. It is clear, that a supernumerary could not re-enter the service, without being again called to it; and this, under the construction against which I contend, would make his case the harder. Whether, being required to re-enter, he could refuse, I shall not stop to inquire; remarking only, that if the ordinance of 1775, under which the power of coercion is claimed, was still in force, it could apply only to troops raised, and officers commissioned, under later laws. But suppose I admit the premises, does the conclusion (that the words are surplusage) follow? Say, that a supernumerary could not re-enter the service, without being required, and could not disobey a requisition, is it impossible that the assembly might mean to pass a law, giving him a right to half pay, if never again called into service? And are we at liberty, upon the assumption of this impossibility, to strike out of the law the words, "if required to do so?" Words so significant, that it is impossible to suppose, they were used through inadvertence; so clear, that it seems difficult to mistake them; and so operative, that they change the whole effect of the law. It is also said, that if my construction be given to the law, a supernumerary re-called into service, and again becoming supernumerary, and then, not serving to the end of the war, would still be entitled to half pay; and thus the emphatic words of the law, "and continue therein to the end of the war," would be rendered superfluous and useless. I cannot conceive the correctness of this conclusion. My construction is this: that a supernumerary, if never required to re-enter the service, is entitled to half pay; if re- 533 quired, that *he must re-enter: then, he is an officer in service, and like all others in service, he must continue therein to the end of the war, unless he is again put out of service; in that case he is again a supernumerary; standing precisely on the ground occupied by every other supernumerary; subject to be re-called, and if re-called, bound to serve through the war; but if never re-called, entitled to half pay. In this, there seems to me, nothing inconsistent with the words or spirit of the law or the justice of the case; but every thing in harmony with them all.

Let us now look to the contemporaneous exposition of this statute, for this is said to be fortissima in lege. In December 1781, a memorial of the officers, was referred by the legislature, to a committee of their body, of which Patrick Henry was chairman. Among many resolutions reported by the chairman in favour of the memorialists, was the following: "that they are entitled to half pay, commencing from the termination of their command, on their becoming supernumerary from the reduction of the battalions or corps to which they belonged; subject, however, to be called upon, to take command in the same, or higher rank; and to forfeiture of their pay, on refusing to take command when thereto required." Here we have an exposition of the act, by men who assisted most probably in forming it; an exposition given but little better than two years after its passage. Did the legislature disapprove of this construction? No! for upon the subject of these very resolutions, at the same session, it passed a law, in which it recognized the right of supernumeraries to half pay: I mean the 10th section of the act to be found in 10 Hen. stat. at large, 466. "Whereas by the reduction of battalions and corps in the state service, a considerable number of officers have become supernumerary: Be it enacted, that a return of all the state officers shall be made to the next assembly, wherein the corps, the rank of each officer, the date of his commission, the number of men at first raised in each corps, number of men when reduced, 534 and time when reduced, *shall be particularly specified by the executive; and the executive are hereby empowered and required, to set on foot proper inquiries, to discriminate such officers as by unworthy conduct, or by any means whatever, may be thought unfit, to be entitled to half pay." Thus explicitly recognizing the right of supernumeraries to half pay, unless forfeited by unworthy conduct, or some other means, which, in the opinion of the executive, might render them unfit to be considered as entitled; treating it as a right, then vested, and existing, where not affected by some extrinsic circumstance: and this, be it remembered, was in 1781; more than twelve months before the close of the war. In consequence of this law, a board was formed, who reported to the executive a list of the officers, as entitled to half pay; and the executive approved of it, and sent it to the auditors for their guide in issuing warrants. This, also, was before the close of the war, and shews that the executive of that day thought with the legislature, that the supernumerary was entitled to half pay, without being re-called, and serving to the end of the war. In May 1783, just after the peace, the assembly passed an act (11 Hen. stat. at large, p. 265), directing the auditors to issue to such officers of the state line and navy, as by law are entitled to half pay, their warrants for the same, and to return the amount of said warrants to the next assembly, that adequate funds might be provided for the discharge of the same. This act is unquestionably based upon the idea, that there were supernumerary officers entitled to half pay at a period prior to the end of the war. And under this act, warrants were issued to supernumeraries not again called into service. In December 1783, the auditors addressed a note to the attorney general (Edmund Randolph) requesting his opinion, whether the act of 1779 gave half pay to supernumeraries, though not called again into service: he answered, "I never doubted, that the just construction of the act warrants the claim of supernumerary officers to half pay, though they never returned to service, provided they never refused 535 to *do so." Here is the law officer of the commonwealth, specially appointed to watch over and protect her rights, declaring that he never had a doubt of the right of supernumeraries to half pay. This is a mass of contemporaneous exposition of the highest and most imposing character; it is ex visceribus temporis. Coming to the judiciary, the whole general court were in favour of the right, and so was the venerable chancellor Wythe, whose argument on the subject, seems to me irresistibly strong. On the other side, are the decisions of this court clearly given against the right. If these opposing decisions and opinions have no other effect, I think they may at least be said to leave the subject open; and this has reconciled me the more to taking it up and forming an opinion for myself upon it. This I have done to the best of my ability, and am in favour of affirming the judgment.

GREEN, J. I have, from time to time, since this case was last argued, devoted all my faculties to its examination, not only on account of the intrinsic difficulties of the question which it presents, and of the important interest involved in the decision of it, but on account of the remarkable difference of opinion respecting it, existing for more than forty years in the legislative and judicial departments of the government. The question is, whether the supernumerary officers of the state line and navy of Virginia, (who were put upon the same footing, in that respect, as was decided in Markham's case) are entitled to half pay for life, although not serving to the end of the war, if not required to do so. For, captain Lilly did not serve to the end of the war, in the sense of the act of 1779, even if the war were to be considered as ending with the capture of lord Cornwallis's army.

I thought, until very recently, that there were strong motives to influence the legislature in making a discrimination between those who served to the end of the war, and supernumeraries, (especially the great 536 number becoming so, by *the reduction of fourteen regiments or battalions, in 1777, from ten to eight companies, and never again called into the service,) and that such a discrimination had been made: That neither the words "command or service," nor the provision for supernumeraries, in the act of 1779, were rendered nugatory by that construction; because the words, "command or service" might well be applied distributively, to officers, who, when in actual service, had a command, and such as had no command, as chaplains, physicians, &c. and because a special provision was necessary for supernumeraries, if they were intended to be provided for in any case whatever; since none such, whether then being or thereafter becoming supernumerary, could claim under the former part of the provision, as they could not claim as having served 'henceforth [from the passing of the act] or from the time of their being commissioned, until the end of the war.' That no subsequent act of legislation, had varied or settled the construction of the act of 1779: and that no construction could be put upon the words of the act of 1779, which would not have the effect of rendering nugatory, or superfluous and unmeaning, either the expression, "if required so to do," or the expression to serve to "the end of the war;" to secure which service, seemed to be the whole object and policy of the statute. And if one or the other of those expressions were to be rejected as mere surplusage, I could not hesitate between them. This would be the necessary consequence, if the expression, "if required so to do," referred to and qualified only the preceding expression, "and shall again enter into the said service," and not the subsequent expression also, "and continue therein until the end of the war;" in which case, the last expression would impose an absolute condition, not qualified by the expression, "if required so to do." And this was the natural effect of the words in the context in which they stood.

Subsequent reflection has satisfied me, that I was mistaken in this last particular. It does much less violence to the language of the statute, to consider the expression, 537 "if required *so to do," as prevailing and qualifying the whole sentence, than to reject it as mere surplusage; to make it read, in effect, as if those words were transposed to the beginning or end of the sentence, thus: "and shall, if required so to do, again enter into the said service, in the same or any higher rank, and continue therein until the end of the war;" or, "and shall again enter into the said service, in the same or any higher rank, and continue therein until the end of the war, if required so to do." The expression, "in the same or any higher rank," fortifies this construction: it seems to have been inserted for the purpose of preventing the government from requiring an officer to enter the service again, in a rank inferior to that in which he had before served, and thus, if he refused, to impose upon him the forfeiture of his right to half pay. These words, taken in connexion with the words, "if required so to do," and treated in the same way, would give a meaning to the whole sentence, as if it were written, "and shall again enter into the said service, and continue therein until the end of the war, if required so to do, in the same or a higher rank:" and this, I think, is the true construction of the statute. Captain Lilly was, therefore, entitled to half pay for life.

Has any thing occurred to impair that right? The statute of limitations does not; this is not any action, or in the nature of any action, limited by that act: it is a claim, founded upon legislative acts, presented in the peculiar form prescribed by law. Nor does the question arise, whether the joint resolution of the two houses of the general assembly of December 1783, prohibiting the issuing of warrants or certificates, for half pay, until the further order of the general assembly, and which was repealed by the act of 1790, only so far as related to the officers of the state line, who had served to the end of the war, is an impediment to the claim of Lilly's representatives; for that resolution did not embrace the officers of the navy. The warrant ought, in point of law, to have been issued when applied for.

538 The only question which remains is, whether interest ought to be allowed upon the arrears of half pay? I do not think it should. The real and intrinsic difficulty in these questions, in respect to the half pay of officers of the state line and navy, not serving to the end of the war; the conflicting opinions, in the judiciary and legislative departments, on that subject; and the final decision of the court of appeals, against those claims; excuse the government from the imputation of any wrongful delay in satisfying them; and the laches is on the part of the claimants, or at least on the part of such of them as might, without impediment, have resorted to the courts of justice.

539 *COALTER, J. This is a case of great consequence to the state, as well as to the individual who is the appellee in the case, inasmuch as it involves the interesting and much agitated question, whether a supernumerary officer of the revolutionary army, in the state line, who was never called into service, after he became supernumerary, is entitled to half pay, under the act of 1779?

Lilly, the intestate of the appellee, was a captain in the navy, commissioned before the adoption of the constitution, in January 1776, and also by the governor afterwards, in August 1776. He died in 1798, and administration was granted to John Chowning (who intermarried with his daughter) in February 1826, who soon thereafter exhibited his claim to the auditor.

The attorney for the commonwealth, has pleaded the statute of limitations, as a bar to the claim; and has also relied on the lapse of time, as evidence of payment or abandonment of claim.

As to the former; as the claim rests upon the laws of the land, and the commission under the seal of the commonwealth, without examining the other objections taken to the plea, I think it cannot be pleaded as an absolute bar to the claim. As to the presumption of payment, I think the detail which will be given hereafter, of the resistance of the state, for a long time, to all claims for half pay, even in case of service during the war, will furnish conclusive proof that he could not have been paid. And as to abandonment of his claim, he

"All general officers of the line in the continental army, being citizens of this commonwealth, and all field officers, captains, and subalterns commanding the troops of this commonwealth on continental establishment, and accounted a part of the quota of this commonwealth, who shall serve henceforward, or from the time of their being commissioned until the end of the war, shall be entitled to half pay during life, to commence from the determination of their command."

1. Amended by striking out "line in the continental," by inserting "in," after "commanding," and inserting "battalions" in lieu of "troops."

2. By striking out "and accounted a part of the quota of this commonwealth," and inserting in lieu thereof "or serving in the battalions raised for the immediate defence of this state," and by adding afterwards, and after "defence of this state," the words "or for the defence of the United States, being citizens of this commonwealth, and not being in the service of Georgia or of any other state: provided congress do not make some tantamount provision for them."

3. And by inserting after "end of the war," the words "and all such officers as have or shall become supernumerary on the reduction of any of the said battalions, and shall again enter into the said service, whenever required so to do, in the same or any higher rank, and continue therein until the end of the war."

Amendments in the senate.

1. By striking out in the last amendment above mentioned, "whenever," and inserting in lieu thereof, "if."

2. By inserting after the word in the original bill "commanding," the words, "or shall command."

The other amendments cannot be traced: but those above noticed fortify the construction in favour of supernumeraries not again called into service.—Note in Original Edition.

may have done so, in despair of obtaining it; but there is no evidence that he ever doubted of its justice. In May 1784, he joined with the other officers of the army and navy, in a strong memorial and remonstrance to the legislature, against the resolution of December preceding, which inhibited the auditors from issuing warrants for half pay, according to the lists certified to them by the executive, as their guide in issuing such warrants; but without success. He witnessed the struggle carried on by many of those officers, before the courts of justice, in the years 1791, 1792, *and 1793, (as will hereafter be in some measure detailed); and soon after sunk into his grave, unrewarded, if he was entitled to it, for those meritorious services, which the witnesses concur in saying he rendered during the war.

I am strongly inclined to think, that captain Lilly served from 1776, until after the 31st March 1783; on which day, the governor having laid before the council, information from our own delegates in congress, that news of a general peace had been received, and that congress had recalled her armed naval commissions, he is advised to discontinue the armaments for bay defence, and dismiss the navy. I shall not, however, go into the examination of those circumstances, which satisfy me of the great probability of this fact. Nor will I demonstrate, as I think I could, that he served at least until the navy was nearly demolished, being reduced to a single vessel, the look-out boat Liberty, by the act of November session 1781. And although, after that, it was somewhat increased for bay defence, and so continued until April 1783, yet I am now going on the admission that Lilly did not serve after the great reduction above spoken of.

After the reduction of York, the enemy were shut up in their strongholds, in New York and Charleston: so that, with the exception of a contemptible naval force, which occasionally infested our waters, we had nothing to fear, until Great Britain should fit out a new armament against us. This was not expected; inasmuch as sir Guy Carleton, very soon after that event, notified us, that a commissioner had gone to Paris, authorized to negotiate a general peace on the basis of american independence. Until this should take place, however, it was important to keep on foot the continental troops, and, indeed, to fill up the quotas of the states in that line, at the same time that prudence required a diminution of our corps for state defence, in order to economize our means for a future struggle, should that become necessary; the probability of which, however, was daily diminishing. In pursuance of this policy, the legislature, at the November session 1781, (10 Hen. stat. at large, 499,) directed *a reduction of the officers of the state line, and a consolidation of the troops into one corps, &c. which being effected, many officers were rendered supernumerary; and this course was ordered to be pursued, from time to time, as the time of service of the troops expired, which were not to be recruited by new levies; but, on the contrary, laws were passed, authorizing enlistments to be made from the state line into the continental; and, finally, such of the cavalry as had not re-enlisted, were ordered to be discharged: so that, on the last arrangement of the troops by colonel Dabney, in February 1783, very few officers remained in his legion, who could serve, literally, to the end of the war. As to the navy, the act above referred to, reciting that it was necessary to husband the resources of the state, with the utmost economy, and since our finances did not admit of putting the navy on a footing, productive of any public benefit, adequate to its expenditure, directs the officers of every denomination to be reduced, except so many as might be necessary for the command of the look-out boat Liberty.

This act had been preceded by one of May 1780, (10 Hen. stat. at large, 297,) which recites, that whereas it is necessary that no officers should be retained in the marine department, but such as are properly qualified; to effect which reform, the governor is directed to constitute a board to consist of the commissioners of the navy, and six of the captains, the most approved for their ability, who, having been first fixed in their command, should perform that duty. The executive was to select these, and fix them in their command, that they might, with impartiality, proceed to the delicate duties of their appointment. This board was constituted, and made its report; and I have no doubt but that captain Lilly, who was not only one of the oldest, but, as all the testimony establishes, among the most meritorious of the corps, was a member of this board.

The legislature furthermore, during the same session of 1781, and after the act reducing the army and navy as aforesaid, passed the act (10 Hen. stat. at large, 542 462), for adjusting *the pay and accounts of the officers and soldiers of the Virginia line on continental establishment, and also of the officers, soldiers, sailors and marines in the service of this state; in which, amongst other things, it is provided, that whereas by the reduction of battalions and corps in the state service, a considerable number of officers have become supernumerary, a return of all the state officers shall be made; and the executive was thereby empowered and required to set on foot proper inquiries to discriminate such officers, as by unworthy conduct, or by any means whatever, be though unfit to be considered as entitled to half pay. This discrimination was made, in part, early in 1782. That which sifted the navy had already been made, as above stated. The legislature, therefore, when they come to speak of the navy, in this act, say, that the officers of the navy as they stand arranged by a late regulation, shall be entitled to the same advantages as the officers belonging to this state in the land service.

The act of 1779, it is admitted on all hands, promises half pay to the officers, as well of the continental as state line, who continued in service to the end of the war. It is true, the officers of the navy are not expressly mentioned in this act; but many subsequent acts, either to be taken as explanatory of this act, or as substantive provisions, extend the same benefit to the navy, as has been decided by us in Markham's case; so that officers of the navy are equally entitled with officers of the state line. The supernumeraries contemplated by the act of 1779, were such as were unavoidably thrown out of service, by the necessary reduction of the corps, until they could be reinstated by new levies; not such, as became so in consequence of a great victory, changing the whole face of affairs, and, in fact, putting an end to the war, as the capture of York did; after which new levies were not desirable, but the reverse.

What is meant by service to the end of the war? In the case of privates, it is often said, if you serve to the end of the war, unless sooner discharged. This form

543 of expression *is also sometimes used as applicable to officers. Thus the resolution of congress of the 16th September 1776, gave a land bounty to the officers and soldiers who shall engage in the service, and continue therein to the close of the war, or until discharged by congress. Supposing this to be a contract between the state and her citizens, the law of contracts is, that if there is a precedent condition to be performed by the plaintiff to entitle him to his reward, and the defendant pleads that he has not performed it, it is a good replication to say, I was ready and offered to perform, but you prevented the performance. But it has been argued, that there was no contract, because there was no mutuality; the officer not being obliged to serve, but at liberty to resign: and that half pay was a mere gratuity, in which case, a man, to entitle himself to a gratuity, must shew strict performance, substantial performance not being enough. The doctrine on this last point is this: if A. owes B. 100 dollars, and B. says to him, if you will pay me 90 dollars on or before a given day, I will release you from the debt, and A. pays him on that day, 89 dollars only, he cannot claim to be released: but suppose B. had dispensed with the payment of the one dollar for his own convenience, or obstructs the payment of it, or refuses to receive any more than the 89 dollars, although the party is ready and offers to pay the whole. But I deny that half pay was a gratuity. The government had failed to pay its officers, according to original stipulation. The paper money had depreciated, long before the act of 1779, to such a degree that it did not afford the officer the necessities of life, so far from being a compensation for toil and peril. This is a matter of history, and is also proved by the legislation of the country. Something was due injustice, on this account, to those who had thus sustained loss. Besides, if something is not done to place them on a better footing in future, the veteran officer must retire, and new ones cannot be procured. Amongst other things, therefore, the offer of half pay was made. It was mainly intended, as all

544 knew, to keep the veteran officer in the field. The case, then, stands thus: A. contracts to pay B. so much per day, to reap for him until the end of his harvest, and it is agreed or not, that B. may quit when he pleases; but, if he continues to the end, he is to receive five dollars extra. The evening of the last day arrives, when A. for his own convenience, tells B. he will excuse him from reaping the last handful, and binding up the last sheaf; it is for my interest, says he, that you should now quit my service, and depart from the field, and B. does so quit: Has he served to the end of the harvest, within the true meaning of the contract, and is he, or is he not, entitled to the five dollars? Such, it seems to me, is the true question between the state, and such of her officers, especially the navy, and the corps at York, who served as long as the state wished their services; with this difference, that, at the very time of these transactions, this ulterior reward of half pay, was recognized and acknowledged to be just by the government, as well legislative as executive, as will hereafter be more fully seen.

But it has been said, (and this court, in their decisions hereafter noticed, puts it on that ground,) that the war did not end until the proclamation of peace, and that this alone was the end of the war, as meant by the act of 1779. It is true, that between nations, and according to the laws of nations, as I understand, war ends at different times and places, according to notice &c., after which, acts of war are criminal. Thus, I presume, on the signature of the preliminary articles at Paris, and when that was made known in England and France, (as it must have been long before it was made known here) acts of war would have been as criminal there, as they would have been here, after the same event was made known here. All this is very well, between the belligerents and their respective subjects and citizens; but I am greatly mistaken, if it has any thing to do with the true construction of the contract between the state and her citizens, and the questions of law arising under it, as be-

545 tween those parties. Can it be supposed that the law intended to *reserve to the state the power, as soon as it was believed, from the course of events, that the war was substantially at an end, nay, after it was known to be so, and within a few day before it is proclaimed, to discharge the army, leave the officers without a command, and direct them to retire from the field, and then say to them you have not served to the end of the war? Surely, this was not the understanding of either party to this contract. The fair, natural, equitable, and legal understanding of it, is, to the end of the war, unless sooner discharged; discharged, not for your crime or fault, but because it is our interest to discharge you. We wish to save expence to the state, being now satisfied that your services are no longer wanted. Of this we are the proper judges, you have nothing to do with it, and cannot resist it, without a violation of law, discipline, and good order.

This principle will be shewn hereafter to be at the foundation of the claims of the supernumeraries, under the act of 1779: at present, I am considering it in relation to those, and especially, the navy, whose services were dispensed with, as no longer wanted, and to save expence to the state. But the officers of the navy stand even on a higher ground, it seems to me, than this argument places them. They had been put under the ordeal, sifted and cleansed, before the act of 1781, above noticed, and those who remained, purged from the chaff, were recognized, as it were by name, in the act of 1781. It was supposed, that that arrangement was then extant; but it turned out that it had been lost or destroyed, during the invasions of Arnold or Philips in 1781: when the executive, therefore, came to carry that act into effect, as to the state line, in order to purge and purify it also, this loss was doubtless discovered; and, in order that there should be a proper list to guide the auditors in issuing warrants to the navy also, it was ordered, that the two senior officers of the navy should unite with the field officers, in order to make out these lists. The officers of the navy did not attend, no doubt under the idea that the 546 previous arrangement, *expressly recognized in the act, rendered it unnecessary, and not knowing of the loss of that list. Afterwards, however, in May 1784, another board was formed, consisting of two field officers, and of commodore Barron and captain Lilly, to perform this duty as to the navy. The executive surely would not have appointed them, had there been a doubt as to the justice of their claims to half pay. It was probably known, that Lilly was one of the original six captains, who were fixed in command by the executive, on the former occasion. This board did not go into an original scrutiny as to the officers of the navy, but reported a list, which they say, according to the best evidence they could procure, is agreeable to the arrangement of the officers of the navy next preceding the fall session of assembly in 1781, and that the officers named in that list, have always behaved themselves in such a manner, as to be justly entitled to all the emoluments given by law to the officers of the state navy; except one officer (lieutenant Gray) who, they say they are informed, has since (viz. in 1783) misbehaved &c. Thus they not only furnish the substance of the original arrangement, but shew that no subsequent misconduct, except as above, had occurred to deprive the parties of their claim to half pay. It was, of course, certified to the auditors as their guide in issuing certificates for half pay; there being no doubt in the minds of the executive, at that day, but that they were entitled to half pay. On this list are, James Barron, commodore—Richard Barron, captain, commissioned January 6, 1776—Thomas Lilly, captain, commissioned January 14, 1776—and others. In all, only one commodore, eleven captains, four of whom were then dead, and five lieutenants, of whom one (Gray) was dead, including, I presume, the marines and all.

But, if I am wrong in supposing that captain Lilly had served to the end of the war, within the true meaning of the act of 1779; and also wrong in the opinion, that he is to be considered as entitled to half pay under the act of 1781, he being one of those officers in the list or arrangement 547 *lately made, and provided for, as it were personally, and by name, in that act; then, he must at least be a supernumery officer of the navy; and if the supernumery officer of the state line is entitled to half pay, he must be also.

It is alleged, that this question is closed and shut up by two decisions of this court, on the very point. It will be recollected, that in May 1783, the legislature directed the auditors to issue warrants for half pay to the officers, both of the state line and of the navy, and make a return to the next legislature, that funds may be provided &c. At the December session of 1783, however, the legislature, no doubt finding that funds had not been provided, and that they had been unable by any means then in their power, to support the credit of the warrants they had already issued to the officers, for their pay and depreciation, as settled under the above act of 1781, and which had got almost to as low an ebb as paper money itself, and possibly wishing to see whether congress would not take on itself the pay of the state line as well as the continental line; the further issue of certificates for half pay was suspended until the future order of the legislature. This suspension was revoked by the act of 1790, as to those serving to the end of the war only. After this, viz. in 1791, a great number of officers came forward and demanded warrants for half pay; some of these were supernumeraries before the order to consolidate the troops at York, after the surrender of that place; some of them had become so on that occasion, and many of them as late as February 1783, after their troops had been enlisted from them, as before stated, when the last reduction of the legion took place. These latter claimed as having served to the end of the war; as did others, who remained with Dabney until the proclamation of peace. It may be proper here to remark, that, when the last reduction was made by colonel Dabney in 1783, and this new arrangement was made known to the executive, the council advised the governor to write to colonel Dabney, directing 548 that the *supernumery officers retire on half pay; and this was much relied on by those who were thus discharged, under a special order of the executive, saying to them that they were to have half pay.

The auditor, on the applications above mentioned, however, refused to issue the warrants, and appeals were taken to the district court of Richmond. That court adjourned the questions arising, to the general court for its opinion; which court decided, that, under the act of 1779, the officers both of the continental and state lines were entitled to half pay, unless they failed to serve to the end of the war, or, being supernumery, refused again to enter into the service on a command to that effect; and that the troops being disbanded in February 1783, and the preliminary articles of peace being signed before that time, the officers ought to be considered as having served to the end of the war. Judgments were accordingly entered up in the district court for the appellants; and appeals were taken, on behalf of the commonwealth, to this court. The opinion pronounced in this court, in May 1792, was to this effect (confining the opinion to the officers of the state line): that such of the officers, and only such of them, as actually served to the end of the war, unless restrained, by being prisoners on parole or otherwise, and such of them who, becoming supernumerary, again actually entered into service, and continued therein to the end of the war, are entitled to half pay for life, to commence from the determination of their command or service, when the same was duly signified to them by the governor, and their regiments disbanded in pursuance thereof, which, it appears, was on the 19th and 22d April 1783. This decision, being contrary to that of the general court, not only as to the claim of the supernumerary, but as to what is to be intended by the terms, end of the war; being contrary, in these respects, to the understanding of the contract by the officers both of the continental and state lines; to the understanding of congress, when it undertook the discharge of those obligations, originally com-

549 mencing with the act of *1779, as to the continental line, and our state line, who had occasionally supplied our quota in the continental line; believing that no such ingenious or disparaging distinction, between the state and continental lines, was ever contemplated by the act itself, or by any subsequent act of the government, but that the reverse was clearly manifested, both by the state government and congress, in all their acts and resolutions, during the war, and for sometime after its termination; that decision, I say, could not be expected to be, nor was it satisfactory. There was attached to each case a reservation, that the decision should not prejudice the party, in any future claim, on fuller proof. Under this reservation, a number of officers, belonging to Dabney's legion, being the corps consolidated at York as aforesaid, and who had been deranged and became supernumerary under the last arrangement of that corps, in February 1783, again applied for warrants. Their application was again rejected, and they appealed to chancellor Wythe. He decided, (as will be seen in his volume of Reports, 62.) in the same way that the general court did in the cases above mentioned. An appeal was taken from this decision to this court; when three judges, one of whom came into the court after the former decision, reversed the decree of the chancellor on these grounds: 1st, that there was no new ground of evidence, whereon to found a distinction between the cases; and 2nd, that the former decision had correctly decided that the end of the war, within the meaning of the act of 1779, was the proclamation of peace by the governor of Virginia. On this point they say, that the bounty of half pay given, by the act of 1779, to the officers of the state line, in the said act described, was an extra reward or bounty for their services to the end of the war, if they should serve so long &c. This case was argued entirely on the ground, that these parties had served to the end of the war, on which ground alone they put their case. Chancellor Wythe had also put it on the same ground, though he enters into an argument, (which strongly marks the pay under the act of 1779. The decision of the general court, as to supernumeraries, being thus fortified by the able argument of chancellor Wythe, the officers, as may well be supposed, were still far from being satisfied with the result. Their next course was to present petitions, individually, to the legislature, though it was long before they mustered resolution to do this; finally, however, many of them prevailed in that way, and succeeded with that body; and, amongst them, every one of the claimants in his case, (except Quarles, who it does not appear ever applied) and many of the other applicants in the first case, have also succeeded, some of whom were supernumerary as early as 1780, and some became so on the first consolidation of the troops under colonel Dabney, after the capture of York; besides others, who were not parties to either of these controversies. Thus every species of supernumerary has been recognized, as having a just claim to half pay, by successive legislatures; which is an evidence, that these decisions of this court were not satisfactory to that body, or to the country; and are sufficient, at least, to remove any weight which may have been given to the act of 1790, as a legislative interpretation of the act of 1779.

I have further reasons also for inducing me to believe that we are at liberty to reconsider those decisions. We have now a compilation of our laws, and of the journals and resolutions of the legislature, which, as to the army, in many respects, operated as laws; and which give us a ready reference to all the lights, which can hence be thrown on this subject, and without which, I confess, I should have been in great darkness as to points, which a laborious investigation has cleared up to my satisfaction. Besides this, many important documents, lost or mislaid at the time those cases were before this court, have been discovered; some of them between the first and second arguments of this case, and some of them even since the last argument. Indeed, I have been forcibly struck with the circumstances and manner under *which 551 these documents have, from time to time, as it were by accident, been brought to light. They are all submitted to us as though they had been before the court below, and are thus made part of the record before us. I think those documents would, probably, have had an important bearing on the question, had they been before this court formerly. They have, certainly, explained things to me, without which I would have been intirely in the dark, as will, presently, be seen. One of them, the list of navy officers, which has been discovered since the last argument, I consider of very great consequence in this particular case, as the former part of this opinion will shew.

We have been also favoured by Mr. Call, with his manuscript report of the arguments of counsel, and two of the judges, in the last case. We there see on what grounds that case was put by the counsel on both sides, and what considerations weighed with the court; and I think it manifest from this report, that the case was misunderstood in an important matter, and which had great weight with at least one of the judges who delivered an opinion. It was an error, into which I myself was nearly falling, and from which I escaped, by the aid of one of the documents which has lately been discovered. This, by the way, is one strong proof to me, amongst others which have occurred since I have been in this court, of the importance to the public of Call's manuscript reports; calling for their publication, so as to complete the series of our decisions. I take this occasion to tender him my thanks, for the opportunity he has given me of seeing the report of this case. It seems to me probable, that the court, as well as the reporter, fell into an error in that case, in supposing we had no troops for state defence, in the strict sense of the term, except mere temporary corps, such as were raised under the act of May 1779 (10 Hen. stat. at large, 18,) and the legions, raised under the act of March 1781; or, at least, that the officers then and formerly before the court, were officers of corps of this description, and so were never contemplated by the act of 1779. They were, probably, under the belief, that the officers of our regular state line, had been provided for by congress. This I am inclined to infer, from the circumstance, that the reporter, in speaking of the troops that had been raised for state defence, says, that, of this kind, a body was raised under the act of May 1779, (above referred to) and another under the act of March 1781, to raise two legions &c. These are the only acts, for raising troops for state defence, to which he refers. Now, the first of these acts provided for raising a body of volunteers merely, for a temporary purpose, during an invasion; the latter is an act to raise two legions of horse and foot, for the defence of the state, to serve during the war, but not to take the field, or do duty, except in case of actual or threatened invasion, during which they are to continue in the field, if the executive shall think proper. They are to be exempt from militia duty, and all manner of drafts; to be paid whilst in service, or under discipline, and half pay at all other times, during the existence of said legions; the commissioned officers, though, to receive pay, rations, and forage, only whilst in service &c. This, also, was, as a mere temporary corps, little above the militia; and who, though they may have served under Dabney, of which, however, I see no evidence, never had the shadow of right to half pay for life; and not a man of them has ever claimed it, or ever can. Yet, strange to tell, chancellor Wythe says, that Christopher Roane and others, (who were complainants in that case) were officers of one of the legions, raised under the act of March 1781. Mr. Call, the reporter, also shews, that this court fell into the same mistake; for, he says, that the appellees were officers in colonel Dabney's legion, raised under the act of 1781. The arguments of both bench and bar shew, that they were clearly under this impression. Brooke, the attorney general, insisted, that from the nature of the levy, these officers were at the disposal of the government, and could be retained or disbanded at pleasure; their pay was during the existence of the legions only. However great their merits, they were not to be compared with those of the regular armies; great part of their time was to be spent at home, and their actual service occasional only. The officers were not entitled to the provisions of the act of 1779; for that act relates to troops on general establishment, without particular stipulation. Besides, their compensation is prescribed in precise words; and only while in service. No fair construction, he says, can place such limited service, on a level with the general services or rewards of the veterans. He next contends, that if they could be brought within the act, they did not serve to the end of the war &c. On the side of the officers, it was insisted, that the discharge was not absolute, but in the nature of a furlough, they being liable to be called again into service, according to the original organization of the legion; which, from its commencement, was subject to partial duties. It was never necessary, that all should be called at once into service; but the detail was in proportion to the exigency of the occasion &c. They then argue the point, when the war ended &c. within the meaning of the act of 1779. My object, at present, is merely to extract so much of the report, as to shew, that these parties were treated, considered, and their cases adjudged, as though they belonged to one of the legions, raised under the act of March 1781; and, I think, so far, the description of them, on both sides, brings them precisely within the terms of that act. The argument of the attorney general, has no bearing on the permanent regular state line, if such an one existed, except impliedly to admit, that such a corps would fall within the act of 1779. Let us see in what light the judges looked upon them: judge Roane says: to put men, whose duties were occasional only, and who were often not employed for the public at all, upon the same footing with the veteran, whose services were constant, continually exposed to the hardships and dangers of war, would have violated every principle of propriety. He then contrasts the services of one with those of the other; for the one, he says, express remuneration, during life, is made; for the other, no such provision is made, and they claim it by equitable construction only. But, what equity have they? By the terms of their organization, they were subject to less duty &c. Carrington, concurred. Judge Lyons, first, objects to the contract, if it is to be so considered, for want of mutuality; the officer not having stipulated to serve, and not being bound to do so; 2nd, that it was a gratuitous bounty, offered for services when performed, and not before; 3rd, that there was not actual service during the war, and that a man, to entitle himself to a gratuity, must shew strict performance &c.

I confess, that when I compared this case with the act of March 1781, and considered, as I then did, the claimants as officers belonging to one of those legions, I was astonished to find that any doubt could have existed as to the propriety of that decision as applicable to such a corps. The return of the state legion, under colonel Dabney, as made out and returned by him, was before that court; but the return of the field officers of the state line was not: it had then been mislaid, and is one of the documents discovered (as by accident) since this case was first argued in this court. That return contains a report of the officers of the various corps for state defence, except the navy and Crockett's regiment, viz. the first and second state regiments, the artillery and garrison corps, the state cavalry, and the Illinois troops; and Dabney's legion was composed of the remnants of these (except the last) remaining after the capture of York. I found that these corps had been raised, many of them at an early day, and especially the first and second regiments, which were raised under the ordinance of convention of July 1775. That one of them, with pretty full ranks, had marched to the north, as early as 1777, to supply our quota in the continental line, until it could be recruited, and had returned in 1779, with not one-third of the original force. And that another of them, I think the artillery, of which Christopher Roane was a captain, met the enemy under Gates at Camden; and retired afterwards, so much cut up as that there was not more 555 than one captain's *command, which fell to him. And what was my surprise, when I came to compare Dabney's list of his legion, with that returned by the field officers, to find that, instead of his legion being one of the legions raised under the act of 1781, they were the very veteran officers, spoken of by the attorney general and judge Roane, as alone coming within the meaning of the act of 1779!

The officers, of course, were not present at the argument in this court, so as to correct the error which their counsel, as well as the attorney general and court, fell into, in this respect, and which error has remained unknown to them, and uncorrected, until I have had an opportunity, in consequence of the recovery of these papers, now to correct it. Whatever the formal decision of this case, as entered of record, may be, therefore, it is impossible to read the argument, both of the attorney general and judge Roane, without applying them favourably to the officers of the regular state line. They could not have argued as they did, had they known that the appellees were veteran officers.

I have been thus minute in the statement of this case, because it is not in print; and because I not only wish to take from its weight all that ought not to weigh against these officers, but to transfer to the opposite scale whatever of it belongs to that side of the question.

But to proceed, as briefly as possible, to the consideration of the act of 1779. Suppose congress had never taken upon itself the pay of the continental line, and they, i. e. the supernumeraries of that line, were now looking to us for their half pay, under the act of 1779; could we say no to them? Could we have amended the act, during the war, so as to make it mean, that the supernumerary officer, never called on to re-enter the service, should not be entitled to half pay? No one will pretend to deny, but that such an act of the legislature, at that time, would have disbanded the army. Why? Because no officer knew when he would become supernumerary; and it was the full understanding of all parties, that, however this may happen, it shall not 556 *prejudice you, if you hold yourself ready, and re-enter, as many did, when called on. But congress have since agreed to redeem this pledge, and to pay the supernumeraries of the continental line; having recognized their right as originating under this act of 1779, and to which they would have been entitled, as all admit, had congress permitted it to remain entirely on this act. But the words in this, and all the other acts, where the two lines are provided for in the same law, are precisely the same, as to each, in all important particulars; and in the section now under consideration, are precisely the same. They must, of course, have the same interpretation, as to both. Had any discrimination or difference been attempted, by law, during the war, a dissolution of the state line, and total destruction to our cause, would have been the result. But if there was then no doubt about it, that was the time to explain it: on the contrary, the right was then admitted, in the clearest and most explicit terms by every branch of the government; committees, with Patrick Henry at their head, reporting resolutions and laws, full to the point; and the executive, aided by Edmund Randolph, the attorney general, as their law adviser, admitting that the construction of the officers was the correct one. In addition to all which, in my humble opinion, the act itself will admit of no other sensible construction.

Strike from the act the clause respecting supernumeraries, and then it will be, simply, a promise of half pay for life to the officers who serve to the end of the war; similar to the resolution of congress of May 1778, giving half pay for seven years to the officers of the congress troops, who serve to the end of the war. If this were all, the officer who has fought his battle and lost his men, or if their time of service is out, and he is without a command, has done no wrong; he cannot be cashiered for this; he remains in camp until his corps is replaced, or until he gets a furlough: you cannot dismiss him, especially if his ulterior emoluments, in land or half pay 557 &c. depend on his service to the end of the *war (and the supernumerary has as regularly got his land, as any other). But it was necessary to promise half pay, in order to keep our armies in the field: but the government wants it so arranged, that the officers, when without command in the field, may be directed to retire, without forfeiting their land bounty, or half pay, as it were under a law furlough, if I may use the expression. This is an arrangement beneficial to the state, inasmuch as it saves pay and subsistence, and, at the same time, enables the state to recall the officer, if wanted. This is the true history of the case, according to my understanding of the act, and the motives which gave rise to it; and it was so understood by the officers, and was acted under by them; and this construction was recognized, both before and since the war, by the legislative and executive branches. This construction, too, alone, in my opinion, gives sense to those words in the act, "to commence from the determination of their command or service," or to the words, "from the time of their reduction," in the resolution of congress of October 1780, which declares, that the officers, who shall continue in service to the end of the war, shall be entitled to half pay for life, to commence from the time of their reduction, not from the end of the war. Indeed, if half pay depended on actual service in the field to the end of the war, in any sense of those terms, why say any thing about supernumeraries? If, so soon as they became such, they were to have no more claim than any one else who might thereafter enter the service, and continue therein, why say any thing further, than that the government reserves a right to discharge them, and deprive them of this ulterior reward? This would not have prevented their again entering the service, and finally obtaining their reward. We well know, that such a provision would have disbanded the army. Had it been left, as congress at first put it, as to their troops, on service to the end of the war, then a discharge before that, must either have produced the effect that I before stated, that the officer being thus prevented from 558 serving without his fault, was entitled to the *reward; or he would have a right to remain in the field, or on furlough, until wanted, and get full pay &c.

I have looked into the journals of the day, when the act was passed for adjusting the pay of the army, and directing discriminations, to be made, to see if any doubt was then entertained on this subject; but so far from this, I find the reverse was the case. Reduced officers, then entitled to half pay, were recognized as belonging to both lines: but as many officers in the state service may never have been in the field; may have been mere recruiting officers &c.; may never have enlisted their men so as to take the field; or for many other causes, could not have been within the true meaning of the act; it was but justice to the state that all such should be excluded. The executive so understood it; and they certified the list to the auditors for their guide in issuing warrants: not warrants for service to the end of the war, for it had not been ended; and, until it was ended, no one could claim on that score. Nor was it for them to hold up the list of supernumeraries, to see who would re-enter, and serve to the end of the war; for there was surely no necessity for it on that score; if he was then found in service, it could not have been objected that he had been a supernumerary for a time. On the construction contended for by the commonwealth, the whole clause is senseless and useless.

Justice to myself, and to the country, has compelled me to give, thus minutely and at large, my views on the subject. this question being one not less important to the character than to the treasury of the state.

I believe the supernumerary officers have law and justice on their side; and, so believing, I cannot refuse to say, both in my character of a judge of this court, and of an individual who will have to pay my proportion, that justice ought to be done to them.

I am, therefore, for affirming the judgment.

BROOKE, P. The great difficulty in deciding these cases, is to keep within the line of judicial duty. If we pass that 559 *line, and estimate the claims of the officers of the army of the revolution by their peril and their blood, we enter a field which ought to be explored by the legislature and not by the courts. The obligations of national gratitude for services generally very great, and, in particular instances, almost without example, can only be weighed by the representatives of the nation. The claim, therefore, before us must be decided on the legal obligations of the government, as in other cases, and not on the obligations of national gratitude. This is not the first case in which, while the feelings of the court revolted against its duty, yet, it was so firmly bound by that duty, that it was compelled to pronounce a decision which has been scandalized as unfeeling and unjust. It is impossible to read the opinions delivered in the case of the Commonwealth v. Roane and others, without sympathizing with the judges who pronounced those opinions; and well may it be feared, that the opinion now to be delivered will not be better treated; however that may be, I ought not to turn to the right or the left to inquire.

I think it impossible, on the testimony before us, to come to the conclusion, that captain Lilly continued in service to the end of the war, that is, to the proclamation of peace by the governor of the state. I entirely concur with judge Green, in the view he has taken of it; his claim to a land bounty for three years service only, by captain Lilly himself, which he received, negatives the proposition that he served to the end of the war. It would be impossible to account for his claiming a land bounty for three years service only, which did not entitle him to half pay for life; when, if he had served to the end of the war, he would have been entitled to both; nor could he be entitled to a land bounty for three years service only, and also claim for service during the war, upon any sound construction of the acts of the legislature on that subject. He must be presumed to have understood his own claim, much better; especially when his name is found in a list of a board of officers appointed to ascertain the claims of others. The 560 testimony of commodore *Barron, also the most competent witness, who knew him intimately well, and who was in the same service, negatives the proposition, by proving nothing that tends to support it. The declarations of the other witnesses that they understood and believed, that captain Lilly served to the end of the war, though entitled to grant credit for their veracity, are entitled to little weight, when it is considered, that none of them profess to have any precise knowledge of the facts they speak of. Believing, then, that it is not proved, by any of the foregoing testimony, that captain Lilly served to the end of the war, what is the evidence of that proposition to be extracted from the report of the board of officers, lately found and brought into the record? That board, it appears, was constituted, not for the purpose of ascertaining who were entitled to half pay under existing laws, but who had forfeited their claim by misconduct or other causes; and all that can be extracted from the report, is, that captain Lilly had not forfeited his existing rights. That this was the character of the board, is clearly inferrible from the circumstance, that some of the officers of the state troops are reported to have lost their claim, though they had served to the end of the war. If I am correct in this, captain Lilly's pretensions are not strengthened by any thing in the report, and his claim must still rest on the other evidence, and on the provisions of the law; and putting it on the most favourable ground, and considering him as a supernumerary officer, the inquiry is, whether it can be brought within the act of 1779, and the subsequent acts on that subject?

On a fair construction of that act itself, it would be impossible to bring the officers of the navy within its provisions: they are not in terms included in it. The officers of the navy were commissioned to command particular vessels, and though there was an organized navy board and staff, yet no officer could be accurately said to be an officer of the navy of Virginia, in the sense that would be applicable to a more permanent day, such as that of the United States. *Their service was more transient and fluctuating, than the service of the state troops, and that may account for their not being named or included in the act of 1779. But I think it is very clear, that the legislature considered them as included by the acts of November 1781, and May 1783. The act of November 1781, § 12, enacts that, the officers and seamen of the navy of this state, as they stand arranged by a late regulation, shall be entitled to the same advantages as the officers belonging to this state in the land service, agreeably to their respective ranks. Whether the advantages here mentioned, included half pay for life, is, at least, doubtful; but by the act of May 1783, this doubt was then removed. It enacts and directs, that the auditors shall yearly issue to such of the officers of the state line and navy as are by law intitled to half pay for life, their warrants for the same, and make a return &c. This act, though it provides for such officers of the navy as were entitled to half pay, does not specify who they were, nor directly affirm that they were entitled; but leaves that to be settled by the auditors or the courts.

No inference can be drawn, from the circumstance, that warrants were to be issued, and the return made to the next session of the legislature, that supernumerary officers who had not served to the end of the war, were entitled to half pay; because, half pay was due to some who did serve to the end of the war, having been supernumeraries, and again having returned to service, according to the terms of the act of 1779. However that may be, it is very clear, that the legislature meant to leave that inquiry to the auditors and the courts. This is made more manifest by the doubt, which appears to have existed at the time, whether the supernumerary officers who had never been required, and never returned to service, were entitled to half pay. On the 11th of December following, we find that the attorney general gave his opinion to the auditors, that the supernumerary officers were entitled to half pay; in consequence of which, it can be hardly doubted, the legislature, on the 22d of the 562 *same month, December 1783, passed the resolution directing the auditors to issue no more warrants to the officers of the state line. Why the officers of the navy were not included in that resolution, it is difficult to decide. As they were not included in terms in the act of 1779, probably for the reason before stated, and very doubtfully provided for, as to half pay, by the act of November 1781; and as by the act of May 1783, though included in terms, their right to half pay was not affirmatively settled, but left to the auditors, to be ascertained by the pre-existing acts; the legislature, by not including them in the resolution of December 22d 1783, left it as an open question, whether they were or were not entitled to half pay. And thus the matter stood until the act of 1790; which, though it professes to explain the act of 1779, in relation to the officers of the state line, uses, as to them, the same language that is found in the latter act, disregarding intirely the officers of the navy. Was this because, by that time, the legislature had come to the conclusion, that, though they had been named in the act of 1783, their claim was to be ascertained by the auditors or the courts, and that, in truth, not being provided for in the act of 1779, they had no claims? or was it, because, as was the fact, that not more than one vessel, at most, was in the service at the end of the war, and, perhaps, not that one precisely at the proclamation of peace by the governour of the state? However that may be, it is certainly a remarkable circumstance, that the officers of the navy were omitted in the act of 1790, enacted to explain the act of 1779.

But, waiving the exposition of the act of 1790, and supposing that captain Lilly's claim stands on as high ground as that of the supernumerary officers of the state line, in the case of the Commonwealth v. Roane &c. it must, on the authority of that case, and on principle, have the same fate. No officer of the state line or navy held their commissions to serve during the war: there was no binding obligation on them to continue in service during the war: they were, at all times, at liberty to resign their 563 commissions, *except when under special orders to perform some duty: nor was there, in the nature of things, any obligation, on the part of the government, to keep them in service longer than the exigencies of war required; it had a right to disband them at will. The act of 1779, then, did not put them on the footing of officers of the state line in continental service. These were commissioned by congress, and, when supernumerary, liable to be called into service at any moment, without the power of refusal when called, though they also might resign, when not under special orders to perform some duty. The offer, then, of the act of 1779, to the supernumerary officers of the state line, who, when called into service, should not refuse to return, and who should then continue in service to the end of the war, was of an intirely different character from the offer by congress, of half pay for life, to the officers of the continental line, who should remain in service to the end of the war, or, coming into service after the resolution of 1780, should remain in service to the same period. On the one hand, from the moment that the officers of the state troops were put out of actual service by the reduction of their corps, with the right to refuse to come into service again when called, they were completely disbanded, and were as if they had never been in service, as to any obligation on them for future service. On the other hand, the officers of the continental line were never disbanded: though supernumerary, for want of command, they were virtually in service, and so continued until the end of the war. The court, therefore, in the case alluded to, was not bound to consider how congress had treated its officers, in regard to half pay. The act of 1779, and the succeeding acts, were its guides to the conclusion to which it came; in these, it found no obligation on the part of the government, but a mere offer, depending on a state of things, which never had occurred in the case before it. The chancellor, whose decree it reversed, gave a different construction to the act of 1779. He disregarded the distinction between those supernumerary officers, who 564 came "again into service, and served to the end of the war, and those who never returned to service: he was perplexed by the words, "command or service," in the act. By referring the word "service," to officers of the staff, who never command in that character, though they do service, and the word "command," to officers who do command, and do service also, reddendo singula singulis, he would have perceived, that the act of 1779, required actual service to the end of the war, to entitle an officer to half pay for life; and did not include those officers, who, being supernumerary and out of service, had not refused to return, not having been required. This court construed the act of 1779, according to the obligations of the parties, at the time it passed; not the supposed obligations for a glorious peace and independence.

The government, when it could not recruit men to fill up the ranks, was under no obligation to retain the supernumerary officers on pay and rations; it had a right to disband them, and it did so, in effect, when, by the act of 1779, they had a right to refuse to again enter the service: these words, again enter into service &c. imply disbandment; for, when an officer has a right to refuse to do duty, by the license of the government, he is disbanded. It would not have been esteemed patriotic in the officer, to remain at home, and retain his rank, exempt from militia duty; and, though never again in service, to claim a compensation like that given to the officers, who, if supernumerary, had returned to service, and continued to the end of the war, or who had remained in service from the date of their commissions, to the same period. Those words "if required, shall again enter into service," imposed no binding obligation on either party: they contained the nature of the condition on which half pay was to be given: they impute no fault to either party, who might not act. Under them, the government was not bound to require the service of officers, when it had not men; nor was the officer bound to comply, if required again to enter into service.

565 *This court gave this construction to the act more than thirty years ago, which has been acquiesced in by the officers and their representatives; if it is now to be disturbed, I presume we shall hear no more of the rule stare decisis. It considered the claims of the officers, in the case before it, with great precision; it was bound to do so by its judicial duty. Was it founded on contract, or a mere promise of a bounty for future service, depending on the requirement of the government itself? In either aspect, as there was no binding obligation on the officer to the government, he was held to prove exact performance of the condition prescribed by the acts under which he claimed: virtual performance was not enough, in such case, however strong was the claim on the gratitude of the country, which was fully admitted; and though, in that case, the claimants were in service to the signing of the preliminary articles of peace, that was not proof of exact performance of the condition, prescribed by the act of 1779. It was not, in contemplation of law, service to the end of the war. They had retired from service, before the proclamation of peace by the governour of the state. The government, to which the public force belongs, has the sole right, as respects it, to decide when the war ends and peace begins. Though the proclamation of peace did not make the peace, it revived the obligations of peace, and put an end to the obligations of war. In this respect, though it did not make peace, it put an end to the war, and thereby fixed the term of service required by the act of 1779, to entitle the claimants to half pay for life. If I am right in the opinion, that captain Lilly did not serve to the end of the war, though his claim is placed on as high ground as that of the supernumerary officers of the state line, it should be rejected, and the judgment of the superior court of Henrico reversed.

By the majority of the court, judgment affirmed.

The Commonwealth v. Pegram.

June, 1829.

Statutes—Application to Offences Committed Previous to Enactment under Former Statute.—A statute passed in the session of assembly of 1827-8, prescribing a new punishment for an offence committed after the 1st May 1828, does not repeal former statutes, defining the offence, and prescribing other punishment for the same, as to such offence committed before 1st May 1828.

Henry D. Pegram was presented, in the circuit court of Henrico, in July 1825, for keeping and exhibiting a faro bank table.

This offence was, at the time of the presentment, punishable by imprisonment in the common jail, and by stripes at 570 *the discretion of the court, by force of the act of 1822-3, ch. 32, § 1. But, by the act of 1827-8, ch. 36, § 4, it is enacted, that whoever shall hereafter be guilty of any of the offences enumerated in the 17th section of the statute against unlawful gaming (1 Rev. Code, ch. 147, pp. 566, 7), shall be sentenced to confinement in the jail of the county, for a period not less than two nor more than eight months, and be fined in a sum not less than 200 nor more than 800 dollars, at the discretion of a jury. This offence of keeping and exhibiting a faro bank, is one of the offences enumerated in the 17th section of the statute against unlawful gaming.

Pegram was not arrested until December 1829. And being then brought into court, he moved the court to direct the attorney for the commonwealth, to enter a nolle prosequi or a dismissal of the presentment, on the ground, that the 4th section of the act of 1827-8, above mentioned, as to all offences committed before the passing thereof, repealed the 17th section of the statute against unlawful gaming, as well as the 1st section of the act of 1822-3. And the question, whether the act of 1827-8 did so repeal the former laws on the subject, was, with the consent of the accused and of the attorney for the commonwealth, adjourned by the circuit court to this court.

BROCKENBROUGH, J. In the case of Attoo v. The Commonwealth, 2 Virg. Ca. p. 382, it was decided, that where a new statute prescribes a new punishment for an offence, which had been previously punishable otherwise, and the new statute repeals all laws which come within its purview, but does not provide that offences committed before the operation of the new law, shall be punished under the old, such repeal operates as a discharge of all such offenders. But that case is very different from this. There the law repealed and annulled the punishment enacted before that time against the offenders: here the act of 1827-8 does not, either expressly or impliedly, 571 repeal the previous punishment *prescribed by the act of 1822-3, except in the case of future offences. There is no repealing clause in the act of 1827-8; and although the principle is correct that leges posteriores priores abrogant, yet they only abrogate them from the time that the latter law is passed, or goes into effect. The principle on which this rule prevails, is, that the latter statute being incompatible with the former, they cannot exist together, and the latest expression of the will of the legislature is the law. But there is no incompatibility in the statutes now under consideration. A punishment affixed to an offence prior to the 1st May 1828, is not incompatible with a different punishment, either lighter or more severe, affixed to the same offence subsequent to that date. They may both well stand together. The punishment prescribed by the act of 1827-8 being different from that prescribed by the act of 1822-3, is certainly an implied repeal of it as to new offences from the time it goes into effect; but by the very terms of the law, the new punishment is not only applied to the offences happening after the 1st May 1828, leaving the old punishment to be applied to the offences happening before that day. In the case of The Commonwealth v. Wyatt, 6 Rand. 694, this principle was taken for granted, and a judgment was rendered against him under the act of 1822-3; which could not have been done, if that act were not still in force as to offences happening before the act of 1827-8.

Therefore, the court is of opinion and doth decide, that the 4th section of the act passed February 26, 1828, entitled "an act to alter and amend the laws against the keepers and exhibitors of certain unlawful games," doth not repeal the 17th section of the act entitled "an act to reduce into one the several acts and parts of acts to prevent unlawful gaming," nor the act

*JUDGES SMITH AND DADE did not sit in any of the cases here reported.

†Statutes—Prescribing New Punishments—Effect upon Offences Committed under Former Statute.—For the proposition that, a statute passed in the Assembly of 1827-8, prescribing a new punishment for an offence committed after May 1, 1828, does not repeal former statutes, defining the offence, and prescribing other punishment for the same, as to such offence committed before May 1, 1828, the principal case is cited and approved in Allen v. Com., 2 Leigh 731; Pitman v. Com., 2 Rob. 807, 808; also, in dissenting opinion of CHRISTIAN, J., in same case; Foot-note to Attoo v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 382.

passed the 21st day of February 1823, entitled "an act farther to amend the penal laws of the commonwealth," as to offences committed against the 17th section of the aforesaid act prior to the 1st May 1828.

572 *Mitchell v. The Commonwealth.

Commission Merchants—Right to Sell Tobacco Prepared for Market without Merchant's Licence.—Tobacco the growth of the state, in the condition in which it is ordinarily prepared for market by the grower, is not goods, wares and merchandize, within the meaning of the act of 1823—ch. 3, and a commission merchant in Richmond is not obliged to obtain a merchant's licence to justify him in selling the same.

An information was filed against Garland H. Mitchell, in the hustings court of Richmond, for selling, by wholesale, goods, wares and merchandizes, of domestic growth, without licence, contrary to the statute of February 26, 1823, (sess: acts of 1822-3, ch. 3,) which provides, that if any person shall sell, by wholesale or retail, goods, wares and merchandize, of foreign or domestic growth or manufacture, without licence &c. he shall forfeit and pay 100 dollars.

At the trial, it was proved, that Mitchell was a commission merchant, and sold tobacco &c. on commission: whereupon he moved the court to instruct the jury, "that one selling tobacco on commission was not bound to obtain a licence for so doing." The court refused to give this instruction; but stated that persons so selling tobacco, the property of the growers, were not bound to obtain a licence for that purpose. The jury found Mitchell guilty, and judgment was rendered accordingly. To this judgment he obtained a writ of error from the circuit court of Henrico; which has adjourned to this court, the questions, 1. What is the proper construction of the act of February 24, 1823? And 2. Ought the judgment of the hustings court to be reversed or affirmed?

MAY, J. We consider the hustings court as having decided, in effect, that tobacco of the growth of this state, in the condition in which it is ordinarily prepared for market by the grower, is comprehended within the terms "goods, wares and merchandize," in the statute. It is believed, that this construction was never given to the statute, until the year 1823—five years after it was passed; and the fact that 573 *the legislature, by an act of the last session, have provided against it in future, is entitled to some consideration.

A careful examination, however, of the various statutes on this subject, leads us to the conclusion, that the words "goods, wares and merchandize," as used in the revenue laws, were never intended to embrace the agricultural productions of the state. Thus, the annual act imposing taxes &c. exempts from this tax, farmers &c. who purchase and sell sugar, salt, iron &c. "as a return load for their produce and other property, taken to market." The law defining wholesale and retail merchants, declares the former to be those, of whose annual sales, one half or more, shall be made by the bale, piece, package, or dozen; terms wholly inapplicable to corn, wheat, tobacco &c. And we know, that these, and many other articles of produce and property, are not, in this state, ordinarily termed "goods, wares and merchandizes;" and have never been regarded as such, within the meaning of the revenue laws. To give this comprehensive signification to them, would make them embrace almost every subject of ordinary traffick and sale in the country; and would require a large portion of several classes of our citizens to obtain licences as merchants.

Construing the act of February 24, 1823, therefore, with reference to its object and subject matter; and guided, in the interpretation of its words, by the provisions of other laws on the same subject; we are of opinion, and do accordingly certify to the circuit court, that tobacco, of the growth of this state, and in the condition in which it is ordinarily prepared for market by the grower, is not goods, wares or merchandize, within the meaning of the said act, no matter how or by whom sold; and that the judgment of the hustings court ought to be reversed, for not giving the instruction, which was asked for, in this case.

574 *Walker v. The Commonwealth.

Larceny—When Evidence of Other Larcenies Not Admitted.—On trial of indictment for larceny of a watch, evidence of another larceny of a cloak, committed by prisoner, the two acts being wholly distinct and unconnected, is not admissible for any purpose.

Samuel Walker was indicted in the circuit court of Henrico, for the larceny of a watch, of the value of 50 dollars, and of a gold chain and key, the property of Elizabeth Bolton. At the trial, he excepted to an opinion of the court given against him, and being convicted, he now applied for a writ of error.

The bill of exceptions states, that the commonwealth having introduced evidence to shew, that the watch had been taken without the consent of the owner, from her house, and that it was seen in the possession of the prisoner on the same day, introduced another witness, who testified, that he went to Norfolk in pursuit of the prisoner; that the prisoner, on the morning after the arrival of the steam boat in which the witness was, came to the boat, and the witness informed him that he had come to get the watch, the cloak, and the amount of Mr. Thomas his landlord's bill; and an altercation ensued, in which the prisoner denied that he had taken a watch, and insisted on leaving the steam boat in spite of opposition. The witness also testified, that although he and the prisoner had boarded together in the same house (Mr. Thomas's) yet no particular intimacy had existed between them. On his cross exam-

*Separate Offences—How Punished.—In State v. Porter, 25 W. Va. 687, it is said: "The two offences, being separate and unconnected, and resulting from different and distinct impulses, could not be regarded as parts of one and the same act and punished as such, but could only be prosecuted distributively and punished as separate offences." 1 Whart. Crim. Law, §27; Walker's Case, 1 Leigh 574.

ination, he said there had been some dealings between him and the prisoner in relation to a pair of pantaloons, bought by him of the prisoner. The attorney for the commonwealth then asked the witness, if he had sold the prisoner the cloak which the prisoner had carried away; and directed the cloak to be brought in. The prisoner's counsel objected to any inquiries being made as to the cloak; contending, that that was a separate transaction, for which there was a separate indictment pending, and that the evidence concerning it could 575 have no effect on *this case. The court, however, decided that the question might be asked, and that the conduct of the prisoner respecting the cloak, which, it was alleged, had been carried off by him from Thomas's boarding house, on the same day that he carried away the watch from Elizabeth Bolton's, might be inquired into on two grounds; 1. because the inquiry of the prisoner's counsel, as to the witness's purchase of the pantaloons from the prisoner, let in the question as to the cloak; and 2. and principally, because the conduct of the prisoner in carrying away the cloak, on the same day that he carried off the watch, was admissible to prove the intent with which the watch was carried off, it being contended by the prisoner, that the watch was loaned by Elizabeth Bolton to him; declaring at the same time, that whatever might be the prisoner's motive in carrying away the cloak, the jury could not convict him, unless they were satisfied that the watch was taken with a felonious intent. To this opinion of the court the prisoner excepted.

The jury found the prisoner guilty of the larceny, charged in the indictment, without finding the value of the article stolen; and ascertained the term of his imprisonment in the penitentiary, to be two years; and the court passed sentence on him accordingly.

And now he applied to this court, by petition, for a writ of error. Upon this application, the whole merits of the case were argued by Schmidt and Michie for the petitioner, and by the Attorney General for the commonwealth.

The objections taken to the proceedings and judgment, were, 1. that the court permitted evidence to be given to the jury, of another offence committed by the prisoner, distinct from that charged in the indictment, namely, the larceny of the cloak; and 2. that the verdict was defective in not finding that the goods stolen were of the value of ten dollars, so as to constitute the taking of them grand larceny.

BROCKENBROUGH, J., delivered the opinion of the court. It is certainly true, that, in public prosecutions for a specific *offence, it is incumbent on the 576 prosecution to prove that the offence which is charged has been committed: he is not allowed to go into proof of the commission of any other offence than that charged, or of the character of the prisoner, unless the prisoner himself opens the way for the admission of that evidence by putting his character in issue; and, even in that case, the prosecutor cannot prove particular facts, but must content himself with evidence of general character. The reasons on which these positions are founded, are sufficiently obvious. Not only must the proof correspond with the allegation, but it is an important principle, that the prisoner should not be taken by surprise. As he is charged with a particular offence, he has notice to be prepared to defend himself against that charge, and that alone: he cannot be prepared to defend himself against other charges, not exhibited against him, or to maintain the integrity of his whole life, when that is not put in issue; and when it is, he cannot be prepared to account for particular instances of misconduct, of which he is not previously informed, and as to which he is not required to defend himself.

It frequently happens, however, that as the evidence of circumstances must be resorted to for the purpose of proving the commission of the particular offence charged, the proof of those circumstances involves the proof of other acts, either criminal or apparently innocent. In such cases, it is proper, that the chain of evidence should be unbroken. If one or more links of that chain consist of circumstances, which tend to prove that the prisoner has been guilty of other crimes than that charged, this is no reason why the court should exclude those circumstances. They are so intimately connected and blended with the main facts adduced in evidence, that they cannot be departed from with propriety; and there is no reason why the criminality of such intimate and connected circumstances, should exclude them, more than other facts apparently innocent.

577 Thus, if a man be indicted for murder, and there be proof that the *instrument of death was a pistol; proof, that that instrument belonged to another man, that it was taken from his house on the night preceding the murder, that the prisoner was there on that night, and that the pistol was seen in his possession on the day of the murder, just before the fatal act committed, is undoubtedly admissible, although it has the tendency to prove the prisoner guilty of a larceny. Such circumstances constitute a part of the transaction; and whether they are perfectly innocent in themselves, or involve guilt, makes no difference, as to their bearing on the main question which they are adduced to prove. But if the circumstances have no intimate connexion with the main fact; if they constitute no link in the chain of evidence; then, supposing them innocent, their admission, to be sure, may do no harm, yet they ought to be excluded, because they are irrelevant; but if they denote other guilt, they are not only irrelevant, but they do injury, because they have a tendency to prejudice the minds of the jury; and for this additional reason they ought to be excluded.

The same principles which apply to the proof of the fact, are applicable to the proof of the criminal intent.

The intent with which an act is done, is to be known from the circumstances which precede, accompany, or follow, the act: that intent may be generally ascertained with great correctness, from the conduct of the prisoner on the particular occasion, and from the circumstances connected with the act proved to have been committed. This is the legitimate source from which to draw information of the quo animo. I do not deny that the proof of other criminal acts done by the prisoner, may afford a strong or even violent presumption of his intention in the particular act under consideration. To prove that a prisoner charged with larceny, had in his possession other stolen goods, taken from other persons, at other times, or that he has general bad character for honesty, or that he has before been guilty of theft, may afford a presumption that his intent on the present, is similar to his intent on former occasions. But they 578 do not prove any necessary *connexion between his intent and his act on this particular occasion, and are liable to all the objections before stated to that kind of evidence.

There is one class of cases in which the courts of England, have allowed the evidence of other criminal acts of the same character to be given in evidence in support of the charge: cases in which it is necessary to prove the scienter. Thus, in prosecutions for uttering forged notes &c. knowing them to be forged, it has been frequently permitted to prove that the prisoner has committed other utterings of forged notes, for the purpose of proving, or of enabling the jury to infer, that he knew that the note which he is charged with uttering, was a forged note. Such was Whiley's case, 1 New Rep. 94; 2 Leach 983, and Ball's case, 2 Leach 985, in note; both of which are referred to, and approved by this court in Finn's case, 5 Rand. 710. The principle on which this species of evidence has been admitted in those cases, is, that it is frequently impossible, from the insulated fact of the uttering a single forged note, to ascertain whether the accused knew it was forged or not. Knowledge exists in the mind; and it is impossible, say the courts, to become acquainted with the secret knowledge of another, without referring to his conduct or his acts on other occasions. A man perfectly honest, who is not skilled in the character of bank notes, may pass a forged note with perfect innocence: the single fact of passing does not prove his knowledge: the courts therefore say, that you may prove other utterings, and the circumstances attending them, for the purpose of proving the knowledge which constitutes the guilt. It is necessity which has driven the courts to the adoption of this rule, and some judges doubt whether it is correctly established. But it has not been extended, and, for the reasons which I have given, will probably never be extended, to the proof of the quo animo. In the above mentioned case of Whiley, lord Ellenborough is reported to have said, (in assigning his reasons why other and substantive felonies may be given in evidence in an indictment for 579 uttering) that he *knew a case, where, in a prosecution for burglary, proof had been given of three burglaries committed on the same night: that a shirt which had been taken from the first house, had been found in the second, and that when facts are intimately blended and connected together, they may be given in evidence. The remark is calculated to mislead; and on examination it appears to have been a very loose report of what probably took place on some criminal trial. The case is not reported, but it is easy to conjecture a case of burglary, in which it may be proper to prove three burglaries. Thus, if from the first house the burglar carried off sundry articles of clothing, and, amongst others, "a shirt," which it was easy to identify, and the "shirt" was found at the second, from which sundry other articles were taken, some of which being identified were found in the third, from which also sundry other articles were taken, and found on the prisoner; now on a prosecution for the first burglary, these other burglaries, and the facts connected therewith, may constitute so many links in the chain of evidence, and, therefore, may be proper to be given in evidence. The case referred to by lord Ellenborough may have been such an one as here represented, and, if so, was properly decided; but it is not easy to understand why he referred to such a case so loosely reported, for the purpose of proving the position which he was then endeavouring to establish.

Let us now apply the principles here laid down, to the case before us. Evidence was introduced for the purpose of proving, that the prisoner had carried away a cloak from the witness, on a charge of stealing a watch from another person. The first reason assigned was not apparently much relied on, and seems not to be tenable. The witness had said that he was not intimate with the prisoner; to repel this, he was asked, on cross examination, whether he had not had some dealings with the prisoner, and, particularly, whether he had not sold him a pair of pantaloons: the object seems to have been to produce a contradiction of the witness's statement respecting their 580 intimacy. The attorney *for the commonwealth then asked him, if he had sold him the cloak which the prisoner had taken from him. It does not appear, that the object of this inquiry was to add to the proof of their intimacy, because, if it had, that would have operated in favour of the cross examination. The object probably was to ascertain, with what motive a particular, distinct fact had been done; and, if so, it does not seem, that the question put in the cross examination could be a reason for introducing it. The principal reason for allowing the question, was to prove the intent with which the cloak was carried away, in order to raise a presumption that if the cloak was taken animo furandi, the watch was taken with the same intent. According to the principles already laid down, this evidence was inadmissible. It was a distinct charge, which the prisoner was not called on to defend, which he could not be prepared to defend, and which had no such necessary connexion with the transaction then before the court as to be inseparable from it. It ought, therefore, to have been rejected.

The objection made to the verdict in this case, may be disposed of in a few words. The prisoner was indicted for grand larceny, and the jury find him guilty of the larceny of which he is indicted, and affix to his crime a punishment which cannot be applied to petty larceny, but is an appropriate one for grand larceny. They affirm, then, that he is guilty of grand larceny. And there is no error in this respect.

But for the error before stated, the judgment is to be reversed, by the unanimous opinion of the court; the verdict to be set aside; a venire facias de novo awarded, and a new trial had &c.

Assault—Evidence in Mitigation of Fine That Prosecutor Used Abusive Language to Defendant—Admissibility.*—On the trial of indictment for an assault, defendant offers evidence, in mitigation of fine, that the prosecutor was on bad terms with him, and had on days previous to the assault, used provoking and abusive language of and to him: HELD such evidence is inadmissible.

Richard Rawlings was indicted in the circuit court of Orange, for an assault on one Robert Jones. He pleaded not guilty. The jury found him guilty, and assessed a fine against him of 50 dollars.

At the trial, he offered evidence "in mitigation of damages," to prove that the infomer Jones, "had been on bad terms with him; and on previous days to the time of making the assault, and at other places, had used provoking and abusive language of and to him." This evidence the court refused to admit; to which he filed exceptions. And now he applied, by petition, to this court, for a writ of error to the judgment, assigning in his petition the opinion of the court rejecting the evidence as the only error of which he complained.

PARKER, J. The evidence offered by the defendant, tended to establish two points, to wit, the prosecutor's previous hostility, and his antecedent provocations; and the question is, Whether it ought to have been received in mitigation?

It can scarcely be contended, that the "bad terms" existing between the prosecutor and defendant, could have any other effect, than to render it probable that the assault had been made through revengeful feelings. The only question, therefore, is as to the provoking and abusive language used on previous days. On this point we have not looked to english authorities in cases of indictments for assaults; because, the practice in England, and in several of the states, is for the court, which fixes the punishment, to hear evidence in mitigation of the fine, and that evidence may be often loose and irregular, because the 582 correction is "in the breast of the court. But we have looked into civil cases of this character, where evidence of previous provocations has been offered in mitigation of the damages, the principle of which is strictly applicable, where evidence for the same purpose is offered in a case of misdemeanour, to lessen the fine. We particularly refer to the cases of Avery v.

Ray, 1 Mass. Rep. 12; Lee v. Woolsey, 19 Johns. Rep. 319, and Waters v. Brown, 3 Marsh. 559. They establish this principle, that previous provocations, to have the effect of mitigating the damages, should be so recent as to induce a fair presumption, that the violence was committed during the continuance of the feelings and passion excited by them, and such as in fact may fairly be considered a part of one and the same transaction. This rule is adopted in analogy to the one which prevails in cases of homicide. Antecedent provocations will not there mitigate the offence, if a sufficient time has intervened between the provocation and the killing, for passion to subside, the warm blood to cool, and reason to interpose; for the law which notices the weaknesses of men, will not indulge their passions. A contrary course would not only encourage an appeal to force and violence, in every case of real or supposed insult, but would lead to inquiries wholly different from the one on the record, and thus divert and distract the attention of the jury. It is matter of necessity, that all the parts of the same transaction, and whatever is immediately connected with and led to it, should be heard and considered, although involving several inquiries. But the courts have steadily resisted any extension of this rule, to prevent the attention of the jury, from being drawn from the issue they are sworn to try, to the examination of collateral facts. The case under consideration might have furnished an exemplification of the impropriety of permitting such evidence; for if the defendant had been allowed to give in evidence provocations received on previous days, and at different places, the prosecutor ought to have been allowed to shew under what 583 circumstances they were offered; and then where would be "the stopping point? The court is, therefore, of opinion, that immediate provocations only, or such as are plainly a part of the res gesta, received so recently that the blood has not had sufficient time to cool, can properly be received in evidence for the purpose stated in the bill of exceptions; and that the circuit court of Orange did right in rejecting such as was offered by the defendant, he not having shewn on the record the relevancy of such inquiries to the issue joined.

It has indeed been suggested, that, as under some possible state of things, previous provocations, even on a former day, might be admitted as explanatory of the transaction itself, namely, where allusion to them is made at the time, the court, in this case, ought to have received the testimony offered, with an instruction to the jury to disregard it, if the connexion between the insult and the violence was not established to their satisfaction. But we think, that it is not only the province, but the duty of the court, to decide on the admissibility of evidence, with reference to the facts in issue, even although such admissibility depends on matters of fact; and to reject it, if a proper foundation is not laid for its admission, lest the jury might be prejudiced and misled by testimony, which, upon the subsequent facts proved, might turn out to be irrelevant and improper. The course pursued in relation to confessions of guilt, and to declarations made in articulo mortis, both depending upon the circumstances or facts of each case, furnishes the illustration of this rule. The defendant, in the present case, shews by his bill of exceptions, no collateral facts which might have justified the court in admitting his proof. He offered evidence prima facie inadmissible. He established no connexion between the assault and battery charged upon him, and the provocations he had previously received; nor did he offer any fair presumption from which the court ought to have concluded, that the one was the consequence of the other, and committed before his blood had time to cool. Under these circumstances the court is clearly of opinion, that his application for a writ of error ought to be overruled.

Mandamus—Right of Circuit to Compel County Court to Open Road.—A county court rejects an application for opening a new road, on a regular hearing. Held, that an appeal lies from such a judgment; but the circuit court cannot award a mandamus to the justices of the county court to compel them to open the road.

Thomas Jones made an application to the county court of Stafford, for a road to be opened in that county. The county court appointed viewers, who duly made their report; whereupon summonses, in the usual form, were directed to the owners of the land through which it was proposed that the road should pass, who appeared, and prayed writs of ad quod damnum; which were awarded, and inquisitions regularly taken thereon, and returned to court. The case being regularly matured for hearing, according to the provisions of the statute, the court decided that the proposed road ought not to be opened. From this judgment an appeal was taken to the circuit court of Stafford; which dismissed the appeal, on the ground, that it ought not to have been granted. And, thereupon, Jones moved for a mandamus to be directed to the justices of the county court commanding them to open and establish the road. An alternative mandamus was accordingly issued, commanding the justices to open the road, or shew cause to the contrary. This process was duly served on the justices; but they made no return to it, and shewed no cause against the issuing of a peremptory mandamus; and thereupon, such peremptory mandamus being moved for, the court adjourned to this court, the following questions, 1. Is the mandamus the proper remedy in this case? 2. What judgment should be rendered in the premises?

UPSHUR, J. The judgment of the county court in this case, was strictly within the scope of their jurisdiction and powers.

Mandamus to Compel Court to Open Road.—The county court cannot be enforced by mandamus to open a road. Doolittle v. County Court, 28 W. Va. 177, citing Jones v. Justices of Stafford, 1 Leigh 584. To the same effect the principal case is cited in State v. County Court, 33 W. Va. 504, 11 S. E. Rep. 74.

They were the proper judges in the first instance, whether the proposed road ought to be opened or not. They 585 *have decided that the public convenience did not require it, and that, all circumstances being weighed, it ought not to be opened. This judgment is conclusive upon the subject, and binding upon all the parties to the record, so long as it remains unreversed. Any party who considered himself aggrieved by that judgment, might have appealed from it; and if the appeal had been regularly taken and prosecuted, full justice in the premises might have been attained in that mode.

It is unnecessary to decide, whether the appeal that was taken in this case, was properly dismissed or not: for, if not, there was still an ulterior tribunal, to which the party might have resorted by appeal. Not having done so, the dismissal left the judgment of the county court in full force. The effect of a mandamus, in such a case, would be, to compel the county court to reverse its own decision, and to enter another judgment, contrary to its views of the law and the right of the case. This is strictly the province of an appellate court, but it does not upon any principle, present a proper case for a mandamus.

A mandamus is the proper remedy in certain cases, to compel an inferior court to proceed to judgment; but we consider it very clear, that an erroneous judgment already pronounced cannot be corrected by that process, in any case where the party may have a different remedy.

The court is of opinion, and doth decide, that the mandamus is not the proper remedy in this case; and, of course, that a peremptory mandamus ought to be refused.

The Commonwealth v. Bartlett and Others.

November, 1829.

Breach of Peace—Right of Justice to Recognize Party to Appear before Circuit Court.—Upon complaint of breach of the peace before a justice of the peace, he cannot recognize the party accused to appear before the circuit court to answer the charge.

Benjamin Bartlett, being brought before a justice of the peace of the county of Harrison, for a breach of the peace, entered into a recognizance, with George I. Williams his surety, with condition that Bartlett should appear at the next circuit court of the county, to do and receive what should be then and there enjoined him by the said court, and, in the meantime, to keep the peace and be of good behaviour towards the commonwealth and all its citizens, and especially towards John Smith, his wife and children, and property. Bartlett failed to appear at the circuit court, according to the condition of this recognizance; and that court, on the motion of the attorney for the commonwealth, ordered a scire facias on the recognizance, against Bartlett and Williams. They appeared to the scire facias, and put in a general demurrer to it. Whereupon the court, with the assent of the parties, adjourned the following questions to this court:

587 *1. Has a justice of the peace power and authority to recognize a party charged before him with a misdemeanour, to appear before the circuit court of the county, to answer the same?

2. If such general power does not exist, is such a recognizance void, as to the appearance of the party only, or void as to all purposes?

3. What judgment ought the court to give on the demurrer to the scire facias in this case?

FIELD, J., delivered the opinion of the court. Regarding the recognizance upon which the scire facias in this cause issued, as an ordinary recognizance to keep the peace and be of good behaviour, taken by a justice of the peace; and being of opinion, that a justice of the peace, in such a case, has no authority to bind the party to appear before a circuit court; a majority of this court is of opinion, and doth decide, that the condition of the recognizance, requiring the appearance of Bartlett before the circuit court, is void to all purposes; and the demurrer to the scire facias, should, therefore, be sustained, and judgment rendered for the defendant thereupon.

MAY, J. This is an ordinary recognizance to keep the peace, entered into according to law, and essentially in due form, except that the condition requires the defendant to appear at the circuit, instead of the county, court. In England, the statute directs that the justices shall return such recognizances to the next sessions; but we have no such statute here. Our circuit courts have jurisdiction to require surety of the peace: and, therefore, the magistrates may take recognizances in such cases, with condition for the appearance of the party bound, at either the county or the circuit court. Upon this ground, I am of opinion, that judgment should be rendered for the commonwealth on the demurrer to the scire facias.

In this opinion, judges BROCKENBROUGH and PARKER concurred.

5. Same—Stealing Free Negro—Consent.—That when one takes and carries away a free negro boy of eight years of age, with criminal intent to appropriate him, the consent of such a boy does not excuse or lessen the offence.

Argument of Counsel—Right of Counsel to Controvert Opinion of Court before Jury.—If the prisoner's counsel, in a criminal case, asks the opinion of the court and an instruction to the jury on a point of law, and the court rules the point against the prisoner: his counsel shall not be allowed to controvert the correctness of the court's opinion on such point, before the jury.

Alfred R. Davenport was indicted in the circuit court of Henrico, for stealing a free boy of colour. The indictment charged, that the said Davenport did feloniously steal, take and carry away, one mulatto boy named David Caesar, who was a free boy and not a slave, the said Davenport at the time knowing him to be free. Davenport demurred to the indictment. The court overruled the demurrer. And then he pleaded not guilty, and was put upon his trial. The jury found him guilty, and ascertained the term of his imprisonment in the penitentiary, to be two years; and sentence was pronounced accordingly.

Several points of law arose in the course of the trial, and were decided by the court against the prisoner:

1. He moved the court to instruct the jury, that to maintain the prosecution, the commonwealth must prove to their satisfaction, that he, the prisoner, knew at the time when the alleged stealing was committed, that the person named in

589 *the indictment, as the person stolen, was free at that time; which instruction the court refused to give, and instructed the jury, that if they were satisfied that the mulatto boy was free at the time he was stolen, and that the prisoner took and carried him away with the felonious design of selling him as a slave, the prisoner ought to be convicted, whether he knew or not that he was then free.

2. The prisoner moved the court to instruct the jury, that to constitute the felonious taking and carrying away, charged in the indictment, they must be satisfied, that such taking and carrying away was against the consent of the said David Caesar; which instruction the court refused to give, it appearing, that the said David Caesar was not more than eight years of age at the time the offence alleged in the indictment was committed.

3. After the last mentioned instruction had been given, and in the course of the argument before the jury, one of the counsel for the accused attempted to argue the correctness of the instruction, when he was stopped by the court, and informed, that the court would not permit the question of law, embraced in the instruction, to be argued or controverted by the counsel; the instruction having been given on a motion of the prisoner's counsel to give the contrary instruction.*

590 "To these opinions of the court the prisoner filed exceptions. And now he applied, by petition, to this court, for a writ of error: and on this application, the case was argued by R. G. Scott, S. C. Scott, and Michie, for the petitioner, and the Attorney General for the commonwealth.

BROCKENBROUGH, J. The first question is that presented by the demurrer to the indictment: Whether the indictment was good and sufficient in law? This depends on the construction of the statute on which the indictment is founded. The statute declares that "if any person shall hereafter be guilty of stealing or selling any free person for a slave, knowing the person so sold to be free," such person being convicted thereof, shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary for a term not less than one or more than ten years. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 111, § 28, p. 427.

It is alleged by the prisoner's counsel, that the statute does not intend to declare the stealing alone of a free person to be felony, but that the selling him for a slave is an essential ingredient of the offence; that both acts must concur to make the crime. In support of this position, they rely, 1st, on the preamble of the original act of 1787, and 2dly, that the word stealing is a technical word, and that there can be no larceny except of property.

591 "The preamble of the original statute recites, that "whereas several evil disposed persons have seduced or stolen the children of black and mulatto free persons, and have actually disposed of the persons so seduced or stolen as slaves, and punishment adequate to such crimes not being by law provided for such offenders;" and then the enacting clause uses the words above recited. Although the preamble of a statute is the key which unlocks the mind of the legislature, where its intention is doubtful, yet where the words are clear and unambiguous, the language of the enacting clause furnishes the rule which is to be followed. If the enacting clause clearly and plainly provides for the punishment of an offence, which is not contained within the preamble, surely the courts must carry the enactment into effect. If they do not, then they substitute the preamble for the enactment. If the preamble is more extensive than the enactment, they make a law which the legislature did not enact; if less extensive, they omit to enforce a law which is enacted. In this case, though the preamble recites that the children of free blacks and mulattoes had been stolen and disposed of, yet the enactment prohibits the stealing or selling. If the legislature had intended, that both acts should concur, it would have said, "if any person shall be guilty of stealing and selling." There can be no good reason why the courts should convert or into and, and there is the best reason why they should not. If the word "and" had been used, then a person might lawfully obtain possession of a free negro, or the child of one, and knowing perfectly that he is free, might sell him as a slave, without violating this law. A guardian might thus dispose of his ward, or a master of his apprentice. So a person might unlawfully, and secretly steal such free negro, with the most felonious intention, hire him out from year to year for his whole life in a distant part of the country, and not be subject to its penalties. Or one might steal, and another sell, without either being liable to the punishment of felony. Such being the consequences, which would result from changing the language of the 592 enacting "clause, to make it fit the preamble, we are all of opinion, that it cannot be done.

*The following history of the proceeding mentioned in this bill of exceptions, was drawn up by the judge of the circuit court, and filed:

Memorandum—To understand the ground on which this bill of exceptions is founded, the court thinks it proper, at this time, to make the following statement. As soon as the jury was sworn, the prisoner's counsel proposed, that the jury should find a special verdict: but the attorney for the commonwealth would not agree to it, and the prisoner's counsel withdrew the proposition. After the evidence was closed, and the attorney for the commonwealth, in his opening speech to the jury, had argued the law of the case involving the construction of the statute under which the prisoner was indicted, the prisoner's counsel insisted, that the court should then before the defence was opened to the jury, express its opinion, whether the construction put on the statute by the attorney, was correct or not. The judge stated, that he should reserve his opinion on the law, till the argument was closed: that the prisoner's counsel were at liberty to argue the law and the fact before the jury; and that the jury had a right to decide the whole case including the law, whether it agreed with the court or not. The counsel for the prisoner were not satisfied with this arrangement, stating, that if the opinion of the court was in favour of the prisoner on the law, he had the right to that opinion immediately: if it was against the prisoner, his counsel had the right to combat it before the jury. The judge said, that if the opinion of the court was required at the instance of the prisoner, and upon argument, and it should be unfavourable to him, his counsel could not again argue it before the jury: and repeated, that he should prefer giving his opinion at the close of the whole argument. The counsel for the prisoner then made the motion which is set forth in this bill of exceptions."

The above was indorsed "Statement of the court in Davenport's case: but as the prisoner's counsel are not in court, though the prisoner is, it cannot be entered on the record:" which statement, by request of the judge, was filed with the papers in the case.—Note in Original Edition.

But it is argued that "stealing" is a technical word, that it means a larceny, and that there cannot be a larceny except of the personal good of another, and a free person is not property. It is true, that the word is usually applied to the taking of property, but it is certainly competent for the legislature to apply it to the felonious taking of a free person, although the common law does not so apply it; and to the court it seems clear, that it is the appropriate phrase. Negroes and mulattoes are in our state generally slaves, and as slaves they are personal chattels: when they are emancipated, or otherwise become free, they, are no longer chattels, but their colour renders them an easy prey to the arts and violence of desperate and abandoned villains. If they are carried away by force, or seduced by fraud, from their accustomed homes, to places where they are not known, their freedom is easily wrested from them, and they become slaves, and as such chattels. If then a person wrongfully takes and carries away a free negro, with the felonious design of converting him to his own use, by selling, or otherwise making him his property, he may with great propriety be said to be guilty of stealing him, and in this sense it was undoubtedly used by the legislature in the act now under consideration.

For these reasons we are of opinion that the demurrer to the indictment was properly overruled.

The next question arises from the first bill of exceptions taken to the opinion of the court. (Here the judge stated the substance of the instruction given by the circuit court to the jury, from the bill of exceptions.) Whether this instruction be correct or not, depends, 1st, on the construction of the statute. Is it necessary to constitute the offence, that the person stealing a free person should know him to be free?

The object of the statute was to protect free negroes and mulattoes in the enjoyment of their freedom; and to pre-

593 serve *that freedom it was necessary to guard them against two classes of persons; 1st, those who might obtain a wrongful or illegal possession of them for the purpose of converting them to their own use; 2ndly, those who having a rightful possession, or at least a possession not illegal, might sell them as slaves. The moral guilt of the first class, is complete by the very act of feloniously taking and carrying them away. The act of stealing a negro slave had previously been made felony. If a person steals a negro, he is then clearly guilty of felony, if he be a slave; and certainly it does not diminish, it rather aggravates, his moral guilt, that the negro so stolen (and whom he intends to sell or otherwise convert to his own use), is a free person. In both cases, he is equally guilty of the fraudulent or forcible taking; of the fraudulent or forcible carrying away; and of the felonious intention of making the negro his own. In the one case, he deprives another of his property; in the other he deprives the person stolen of his freedom, which is a greater injury to him than the loss of his property is to the owner of the slave. The offence, then, of stealing a free negro, being greater than that of stealing a negro slave, it is not at all probable, that the legislature in passing a law, especially designed to prevent free negroes from being stolen, would require an additional ingredient in the constitution of the crime; an ingredient not required in any case of larceny, nor necessary to the completion of the offence. But in the other class of offenders—those who having a lawful possession, yet sell the negro—a knowledge of the fact that the negro is free, seems to be a necessary constituent of the offence. A man may receive stolen goods innocently, but if he receives them knowing them to be stolen, in that knowledge consists his crime. So if a man having purchased a negro, sells him, although the negro be in fact free, yet when he sells him he is guilty of no crime, if he did not know him to be free: the criminal intent is altogether wanting. If he acquires possession in any other lawful manner, by loan, or by hire, and sells him, although he

594 is not innocent, *having violated his trust, yet he is guilty of no offence against the freedom of the negro, unless he knows at the time of the sale that he is free. If those who drafted this short act, had not been too anxious for brevity, and too much afraid of tautology, there could not have been a doubt raised on the subject. "If any person shall hereafter be guilty of stealing"—What? "any free person" is the subject of the stealing. Is it then proper to read, "knowing the said person so sold to be free?" Certainly not, because the words so sold do not refer to the stealing, but to the selling. Those words, therefore, do not form any part of the offence of stealing: it is complete without them. The clause then must be understood thus: "If any person shall hereafter be guilty of stealing any free person, or selling any free person for a slave, knowing the person so sold to be free," &c. By using the words "any free person" after stealing, and then repeating them after selling, the whole difficulty is cleared away.

It is argued, however, that, as the indictment charges that the prisoner knew the mulatto boy to be free, it is necessary to prove the allegation. But we do not understand, that such is the rule. On the contrary, if an averment be introduced into an indictment, which is altogether superfluous and immaterial, and if the indictment is sufficient without the words so introduced, they may be rejected as surplusage, and need not be proved. 1 Chitty Cr. Law, 173; Ib. 232; Bennett's case, 2 Virg. Ca. 235; Pomeroy's case, Ib. 342, and Derieux's case, Ib. 379. Now, in this case, if the construction given to the statute be correct, the averment of the knowledge of the prisoner that the boy stolen was free, is entirely unnecessary and superfluous. The indictment is good without it, and it was therefore unnecessary to prove it.

This case differs intirely from Booth's case, 6 Rand. 669, cited by the petitioner's counsel. The statute, in that case, punishes a master &c. who shall knowingly permit more than five negroes or slaves, other than his own, to be and remain &c.

The indictment charged, that the de-

595 fendant permitted *more than five negro slaves to be and remain &c. The court said, that as the prosecutor had not charged an assemblage of free negroes, but one of slaves only, he was not allowed to prove what he did not charge; for the allegata and probata must agree. There was no surplusage in that indictment; but the prosecutor wished to produce surplus proof. But here there is surplusage in the averment; and as the crime is sufficiently alleged, when that surplusage is rejected, it need not be proved.

Of the point stated in the second bill of exceptions, little need be said. The prisoner's counsel moved the court to instruct the jury, that they must be satisfied that the taking and carrying away of the free boy was against his consent, he being not more than eight years of age. A child of that age is incapable of giving his consent, and incapable of collusion. It was, therefore, not necessary to prove, that it was

On these questions, this court is unanimous in its opinion, but on the questions arising on the last bill of exceptions, there is some difference of opinion. From that bill of exceptions it appears, that after the instruction had been given to the jury by the court on the construction of the statute, one of the counsel for the accused attempted to argue the correctness of the instruction, when he was stopped by the court, and informed that the court would not permit the questions of law embraced in that instruction to be argued, or controverted by the counsel, and prevented the same from being so argued or controverted, the instruction having been given on a motion of the prisoner's counsel to give the contrary instruction. Did the court err in this respect?

To decide this question, the majority of the court does not deem it necessary to inquire into the general question of the power of the court, to controul the prisoner's counsel in arguing questions of law before the jury, which have been decided by the court, when that decision has been

596 *made by the court without any application from the bar, or upon the motion of the commonwealth's counsel, nor into the question of the right of the jury, as contradistinguished from its power, to hear and decide on the law as well as the fact in a criminal case. Those general questions are yet pending in this court in Word's case, and Garth's case, and may be decided hereafter. But, in this case, the question is, whether after the prisoner's counsel has moved the court to instruct the jury on a question of law, and the court has performed that duty, which it could not refuse, but has given an instruction different from that which the counsel thought ought to have been given, the counsel can then be allowed to controvert that opinion, and argue the same question of law before the jury. The bill of exceptions does not give the particulars of that proceeding; and, as it was tendered by the counsel for the accused, it must be presumed, that if there was any thing else in the conduct of the court, which the prisoner or his counsel supposed was irregular, or deprived him of any other title of his rights, it would have been excepted to. It may then be assumed as a fact, that when the prisoner's counsel moved for the instruction on a question of law, he argued that question of law before the court, that the attorney for the commonwealth answered him, that the prisoner's counsel replied to the attorney, and that these arguments were all in the hearing of the jury; that the court then gave its instruction to the jury, to which the prisoner's counsel excepted. It may also be assumed as a fact, that before the motion for the instruction was made, the court expressed its wish, that the counsel on each side would argue before the jury the whole case, law and fact, and its determination to give its opinion to the jury, on the law after the argument on both sides should be closed; and that this wish of the court was frustrated by the motion of the prisoner's counsel asking for a decision of the law before the argument should be made before the jury. These assumptions are intirely compatible with the statements in the bill of exceptions. The question then is, whether 597 the prisoner's *counsel, after arguing on the law before the court, in full hearing of the jury, insisting on the court's judgment on the law, before the question is submitted to the jury, and excepting to the opinion of the court, by which he may resort to the appellate tribunal for the correction of the errors of the judge, may again argue the law before the jury, in direct contradiction to the opinion expressed by the court. We think he cannot. The court must regulate the course and order of its own proceedings, and cannot yield up that power to any counsel however respectable. If the prisoner's counsel, after having elected to argue the law before the appropriate tribunal, in the presence of the jury, be at liberty again to argue it before the jury, the attorney for the commonwealth must again argue it before them, and the court must again charge the jury on the same subject. This course of proceeding has a tendency to impair the respect which the court ought to entertain for itself, and which it ought to endeavour to inspire in others. We do not perceive, that the prisoner, or his counsel, have been deprived of any of their rights, or that the court has encroached on the rights of the jury in this case. We are of opinion, that the last bill of exceptions does not shew that any error has been committed by the court: but in this opinion two of our brethren (judges Semple and May) do not concur.

ing their indifference; and then elected by the prisoner and sworn to the jury: upon objections to the indifference of these jurors, discovered after the trial, not directly inconsistent with what was disclosed by the jurors themselves on their examination touching their indifference, the court ought not to set aside a verdict of guilty, just in itself, though the objections be such, that if known and disclosed before the jurors were elected and sworn, they might have been good cause of challenge to the jurors; much less, if the objections be such as would not have been good cause of challenge.

Same—Same—Challenge for Cause—Waiver—Discretion of Court.—A person accused has a right to challenge a juror for cause, before he is sworn, and the court is bound to judge whether the cause is sufficient or no to sustain the objection: but when, after a juror has been elected and sworn, and after trial and verdict, the prisoner asks a new trial on grounds of exception against him, existing before he was elected and sworn, such motion is addressed to the sound discretion of the court; and in the exercise of this discretion, the court ought to consider the whole case, and be satisfied that justice is done.

John M. Jones was indicted, and tried, for the murder of George Hamilton, in the circuit court of Lynchburg. The jury found him guilty of murder in the first degree. He moved the court to set aside the verdict, and direct a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was not warranted by the evidence. The court intimated its opinion that the verdict was right: upon which his counsel asked the court to spread the evidence upon the record, and to state it from the mouths of the witnesses. The judge said he would make an accurate state of all the facts which he considered proved at the trial, with the aid of his own notes and those of the counsel on both sides; but he refused to re-examine all the witnesses, for the purpose of stating their evidence verbatim.

On the 22d May 1829, between three and four of the clock in the afternoon, Jones the prisoner, and Hamilton the deceased, and several others, met, casually, at a grocery in the town of Lynchburg, not far from the river, in a disreputable part of the town. The grocery was kept by a uncle of Jones, and Jones was abiding there with him at the time. The whole party was in peace, and had been drinking; when one Betsey Fulcher, a common prostitute, with whom Jones, (a young unmarried man) had had for sometime an illicit intercourse, came into the grocery, and soon insulted Hamilton in very gross language: he warned her to desist; she repeated the insult; and he gave her a severe slap on the face. She appealed to Jones for protection. Jones said he would not suffer any woman, especially a woman he had a feeling for, to be so treated in his presence: Hamilton said he could whip her and her protectors: they instantly approached each other as if to fight; but the other persons present interposed, and prevented them from coming to blows; and they were soon, apparently, reconciled. Shortly after, Hamilton stepped out of the house, as if with design to go away; but he stopped at the door, and said, in a loud voice, that if any were dissatisfied with what he had said or done, he could whip them. No notice was taken of this challenge; and Hamilton went off towards his boat. After he was gone, the woman Fulcher told Jones, she did not think he would suffer her to be abused by any man, without protecting her; upon which Jones bade her be easy, and said he could whip any one man, but could not fight a community of men. Jones then left the house, but shortly returned, apparently in a passion, pulled off his coat, abused Hamilton, and said he would kill him, or any other person that would strike a woman he had a feeling for, and he would see his heart's blood before sunset. One Trimble, a boatman from Rockbridge, advised Jones to let Hamilton alone; that he was too stout for him, and was a 600 violent *man when angered. Jones giving no heed to this advice, and continuing his abuse and threats against Hamilton, one M'Caul, who had witnessed the quarrel, left the house, and went towards the river where the boats lay: on his way he met Hamilton, who said he was going to the grocery; that he apprehended Jones and Trimble would get into an affray, and said he wanted to see what was the matter. M'Caul told him that Jones and Trimble were not quarrelling; that Jones was abusing and threatening him (Hamilton), and was armed with a dirk; and he advised him not to go to the grocery, where Jones was, but to return to his boat. Hamilton returned to his boat, and armed himself with a large bludgeon (part of a boat pole) saying Jones had drawn a dirk upon him, and he meant to avenge himself with that stick; and then, in spite of M'Caul's earnest intreaty and advice, he persisted in his resolution to return to the grocery; but he said he would not interrupt Jones, unless he attempted to strike him with a dirk. Hamilton, and M'Caul with him, proceeded to the grocery; they stopped near the door; Jones and others were still in the house; they heard Jones's voice still in passion; M'Caul endeavoured to persuade Hamilton not to go in, and got between him and the door; they heard Jones say (alluding to Hamilton, as M'Caul supposed, but not naming him) "damn him, I will see his heart's blood before sunset." Hamilton hearing this, exclaimed, "by G—d, I will not take that—stand out of the way;" and, pushing M'Caul aside, stepped into the door, and struck Jones a blow on the forehead, with the bludgeon, which staggered him: the blow inflicted a wound an inch and a half long, and cut to the bone; it bled profusely. M'Caul, with the aid of others present, got Hamilton out of the house; and the door was closed before any other blow was struck. Hamilton began to pick up stones; and Jones, shortly after, appearing at an open window, Hamilton shewed a determination to throw a large stone at him, which M'Caul endeavoured to prevent him from doing; but Hamilton said, "stand out of the way—damn 601 him I will kill *him;" and immediately threw the stone at him, which struck the facing of the window. The stone was so large, and thrown with such force, that, in the opinion of the by-standers, if it had struck Jones, it might have killed him. Hamilton picked up other stones, to throw at Jones; and some of the witnesses said he did throw more than one; others, that he did not. Hamilton was then persuaded to go away; some of the witnesses said, he again threatened that he would kill Jones; others, that they heard no other threats than those above mentioned. He was advised to throw away his bludgeon—that it was too large to strike a man with; but he carried it away with him. There was one point touching the affray in the house, as to which the witnesses differed: M'Caul said, that when he and Hamilton got to the door, Jones was brandishing a dirk; and several persons, who were in the house, said, he was brandishing the dirk shortly before Hamilton came in, and swearing he would kill Hamilton, or any other man who should strike a woman he had a feeling for, and that he would have his heart's blood before sunset: but it was deposed by another witness, that Jones had, at his instance, put up the dirk before Hamilton entered the house and struck him. It was doubtful too, whether Jones saw Hamilton, before he came into the grocery and gave him the blow: the probability was, that he did not.

Jones had had no previous acquaintance with Hamilton, who was a boatman from Rockbridge, and, it was proved, was a stout man, apt to quarrel in his cups, and when angered very violent and careless of consequences, but of a generous temper when cool, and not apt to harbour resentment for things past. At the time of this affray, Jones had been drinking, and was under the excitement of strong drink; some thought him quite drunk; and there was evidence, that excitement of that kind, sometimes produced in him a state of phrenzy. Other witnesses said, that Jones had indeed been drinking, but was not drunk, and by no means deprived of his reason. Hamilton and Jones were 602 *both strong athletic men; Hamilton somewhat the larger of the two.

After this affray, Hamilton went to a lumber house near the river, where he gave a boastful account of his victory, declared his willingness to renew the contest, and raising his stick, said "this never fails me."

And after Hamilton's departure, a friend of Jones washed the wound on his forehead, applied lint to it, and bound it up: Jones borrowed a clean waistcoat, turned in the collar of his shirt which was bloody, tied a black cravat over it, and left the grocery, apparently composed, saying he was going to get a clean shirt. The time, from the end of the affray till Jones's departure from the grocery, was, according to one witness, ten minutes, according to another, half an hour.

The next evidence concerning Jones's actions, placed him in the town, about 200 yards from the grocery, at the shop of a gunsmith named Lewis, where he applied to borrow a gun, saying he wanted to shoot some body. The young man in the shop asked whom? He named no person, but raised his hat, and pointed to the wound on his forehead, from which the blood appeared to be still issuing through the lint and bandage. The young man purposely handed him a defective gun, the main spring of the lock being broken. Jones examined the gun, snapped it, and said it would not do; he wanted one that would fire. He was told he could have no other gun in the absence of Lewis: Jones inquired where he was: he was in the blacksmith's shop, in the cellar beneath: Jones went thither, and applied to him, and then returned with Lewis, to the gunsmith's shop; Lewis offered him the same defective gun; Jones rejected it, repeating that it would not do; he wanted one that would fire. Lewis then handed him another gun, which Jones examined, snapped, primed and flashed; and said, "this will do." He proceeded to load the gun (where he got the ammunition, did not appear). He was at

603 He went off from thence with *the gun to the market house, about 250 yards from Lewis's shop; and thence proceeded down the most public street of the town, towards the toll house of the bridge across the river, near which stood the lumber house, in which Hamilton had been, as above stated, and which was 300 or 400 yards from the market house, and not far from the place where the boats lay in the river. As he passed near the toll house, where one of his uncles lived, this uncle, who had heard of the affray between him and Hamilton, called to him to come back; he refused to do so, and went on. At this time, several persons were near and following Jones; and it was said and repeated (by whom the witnesses did not know) that he was going to shoot Hamilton. He proceeded to the lumber house (the same where Hamilton had been, but from which he had shortly before retired) and stepping in, with a drawn dirk and the gun in his hands, he pointed the gun at a man there, saying "damn you, I know you by your whiskers:" the man turned to look at him, upon which he retired backwards out of the door, saying nothing. He immediately turned the corner of the lumber house, on the river bank where the boats lay, in one of which was Hamilton with three others: Hamilton had come into the boat a few minutes before, with his stick in his hand, which he had now laid down; he was sitting on the gunwale of the boat; he said a man was coming to shoot him; and one of the company doubting this, he repeated it, and said he had seen him coming down the hill with a gun. About this time, those in the boat heard some movement on the river bank, near the corner of the lumber house, and looking that way, saw Jones coming down the bank, with the dirk and gun in his hands—the gun raised and pointed as in the act of taking aim. Jones said, "aye, damn you, you are there, are you; I know you by your whiskers." The whole party in the boat, including Hamilton, who had now no weapon of any kind in his hands, attempted to escape from the boat by the head, which was near the bank, lying towards Jones; Hamilton endeavouring 604 to keep the *others between him and Jones, and they endeavouring to escape from the danger of Jones's fire, which was directed towards Hamilton. Hamilton called to Jones, to keep his distance, adding he had done him no harm; another of the party called to Jones, and said "no shooting here." Hamilton was the hindmost of the party. Two had escaped from the boat: the third, immediately behind whom Hamilton was, had just leaped from the head of the boat, and had not time to turn, when Jones fired the gun at Hamilton then standing on the head of the boat. Hamilton stood a moment, and only saying "boys, I am gone," fell over the boat into the water.

Jones's conduct immediately after the fatal shot, was variously represented by the witnesses. One said, he immediately put his gun down, and advancing with his dirk drawn, said "damn you, if I have not killed you, I will finish you;" then, changing the dirk from his right to his left hand, he raised Hamilton's head, and placed it on a rock, out of the water, saying "damn you, you are dead enough." Another said, that the first blood he saw after the shot, seemed to him to issue from Hamilton's breeches, and as he did not fall, he inferred he might not be mortally wounded, and seeing Jones quickly put down his gun, and advance with his dirk, he thought Jones was under the same impression, and advanced with the dirk lest Hamilton might yet be able to resent the shooting; but Hamilton fell, and then Jones halted, and said, "damn you, you thought I would not shoot, but damn you, I have killed you;" then, changing the dirk to his left hand, he raised Hamilton's head out of the water, said he was dead enough, and placed the head on the rock. Several of the witnesses concurred in this account of Jones's language and conduct after the shot; and several of them concurred in saying, that Jones said, if Hamilton was not dead, he would finish him, or words to that effect. All concurred, that Jones made no attempt to use the dirk. Several witnesses said, that before Jones advanced to raise Hamilton out of the water, some one cried, 605 "take him out of the water;" and one witness thought this was Jones, and that he said, "if no one will do it, I will do it myself," and then advanced.

After this, Jones left the boat, took up his gun, ascended the bank, brandished the gun over his head, said he had killed the damn'd rascal, and there were two more he intended to kill, M'Caul and Trimble; and began to re-load his gun. M'Caul passing by, asked Jones why he wished to kill him; Jones said, "damn you, I will kill you any how," and advanced upon him with his dirk. M'Caul retreated. M'Caul was well acquainted with Jones, and had been on friendly terms with him. M'Caul and Trimble both said, there was no grudge between them and Jones, that they knew of.

When M'Caul retreated from the dirk, Jones took up his gun, and as he walked off, said, "he had killed the damn'd rascal, and he was glad of it, and that he would do the like by any man who should strike the woman he loved, and any man of spirit would do the like, and now they might hang him for it."

The several witnesses made various estimates of the time that elapsed from the end of the affray in the grocery till the act of shooting—from ten minutes to an hour and a quarter—the judges comparing these estimates, and considering all the circumstances, thought it at least three quarters of an hour, most probably more.

Jones was shortly after arrested, making no resistance to the officer, and no attempt to fly. Before the magistrate, he admitted he had borrowed and loaded the gun, and prepared himself, for the express purpose of killing Hamilton; and said, that any man of honor and spirit would do the same under like provocation: and he acknowledged, that what the witnesses said, was true, except in one particular; in explaining which, he said, that Hamilton could not have seen him as he approached, for that he had kept the lumber house between them. At this time, the wound on Jones's forehead was still bleeding.

606 *After the court had intimated its opinion, that the verdict was right, and at a subsequent day of the term, the prisoner's counsel moved the court to set aside the verdict, on the ground of objections discovered since the trial, to three of the jurors, Wilkins, Gilliam and Angle. These jurors had been called as talesmen; and before they were sworn of the jury, they were, at the prisoner's instance, examined on oath as to their indifference.

1. Upon this examination, Wilkins said, he had heard part of the evidence at the examining court, and had expressed some opinion as to the probable result; but he thought he could give the prisoner as fair a trial as if he had heard nothing; he was conscious of no bias or prejudice to prevent it. Upon which the prisoner elected to be tried by him.

The prisoner now proved, by one witness, that he had heard Wilkins, say, before the trial, that he was at the examining court, and had heard part of the evidence, and if he was on his jury he should hang him; but that Wilkins was a man of good character, and did not speak as if he had any prejudice against Jones, but as if he was speaking in relation to the supposed truth of what he had heard. It was testified by another witness, that he had heard Wilkins say, in a general conversation concerning Jones's case, that if he was on the venire he should hang him: and by a third, that he heard Wilkins say he thought Jones would be hanged.

2. When Gilliam was examined, he said he had heard none of the evidence against the prisoner; he had heard his case talked of in the town, by various persons, but he did not know that any of them had heard the evidence; he had no bias or prejudice on his mind; and thought he could give the prisoner as fair a trial as if he had heard nothing of his case. The prisoner elected to be tried by him.

The prisoner now adduced a witness, who said, he had heard Gilliam say he thought from the evidence he had heard, that Jones ought to be hanged: that he had frequently heard him repeat the same sentiment:

607 that he had *a conversation with the juror the same day (and before) he was empaneled, when he repeated the opinion, that Jones would be hanged, and if he was on the jury, he should be compelled, from the evidence he had heard, to hang him; and that he told Gilliam, that as he had expressed his opinion, he could not be on the jury, and Gilliam seemed to understand the same. On cross examination, this witness said, he could not say, that Gilliam told him he had heard any part of the evidence, nor did he know that he ever had; he inferred that he had: that Gilliam was a respectable man, and deserved full credit on his oath.

3. When Angle was examined as to his indifference, he said he had heard no evidence, but had heard various reports of what the evidence was; he did not recollect from whom; he did not know, whether those reports were true or not; they were different from each other; he had expressed an opinion of what would be the probable result, in conversation with others; he had no bias on his mind to prevent him from giving the prisoner a fair trial; he had no prejudice against the prisoner or his family, any way; and he thought he could give the prisoner as fair a trial as if he had heard nothing about the case. Upon this, he was elected by the prisoner.

The prisoner now proved by a witness, that shortly after the homicide was committed, he and the juror were in conversation about it, when Angle "allowed" the prisoner would be hung; the witness "allowed" he would not; and a gallon of whiskey was bet upon the event. Angle said, if witness knew as much as he did, he would not bet. He was not far off when prisoner killed Hamilton, and heard the evidence, as witness thought, before the inquest. Angle did not speak as if he had any personal prejudice against Jones, nor does the witness think he had. Angle is a respectable man, and deserves to be credited on oath. The juror (Angle) being present was sworn, and stated, that he had made the bet with the witness as he mentioned; it was a casual thing which had escaped his recollection, and he should never have thought to demand the whiskey, nor does he suppose the witness would. He never thought of it, at or during the trial; it had altogether escaped his mind, until reminded of it by the witness after the trial; and he repeated, that he was neither at the called court, nor present at any examination of witnesses, at any time, respecting the case, nor heard any statement of the evidence from any body that had heard it, so far as he knew, before the trial.

The prisoner offered another witness, Martha Gilliam, who said—"I was at Angle's house on the day of the called court. Angle returned home. I asked him what was done with Jones. He said he did not stay to hear the trial over. I said I wished he might be cleared; he said, he wished he might be hung. I said, how can you say so, Mr. Angle? You know that when a man is drunk, when he is in a passion, his wit is out, and he ought to be excused for his acts. Angle said, he wished Jones and all such damn'd rascals to be hung. He did not say that he had heard any part of the evidence or any part of the trial. I have heard Angle speak of the subject several times. We live close neighbours. He always said Jones ought to be hung. I am the daughter of Patterson Gilliam, who was a witness for Jones. I am no ways related to Jones, or any of his family, and but little acquainted with him." Angle, the juror, denied having had any such conversation with Gilliam as she detailed; and said that she had shewn great anxiety for Jones's acquittal since the trial, and had declared she would do any thing in her power to procure his discharge. Gilliam denied this.

The counsel for the prisoner also presented to the court an affidavit of the prisoner in relation to the three jurors aforesaid; which was made a part of the record. This affidavit stated, that since the rendition of the verdict, he had been informed, that the three jurors had, previous to their being empaneled, formed, and repeatedly expressed, an opinion that he ought to be hanged; and that Angle had, moreover, previously to his being empaneled, made a bet *that he would be hanged, and expressed a wish that he should be hanged: that at the time the said three jurors were so empaneled, he did not know, believe, or suspect, that either of the said three jurors had expressed the opinion above stated, or he would have challenged them.

The circuit court, with the prisoner's assent, adjourned the following questions to this court:

1. Ought the verdict of the jury to be set aside, and a new trial directed, upon the state of the facts of the case, as above set forth?

2. Ought the court, in order to prepare the state of the case, to have re-examined the witnesses, after the verdict rendered, so as to state verbatim what they said? and having declined to do so, ought a new trial to be granted for that cause?

3. Ought the verdict to be set aside, on the grounds disclosed by the evidence respecting the three jurors above mentioned, or either of them? or ought the court to proceed to judgment?

The case was argued by Johnson for the prisoner, and by the Attorney General for the commonwealth.

The questions debated were, 1. Whether, upon the facts of the case, the homicide was murder in the first degree, as the jury had found it to be, or only murder in the second degree? within the definition of the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 171, § 2, p. 616. 2. Whether the objections to the three jurors, or either of them, were such, as would have entitled the prisoner to have challenged them for cause, had he been apprised of those objections before the jurors were elected by him and sworn? and supposing the objections would then have been good, whether, having been discovered since the trial, the court ought now, for this cause, to set aside the verdict, and direct a new trial?

DANIEL, J. The first question refers to a state of the facts which were proved before the jury upon the trial, and *upon which the verdict was rendered; and makes it necessary for this court to examine the facts and the circumstances of the case, to ascertain what offence the prisoner had committed, and what degree of criminality marked the offence. That the prisoner committed the homicide charged in the indictment, there can be no doubt. Was it committed under circumstances, which, according to law, made it manslaughter? murder in the second degree? or murder in the first degree?

That the offence proved is greater than manslaughter, the prisoner's counsel does not deny; but he contends, that, though it be murder, it is not murder in the first degree.

To determine whether it be murder in the first or second degree, it is necessary to refer to and consider the provisions of the statute, by which the distinction between the first and second degree of murder is created. The statute declares, "that all murder which shall be perpetrated by means of poison—or by lying in wait—or by duress of imprisonment or confinement—or by starving—or by malicious, wilful and excessive whipping, beating or other cruel torture—or by any other kind of wilful, deliberate or premeditated killing—or which shall be committed in the perpetration, or attempt to perpetrate, any arson, rape, robbery, or burglary, shall henceforth be deemed murder in the first degree. And all other kinds of murder shall be deemed murder in the second degree."

The counsel for the prisoner has supposed, and argued with great ability and ingenuity (as he always does) in support of his supposition, that the words "any other kind of wilful, deliberate or premeditated killing," ought to be construed, and of necessity, as referring to the character or kind of killing or murder specified in the previous enumeration (by means of poison, lying in wait, duress of imprisonment or confinement, starving, wilful, malicious, or excessive whipping, beating or other cruel torture) as if it read, "any other kind of such wilful, deliberate or premeditated killing;"

because, otherwise, as he supposes, the preceding *particular enumeration would be useless. Now, a plain and invincible answer to this argument, is presented in the import of the terms used; other and such. Other killing, means any other whatever, which is different from the same; such killing would refer to the modes of killing enumerated, and confine itself to the kind of killing enumerated and the means by which it was effected. To admit this construction of the prisoner's counsel, would be to allow that the legislature meant nothing, or did not understand what it meant, when it used, upon this very important subject of life and death, those words of plain and obvious import; "any other kind of wilful, deliberate and premeditated killing." This is what this court cannot admit. Poison may reach the life of one or more not within the design of him who lays the bait; lying in wait, may be with a view to great injury, abuse and bodily harm, without the settled purpose to kill; imprisonment or confinement or starving, may be with a view to reduce the victim to the necessity of yielding to some proposed conditions, as well as a punishment for the failure of prompt obedience, without any certain and fixed determination to destroy life; and the same may be said of malicious or excessive whipping, beating or other cruel torture. In all these enumerated cases, the legislature has declared the law, that the perpetrator shall be held guilty of murder in the first degree, without further proof that the death was the ultimate result, which the will, deliberation and premeditation of the party accused sought. And the same authority has declared the law, that any other kind of killing, which is sought by the will, deliberation and premeditation of the party accused, shall also be murder in the first degree; but that as to this other kind of killing, proof must be adduced to satisfy the mind, that the death of the party slain was the ultimate result which the concurring will, deliberation and premeditation, of the party accused, sought. But to this general rule the same authority adds an exception, which is, that any death consequent upon the perpetration or attempt to perpetrate any arson, rape, 612 *robbery, or burglary, shall be deemed murder in the first degree: and all other murder at common law, shall be deemed murder in the second degree. So that the cases within the exception, as now put, and the cases enumerated as first mentioned, are, in fact, placed upon the same principle: there is no necessity of proof in either, to establish the fact that a homicide was intended. And it follows, of course, that all other homicide which was murder at common law, is now murder in the second degree, except when it shall be proved, that the homicide was the result of a "wilful, deliberate and premeditated killing;" and it also follows, of necessity, that, when by the proof the mind is satisfied that the killing was wilful, deliberate and premeditated, such killing must be taken and held to be murder in the first degree. This construction of the act of assembly is consistent with, and supported by the decisions of this court, in Burgess's case, 2 Virg. Ca. 483, and Whiteford's case, 6 Rand. 721.

According to the above construction of the statute, it remains to be determined, whether, upon the proof disclosed by the record, the prisoner is guilty of a "wilful, deliberate and premeditated killing." The court does not think it necessary, in this case, to enter into a definition or description of the various operations of the mind in relation to any act, whereby such act should be regarded as wilful, deliberate and premeditated; but, approving the opinion heretofore indicated by this court in relation to this subject, in the cases above referred to, and considering the circumstances of this case, we feel no difficulty in determining, unanimously, that the jury was well justified in finding, that the killing, in this instance, was wilful, deliberate and premeditated. The prisoner, although excited by strong drink, and by an insult offered to a woman, which he thought himself bound to resent, and by a severe blow on himself, for which he had a right to redress, was not, by any of these causes or all combined, so deprived of his mental faculties, according to any evidence in the case, that he could not distinctly under-613 stand *what he willed and was about to do; or so that he could not reflect, and reason, and deliberate, and determine, and choose what he would or would not do. According to the evidence, the first moving cause to commit the act, which constitutes his offence, was the injury done to a woman, for whom he felt an attachment; to her he promised redress for the insult and injury, which she had received; and, before he had himself received any personal injury, he avowed, that the measure of the redress which she should receive, should be filled with the heart's blood of the deceased before sunset. And after he had shed the blood of the deceased, as he had threatened, he said, "he had killed the damn'd rascal, and was glad of it; that he would do the like by any man who should strike the woman he loved, and that any man of spirit would do the like." It is true he had received a severe blow, in the mean time, which was calculated to increase, and no doubt did increase, his resentment against the deceased. But still he referred the revenge he had sought and taken, to the original cause of offence—the blow given to the woman he loved. A considerable time elapsed after both causes of offence, and threats of deadly revenge were made, before he executed his purpose; at least three quarters of an hour; in which time his resentment might have cooled. He employed this time, not in hasty but in deliberate preparation to execute the purpose he had avowed of shedding the blood of the deceased. He dressed his wound, adjusted his clothes, and, being apparently composed, deliberately armed himself with a dirk, or, being already thus armed, went abroad a considerable distance in quest of a gun; chose one with cautious circumspection and judgment; deliberately tried its fitness for the object he had in view, a sure fire; primed, snapped, and flashed it; procured powder and lead, and loaded it; and, thus armed with a drawn dirk, and a loaded gun, traversed the public streets, passed the market place, where, perchance, he might meet the deceased, and, finally, sought him

614 then, with deliberate *aim, shot him to death, while the deceased was unarmed, unresisting, and in actual flight from him. This must certainly be "a wilful, deliberate, and premeditated killing." And, therefore, this court, in answer to the first question propounded, doth unanimously decide, that a new trial ought not to be granted on the ground therein referred to.

As to the second question, this court is, unanimously, of the opinion, that, on a motion for a new trial, the court is not bound to re-examine the witnesses, or to state the evidence verbatim as it was given by the witnesses; and doth, therefore, decide, that a new trial ought not to be awarded for that cause.

As to the third question adjourned: the three jurors referred to, as it appears from the record, were called as by-standers, and were severally, before they were sworn of jury, at the instance of the prisoner, sworn to answer questions touching their indifference. In answer to these questions, they each said for himself, that they had expressed opinions on the prisoner's case, and disclosed generally the grounds on which they had so expressed opinions. Wilkins said he had heard part of the evidence: Gilliam and Angle had heard no part of the evidence, and nothing but the accounts and rumours which were circulated in town: they all said, they had no prejudice against the prisoner, or bias on their minds, so as that they could not give him a fair and impartial trial, in like manner as if they had heard nothing about the affair: and the prisoner, thereupon, elected them, and they were sworn to try his cause. Several days after a verdict was returned against the prisoner, and a motion for a new trial on the merits had been overruled, the prisoner moved for a new trial on the ground of exceptions to these jurors, which, if good, existed at, and before, the time when they were empaneled, but which were then unknown to the prisoner. In support of these exceptions to the jurors, severally, the prisoner adduced witnesses to prove the various opinions which they had expressed unfavourable to his acquittal. But we do not perceive, that 615 any *of these witnesses prove anything inconsistent with what the jurors respectively disclosed on their voir dire. They did not disclose when, where, and to whom they had expressed their opinions, because the prisoner did not demand it. They did not disclose what were the precise opinions they had expressed, whether favourable or unfavourable to the prisoner, because that would have been improper. But they did distinctly disclose the fact, that they had expressed opinions as to what would be the result of his trial, and thereby put him upon his guard. If, in this state of things, the prisoner is at liberty to elect a juror, and take a chance for his acquittal, if the juror should be favourably disposed for it, and to set aside the verdict, if the juror should have expressed opinions unfavourable to it, then almost every verdict of guilty would be set aside. For it is most probable, nay almost certain, that twelve men could not be selected, without previous examination, from any neighbourhood in which an atrocious murder or other felony has been committed, no one of whom has heard of the offence, and expressed an opinion unfavourable to the discharge of the perpetrator. And it is also certain, that by diligent inquiry, for several days pursued, among the neighbours of such one or more, proof could be obtained to establish what was the opinion expressed. This is a practice which should not be indulged. Besides, if the opinion expressed should not, when truly proved, with all the circumstances under which it was uttered, be a good cause of challenge, it might be easily modified by the addition or abstraction of a single word, or at most of a few words. And if the party accused be a man of wealth, of influence, and numerous friends, it would be an easy matter to find some one to make the little, though needful, addition or abstraction, to suit the occasion. And in favour of life, this effort would be made, and with the greatest probability of success, if new proofs were received several days after a motion had been overruled on the merits, and the precise points, in which the prisoner's evidence was deficient, 616 pointed out by *the court. This practice leads directly to perjury and corruption, and ought not to be allowed.

But if the practice here condemned were allowable, a majority of this court is of the opinion, that no sufficient cause of challenge, against the jurors, is established in this case. For, although the cause of challenge might have been sufficient, if proved by the prisoner, without the oath of the jurors respectively, yet, after he has caused them to be sworn, and appealed to their testimony, he shall not thereafter be permitted to reject it altogether, without proof that falsifies it; and if it is not so falsified, it should be taken in conjunction with the testimony of his subsequent witnesses, so as to form one whole; and, in this point of view, if the cause of challenge so proved, had been alleged before the jurors were sworn, it would not have been sufficient. This conclusion is not contradicted, but supported, by the decisions of this court, in Kennedy's case, 2 Virg. Ca. 510; Smith's case, Id. 6; Poore's case, Id. 474.

There is another view of this case, which presents itself to the consideration of this court. We do not know of any case decided in England, or in this country, in which, after a juror had been elected by the prisoner, without making any previous objection to him, a new trial has been granted on the single ground of any cause of challenge for favour existing at the time of his being elected, whether known or unknown to the prisoner. Our statute provides, in terms, "that no exception against any juror on account of his estate, or age, or any other legal disability, shall be allowed after he is sworn." But, as the judge who presides in a criminal case, especially of life and death, ought to be satisfied before he pronounces sentence, that the judgment which he pronounces is just, he may, notwithstanding this act, hear such suggestions of the prisoner, upon proof, as go to shew any flagrant fraud on the part of the juror towards the prisoner, or such unquestionable hostility towards him as necessarily to render it not only improbable, but almost impossible, that such a juror could give the prisoner a fair and impartial trial; and this, although the exception proved against the juror existed before he was elected and sworn. Yet, in the absence of any decision to sustain the position, we cannot consider it as a matter of right, ex debito justitiæ, that the prisoner should have a new trial, in every case, wherein he could shew such cause of challenge against a juror, after trial, as might have been allowed if made before the juror was sworn; especially in a case, wherein the prisoner, having caused the juror to be sworn on his voir dire, elected to be tried by him, without taking any exception. When the prisoner excepts to a juror for cause, before he is sworn, it is matter of right, to be adjudged by the court; when he excepts after trial, for cause existing before the juror was elected and sworn, it is matter addressed to the discretion of the court: in the exercise of this discretion the court ought to consider the whole case, and be satisfied that justice has been done. To grant the prisoner a new trial in the present case, would be to allow that a cause of challenge existing at the time, but not asserted by the prisoner, because it was not known to him, should be as available to the prisoner, after the juror, being elected by the prisoner, has been sworn, and a verdict rendered, as if it had been asserted before; and this cause to be proved by testimony conflicting with the evidence selected by the prisoner himself, the oath of the juror; which, in this case, is proved, in relation to each juror, to be above exception. The decisions of this court heretofore made, do not present this precise view of the question, but they tend to fortify the opinion herein expressed.

Upon the whole matter, this court is of opinion, and doth decide, that a new trial ought not to be granted for any cause suggested by the record; and that the circuit court ought to proceed to pronounce judgment upon the verdict of the jury, according to law.

Judges Brockenbrough and Semple dissented from the opinion of the majority of the court, on the last point. And 618 *Judges Parker and May, though they concurred in the opinion, that the verdict ought not to be set aside, dissented from the opinion of the majority, that there was no just cause of challenge to any of the three jurors, if the prisoner had exercised his right of challenge before they had been elected and sworn.

There are two errata in the above report of this case, so material that it is deemed best to note them here. In the report of the juror Gilliam's first examination, there is a line omitted: after the word "evidence," p. 608, 8th line from the bottom, read "he had expressed an opinion, as others had, in conversation." And in the report of the juror Angle's first examination, p. 607, 16th and 17th lines, instead of "he had expressed no opinion," read "he had expressed an opinion." &c.—Note in Original Edition.

EXECUTORY LIMITATIONS.

1. G. T. having three legitimate children and a natural son, by his will in 1803, makes provision for each, and then adds: In case all my children by my wife die without heirs, my natural son C. shall fall heir to my whole estate; and in case he also die without heirs, my estate shall be divided into six parts, and 2-6ths shall go to my father's brothers that are alive, and the heirs of those that are dead, receiving no more among them than my father's brothers would have received had they been living; 3-6ths to go to C. Leland, S. Leland, L. Leland, H. Gaskins and T. Legg; and the other 6th to go to my wife, to be disposed of as she may think proper; but my wife is to have the use of the whole as long as she lives, if all her own children die without issue: Two of the testator's legitimate children, and his natural son die without leaving issue: his legitimate daughter, E. G. T. survives all her paternal uncles, the three Lelands, H. G. and T. L. and the testator's wife; and then dies without leaving issue:

HELD, as to the personal subject, that the executory bequest thereof, after the death of the natural son without heirs, was void in its creation; and that E. G. T. was entitled to the whole in absolute property.

FORTHCOMING BOND.

1. Fl. fa. against three A. T. and H.: Forthcoming bond taken, the condition whereof does not distinctly state to which of the three defendants the property taken in execution belonged, and omits to state that it was restored to the debtor: HELD, the bond is good.

Harpers and another v. Patton, 306
2. Judgment on forthcoming bond instead of awarding execution thereon, is that plaintiff recover the debt against defendants: HELD, irregular in form yet well in substance. Ibid., 306

3. In a notice of a motion to be made on a forthcoming bond, the bond is described by mistake as executed by John when it was in fact executed by George M. Cooke: HELD, variance material, and notice insufficient.

Cookes v. The Patriotic Bank, 433
4. A fl. fa. is sued out by M. & M. on judgment recovered by them; they indorse on the writ that it is for the benefit of H.: the sheriff levies it and takes a forthcoming bond payable to H.: HELD, the bond is naught.

Meze v. Howver, 443
5. Where county court overrules motion for award of execution on forthcoming bond, on particular ground which renders all other defence unnecessary, and this judgment is reversed by circuit court for error in the particular point: HELD, circuit court ought not to proceed to award of execution immediately, without giving defendant opportunity to make other defence, unless it appear from the record he had no other defence to make.

Anderson v. Leitch & Co., 462
6. Where county court overrules motion for award of execution on forthcoming bond, and circuit court reverses this judgment and awards execution, an appeal lies from such judgment of circuit court, as of right; aliter, where circuit court affirms judgment of county court awarding execution or itself gives original judgment awarding execution, on such bond. Ibid., 462

FREEDOM—Suits for.

1. Contract between master and slave, whereby the master agreed to emancipate the slave for $1000 to be paid by the slave to him, of which the slave paid $500: HELD, that the chancellor cannot 624 "on a bill by the slave against the master, enforce such contract so partly performed.

Stevenson v. Singleton, 72
2. HELD, generally, that the chancellor cannot enforce any contract between master and slave, though it be fully performed on the slave's part.

Ibid., 73

3. By statute of Maryland of 1796, all slaves, brought in that state to reside are declared free: a Virginia bond slave is carried by his master to Maryland: the master settles there, and keeps the slave there, in bondage for 12 years, the statute in force all the time: then he brings him as a slave to Virginia, and sells him here: Adjudged, in an action brought by the man against the purchaser, that he is free.

Hunter v. Fulcher, 173

4. Testator directs that his executor shall emancipate his four slaves A. J. P. and N. and by his will gives them legacies: HELD, the slaves are manumitted by the will, not by the executor's deeds of emancipation.

Dunn v. Amey and others, 465

5. Testator emancipates slaves, by will written all with his own hand, proved to be so by two witnesses and recorded, but the will is not sealed nor attested by two subscribing witnesses: HELD, this will is duly executed and proved to emancipate slaves.

Ibid., 465

6. Slaves so emancipated are still subject to testator's debts, and shall be sold for such term as will yield enough to pay debts. Ibid., 465

7. The court of chancery has jurisdiction to adjust the rights of the creditors and of the freedmen, and to protect the freedmen from absolute sale under the creditor's execution, or from any sale, if the other estate of testator be sufficient to pay his debts. Ibid., 465

FULLY ADMINISTERED.

Debt on bond against an administrator: issues joined on pleas of payment and fully administered: verdict for plaintiff on first issue, and on the last "that assets more than sufficient to pay the debt &c." came to defendant's hands to be administered: HELD, verdict on last issue insufficient to found judgment de bonis testatoris.

Sturdevant's adm'r v. Raines's ex'or, 481

GROWING CROPS.

Mortgage of land, slaves and stock: chancellor in May 1822 decrees foreclosure, and directs his marshal, unless the debt be paid within six months, to sell the subject to satisfy the debt: mortgagor is allowed to retain possession, and sows crop in spring of 1823: marshal sells the subject in June 1823 and mortgagee purchases it and completes crop: afterwards and before marshal's sale reported and confirmed, creditors of mortgagor levy fl. fa. on crop of 1823 then gathered: HELD,

1. Vendee at marshal's sale entitled to the then growing crop.

2. Though mortgagor in possession be tenant at will to mortgagee, yet doctrine of emblements does not apply to his case.

3. Chancellor ought, in such case, to protect vendee's property in the crop, by injoining mortgagor's creditors from proceeding under their execution.

Crews v. Pendleton and Mountcastle, 297

HAND-WRITING.

1. Upon the trial of issue on plea of non est factum whether the party's signature to the instrument in question be genuine or no: HELD inadmissible to lay other proved specimens of the party's handwriting before the jury, that it may judge by comparison thereof with the writing in question whether this be genuine evidence. Such comparison of hand-writing is not proper evidence.

Row's adm'r v. Kile's adm'r, 216

Tapp v. Beverley, 80

2. Where a party defendant in a suit at law, before judgment, resorts as plaintiff to equity, praying relief against the claim asserted at law on equitable grounds, and an injunction to stay proceedings at law, the injunction should be granted "only on condition that he confess judgment at law, tho' he may have grounds of defence at law, distinct from the grounds of relief preferred to the court of equity.

Warwick &c. v. Norvell, 96

3. Where an injunction has been granted in such a case and the chancellor dissolves the injunction unless the plaintiff in equity will confess judgment at law; on appeal from such an order this court will not examine the merits, though at the time the order was made the cause stood for hearing. Ibid., 96

Howle's adm'r v. Dunn & Co., 455
2. If the prisoner's counsel in a criminal case, asks the opinion of the court, and an instruction to the jury on a point of law, and the court rules the point against the prisoner; his counsel shall not be allowed to controvert the correctness of the court's opinion on such point, before the jury. 588

2. In the location of a land warrant, the entry calls to begin at three marked red-oaks and to extend down for quantity: these three oaks are on the head waters of a stream called Poplar Fork; the survey does not extend down that stream for quantity, but leaving it entirely, extends down the general course of the country; and there is evidence that the call of the entry to extend down for quantity, in the usual sense of that phrase in locations, required the locator to extend down Poplar Fork for quantity: Held, the survey is naught for not conforming with the entry. Ibid., 858

3. An entry calls to begin one mile above a marked tree and a rock on Big Hurricane creek, eight or nine miles above its mouth; the marked tree and rock are on the east side of the creek, thirteen miles from its mouth by the meanders, and more than nine miles in a straight line: the survey of this entry begins at a point on the west side of the creek, 66 poles from the stream and one mile and 84 poles from the designated tree and rock: Held, 1. The entry is special and precise enough: 2. The survey conforms with the entry with reasonable exactness, especially as a jury had so found shortly after the survey, upon a caveat to which though not all yet some of the parties, now contesting the right under this survey were parties. Ibid., 858

LIEN.

1. If several creditors, by judgments of different dates, resort to a court of equity for satisfaction out of an equitable interest of their debtor in real estate, they are to have satisfaction out of the fund according to the order of their judgments in point of time, the elder being entitled to priority over the younger. 140

Haleys v. Williams, 140
2. In equity, judgments are liens on the whole of the debtor's equitable estate in lands: so that not a moiety only but the whole fund is first to be applied to satisfy the elder judgment, and not a moiety only, but the whole of the residue is then to be applied to satisfy the younger judgment. Ibid., 140

3. Quare, whether if there be two judgments of different dates and elegits on each, and a moiety of the debtor's lands be extended on the elder, the whole instead of half only of the other moiety, be not properly extendible on the younger judgment. Ibid., 140

4. H. obtains judgment against J. and sues out a ca. sa. on which the debtor is taken in execution: while he is in custody, the commonwealth obtains a judgment against him, and sues out a fi. fa.: under which his lands are sold: and then the debtor takes the oath of insolvency, and is discharged from custody under H.'s ca. sa.: Held, the lien of H.'s ca. sa. executed, given by the statute, 1 R. C. c. 124, § 10, overreaches the lien of the commonwealth's judgment and gives the priority to H. 257

MILLS.

1. L. owning land on both sides of a stream, applied for leave to build a mill upon and dam across it: it was found by inquest on an ad quod damnum, that lands in the possession of A. of the value of $35, would be overflowed: the court on a hearing, being of opinion that these lands belonged not to A. but to L. himself, granted L. leave to build his dam without paying any damages to A.: Held error: for the right in the lands could not be thus collaterally tried. 1

Anthony & another v. Lawhorne, 1

2. In such case leave should be granted only on condition that L. pay A. the damages assessed by the jury; and L. might build his dam at his peril, without paying them, and then defend A.'s action against him on the ground that the lands overflowed are his own, and thus put the title directly in issue. Ibid., 1

H. indebted to P. on forthcoming bond, solicits him not to move for awards of execution thereon and to take flour for the debt; which P. refuses to do; but it is at last agreed that P. shall send H.'s flour to his own commission merchant at Richmond to be by him sold there and the net proceeds to be applied to H.'s credit on the bond: P. in March, sends the flour to Richmond, consigns it to his commission merchant, and directs him to sell it and remit proceeds in May to himself at Baltimore, where he should then be: the merchant writes to P. that he has received and sold the flour and will remit proceeds to him at B. according to his directions: but before time appointed for remittance, the merchant fails, and the money without any fault of P. is wholly lost: HELD, that H. must bear the loss.

1. Sci. fa. by husband and wife upon a judgment recovered by wife dum sola suggesting that since rendition of the judgment the wife had intermarried with the husband. Plea actio non because at the date of the emanation of the sci. fa. the wife was not married to the husband as suggested in the writ; concluding to the country. And plea held naught upon general demurrer; 1. because the matter of it is properly pleadable in abatement only, in bar; 2. because it neither distinctly negatives the fact suggested in the writ nor affirms any matter to avoid the action; and 3. because instead of concluding with a verification, it concludes to the country.

2. In debt against an executor, after judgment by default, defendant tenders at the next term four good pleas in bar, to all which plaintiff instanten puts in proper replications, tendering issues; but defendant refuses to join the issues, or to rejoin, or to demur; whereupon the court rejects defendant's pleas and proceeds to judgment: HELD, under the circumstances, the pleas were rightly rejected.

3. In debt against an executor, defendant pleads that his testator was in his lifetime guardian of an infant, that accounts of the guardianship had been settled by county court commissioners, which shewed a large balance due to the ward, and that this was a debt of higher dignity than that claimed by plaintiff: HELD, this was not an issuable plea.

Deed of marriage settlement of slaves then in Hanover, where deed was made and duly recorded: husband, entitled to and holding possession under settlement, removes with the slaves to Richmond and there mortgages them for debt of his own, contrary to terms of the settlement, within twelve months after his removal of them: the trustee of the subject under the settlement, fails to have it recorded in Richmond, within twelve months after the removal of the slaves; but within the twelve months, he files a bill in chancery against the husband and mortgagee, asserting his legal title to the slaves and the trusts of the settlement; HELD, the mortgagee is a purchaser with notice of settlement within twelve months after removal of slaves to Richmond, and as to him, the failure of the trustee in the deed of marriage settlement to have it recorded in Richmond, does not make the settlement void, under statute 1 Rev. Richard v. Mercer, 126
4. A. by covenant in July 1779, contracts to sell land to B. for £3,500, whereof B. pays £1,734 in cash, and covenants to pay balance on A.'s making him a conveyance; in September following, B. pays balance in full, to A. in person, and receives possession; but A. makes no conveyance; or if he made one, it cannot be found; in July 1791, B. by assignment sealed and indorsed on A.'s covenant, assigns all his right, &c. in the land to C. for value received; and C. takes possession; in October 1797, C. contracts to sell the land to D. for £200, whereof £500 was to be paid in 1798, and £300 in 1799; and C. covenants to give D. possession on receiving the first payment in 1798, and to make him a lawful title on 630 receiving the last payment: D. makes *the first payment in 1798 and receives possession, which he and his heirs have ever since held; D. never makes or tenders the last payment; C. never makes or tenders the conveyance; and they both die. Upon a bill by C.'s adm'r and heirs against D.'s adm'r and heirs, for specific execution of the contract of Oct. 1797, the chancellor decrees specific execution, and charges the balance of purchase money on the land; and decree affirmed.

STEALING A FREE PERSON.

D. is indicted for stealing a free mulatto boy, knowing at the time that he was free: HELD,

2. That the stealing a free negro with felonious intent to appropriate him, is criminal, whether the person so stealing him know him to be free or not.

3. That though the knowledge of the freedom is averred in the indictment, it need not be proved, but may be regarded as surplusage; but

4. That if one come lawfully into possession of a free negro, not knowing him to be free, and sell him; knowledge of his freedom at the time of selling, is necessary to make the selling criminal.

5. That when one takes and carries away a free negro boy of eight years of age, with criminal intent to appropriate him, the consent of such a boy does not excuse or lessen the offence.

TRUSTS AND TRUSTEES.

E. C. bequeathed four slaves to C. C. and F. T. trustees, in trust to apply the profits to maintenance of testator's daughter, J. B. and her husband, S. K. B. and their children, during lives of daughter and husband, and of survivor, remainder to the children of the daughter by that husband: both trustees declined the trust: no trustee was substituted: the executor delivered the slaves to Mrs. B. her husband being then in Europe, where he died: Mrs. B. then married V. who in 1798 sold R. all the trust slaves, for his wife's life, R. having notice of the trust: R. removed them from Fredericksburg to Augusta, held some there, gave some away, sold others: the second husband, V. died in 1806. Upon bill in chancery by Mrs. V. and her children by B. against R. praying discovery of names &c. of the slaves and their increase, restoration of them and account of profits, and

(on a charge that R. would remove the property out of the State) an injunction to restrain him from doing so; and R. not pleading to the jurisdiction: Decreed.

1. R. had no right to hold the slaves, even during Mrs. V's life, as they were a trust subject, and the profits applicable to maintenance of her and her children; though quære how far her interest passed by her second husband's sale to R.

2. The court of chancery had jurisdiction of the case: because the charges in the bill of the necessity of a discovery and of a design to remove the slaves out of reach, saved the bill from being demurrable, and if that charge were only colourable, R. should have pleaded to the jurisdiction; and (chiefly) because the slaves were a trust subject, represented by no trustee who could sue at law, and which equity alone could apply to the purposes of the trust.

3. R. could not protect himself under the statute of limitations: because he bought with notice of the trust and so was charged with it; and because his removal of the slaves to a distant county, thus keeping owners in ignorance where they were, was an obstruction to the assertion of their rights by action, precluding him from pleading the statute, within § 14, 1 Rev. Code, c. 128, p. 491.

Rankin v. Bradford and others, 163
4. M. by deed of trust conveyed (inter alia) twenty slaves to a trustee, to secure a debt due to W. & Co. payable twelve months after the date of the deed: within the year M. sold one of the slaves to A. two to B. one to C. and one to R. who alleged that M. sold at request and by authority of W. & Co.: when the debt fell due, all the rest of the trust subject was sold and the proceeds fell far short of the debt due W. & Co.: W. & Co. brought suit in chancery against M., the purchasers of the five slaves, and the trustee: denying M.'s authority to sell the five slaves; praying a foreclosure of the equity of redemption thereof, and that the purchasers be decreed to deliver them up to be sold under the deed of trust: HELD, that though W. & Co. might have brought actions at law in the trustee's name, to recover the slaves of the respective purchasers, yet their case was properly relievable in equity.

USURY.

1. C. wanting to raise $2,335, tells J. this, and offers him as many slaves as will command that sum: upon which J. pays him $2,335 in gross, for sixteen slaves, and C. gives him a bill of sale thereof: and it is at the same time agreed that the slaves shall remain in C.'s possession on hire for one year; and if at the end of the year, C. shall pay J. $2,935, J. shall in consideration thereof, re-sell the slaves to him; if any of the slaves die during the year, C. to pay same price, and no less for survivors; and if C. shall not pay the $2,935 punctually, J.'s agreement to re-sell them to him to be void: HELD, a shift to evade statute of usury, and contract usurious.

2. C. contracting usurious debt to G. gives him a deed of trust on slaves to secure it: afterwards, C. voluntarily surrenders trust slaves to trustee to be sold to satisfy the debt: at trustee's sale, in itself fair, G. buys greater part of trust slaves, and the proceeds of sales are applied to the debt: HELD, though deed of trust usurious, yet trustee's sales of the subject to G. the usurious creditor, shall not be disturbed in equity. Ibid., 147

3. Though where one resorts to equity for relief against usurious debt yet unpaid, he shall be required to pay only the principal advanced to him without even lawful interest according to the statute of Virginia: yet where debtor seeks, in equity, an account of and decree for money already paid on usurious contract, the measure of relief is, the excess paid above principal and lawful interest: and if his payments exceed principal and lawful interest, the surplus with interest shall be decreed to him. Ibid., 147
4. In a bill for relief against usury, plaintiff charges usury exacted at rate of two and a half or three per cent. per month: defendant in his answer, admits he exacted usury but says he does not remember the rate: and there is no proof to ascertain the rate: HELD, that in this state of the case, the court should consider the rate of usury two and a half per cent. per month.

Fulcher v. Baker and others, 458
5. M. borrows money of L. on usury, and by deed of trust conveys land to a trustee, with power to sell the subject when required after debt should fall due, and raise money to pay it: the lender dies: his administrators require trustee to sell trust subject: the borrower exhibits a bill in chancery charging the usury, requiring defendants to answer the charge, insisting that the deed of trust is null and void, and praying injunction to restrain trustee from selling: the administrators of the lender and the trustee disclaim all knowledge of the usury: but the usury is proved by one witness: HELD, that in such a case, the court of chancery should injoin the trustee from selling the trust subject, till the creditors claiming under it should establish its legal validity in some proper forum where the debtor may have opportunity to contest it—dissentiently CARR, J.

Martin v. Lindsay's adm'rs and others, 499

VARIANCE.

In covenant, defendant takes over of the covenant, and afterwards pleads covenants performed: HELD, that defendant by over, has made the covenant itself a part of the record, and cannot at the trial of the issue object to the covenant as evidence on the ground of variance between it and the covenant set forth in the declaration.

Armstrong v. Armstrongs, 491

VENDOR AND VENDEE.

1. Vendors of land, bound to make a conveyance thereof, are bound so to execute it in presence of witnesses or so to acknowledge it before magistrates, that the vendee may have it recorded according to law.

WILLS.

Attestation and Probat.

1. An attestation of a will of lands made in the same room with testator, is prima facie an attestation in his presence, according to the statute of wills: an attestation not made in the same room is prima facie not an attestation in his presence: but as in the one case the attestation is good, if shewn to have been made within the scope of testator's view from his actual position: so in the other it is not good, if it appear that in the actual relative situation of testator and witnesses, he could not possibly have seen the act of attestation, nor have so changed situation as to have enabled him to see it, without aid from others, which was at hand, but was neither asked nor given.

Nell & others v. Nell & others, 6

2. Will, disposing of real and personal estate, but not duly executed as to the real, was admitted to probat by county court, in general terms, in 1785, and never contested: HELD, this was full probat: the heir could only have contested the will, by bill in chancery, within seven years; and he instead of so contesting it, having taken, as devisee under it, it must now be regarded as a complete will of lands.

Vaughan v. Green, 287

Construction of.

3. John Crow bequeathed that the balance of his slaves should be divided equally between his children, to wit: the heirs of W. C. (a deceased son of testator) naming them, seven in number, T. C., M. C., and J. C., (sons of testator) and the children of his deceased daughters M. J. and S. C., but the children of his daughters M. J. and S. C. should take respectively only such part as their mothers respectively would take if still alive, that is to say a child's part: HELD, that the seven children of the deceased son took equally per capita with the testator's three living sons, and the children of his two deceased daughters took per stirpes each, their mother's part.

Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.

Snapp v. Spengler and Wife.

February, 1890.

(Absent COALTER and GREEN, J.)

Writ of Right—Count—Certainty of Demand.—The count in writ of right demands a certain tenement consisting of the one stone house with the appurtenances &c. HELD, this is a demand of the land on which the house stands, and is certain enough.

Same—Plea—Blanks—Bad Grammar—Effect of Verdict.—To count in writ of right by husband and wife in right of wife, tenant files a plea in blank throughout, and tenders the mise to the defendant in the singular; replication filed by both demandants joins the mise as for male defendant only; assize is charged to inquire whether demandants have right as they demand: HELD, after verdict for demandants, the blanks, informalities and bad grammar of plea and replication, immaterial.

In a writ of right, brought by the appellees against the appellant, in the circuit court of Shenandoah, the demandants' count was in these words: "Anthony Speugler and Catharine his wife, by their attorney, demand a certain tenement consisting of the one stone house with the appurtenances in the county of Shenandoah, of which the said Snapp now holds possession, and which is situated on the 2 *land conveyed by Joseph Stone to Christian Stover, and by him devised to the said Catharine Spengler: whereupon the said A. S. and C. his wife say, that they have right to have the tenement aforesaid consisting of the said stone house with the appurtenances" &c.

Snapp, the tenant, put in a plea, which was in blank throughout, thus: "And the aforesaid , by his attorney, cometh and defendeth the right of the said stone house with the appurtenances, when and where it behoveth him, and all that concerneth it, and whatsoever he ought to defend, and chiefly the tenement aforesaid with the appurtenances as of right, namely, tenement, containings , in the county of Shenandoah, and bounded by , and putteth himself upon the assize, and prayeth recognizance to be made whether he hath greater right to hold the tenement aforesaid with the appurtenances as he now holdeth it, or the said to have as he now demandeth it."

The replication was as follows: "And the aforesaid A. S. and C. his wife in like manner putteth himself upon the assize, and prayeth recognizance to be made, whether he hath greater right to hold the tenement aforesaid with the appurtenances as he now holdeth it, or the said Snapp to have it as he now demandeth it."

The assize was sworn and charged to try, "Whether Snapp had more right to hold the tenement, which A. S. and C. his wife demanded against him, or A. S. and C. his wife to have it as they demanded."

Verdict for the demandants, that they had greater right to have the tenement with the appurtenances in the count mentioned, to wit, the said stone house, than the tenant had to hold the same. Whereupon the circuit court gave judgment for the demandants; and Snapp appealed to this court.

Johnson, for the appellant. The only description of the subject demanded is that contained in the count—"the one stone

claimed. It is doubtful, whether a writ of right lies for a house, eo nomine, though it lies for a messuage: in Co. Litt. 56, b. it is said, a præcipe lies not de domo, but de messuagio. But if the writ lies for a house, that term includes the orchard, garden, and curtilage, and thus it may include an acre or more of land besides what the house itself covers. Co. Lit. Ibid. and 5, b. Therefore, in a writ of right for a house, it is necessary to describe the boundary; else it cannot be known, what and how much land is claimed with the house.

In this case, neither count, plea, replication, nor verdict contains any description of the boundary; and it is impossible to know what or how much land is to be adjudged to the demandants. And this defect, which leaves the very subject in controversy unascertained, so that the judgment is as vague and uncertain as the pleadings and verdict, is not cured by the verdict. Beverley v. Fogg, 1 Call 484; Turberville v. Long, 3 Hen. & Munf. 309. The pleadings are wholly irregular. The plea being in blank throughout, is no better than if the record had stated that the defendant put in the "usual plea;" in which case it has been held that a repleader should be awarded: Taylor v. Huston, 2 Hen. & Munf. 161.

The plea also is framed to join the mise with one demandant only; to contest that single demandant's right: but there were two demandants. So, in the replication, it is the husband only that joins the mise, though the count claims the subject in right of his wife. And the replication reverses the claims of the parties, stating the demandants' claim as a claim to hold, and the tenant's as a claim to demand. These also are faults in the pleadings not cured by the verdict: Chichester v. Boggess, 5 Munf. 98.

Conveyance of Land—Description by Metes and Bounds Unnecessary.—A description by metes and bounds, in a deed conveying land, is not necessary when the premises are well known by name. Lennig v. White, 1 Va. Dec. 887, citing the principal case and Beverley v. Fogg, 1 Call 484.

Stanard, for the appellee. The statute for reforming the proceedings in writs of right, gives the forms of the pleadings, but is careful not to confine the parties strictly to those forms: it provides and repeats, as to the writ, the plea, the replication, the charge to the assize, respectively,

4 that each "shall be "in this form, or to this effect." We are then to look to the substance. Though the plea, in this case, was left in blank in some respects, yet it was filed by the tenant, and it denies the right to the very subject demanded in the count: it is, therefore, a plea in writing to the count, and defends the right as clearly as if the blanks had been filled up. The other objections taken to the plea and replication, are only objections to bad grammar. As to the alleged defect in the description of the property in the count: the count does not claim a house with the appurtenances, merely; it claims a certain tenement being the one stone house with the appurtenances, whereof the tenant was then in possession &c. This furnishes the description of the land claimed; namely, the land on which the house stands. And it is hard to imagine any description of the premises, which would have given the tenant more certain knowledge of the property demanded of him, or which could more certainly identify the subject.

BROOKE, P. Upon a review of the cases relied on in the argument for the appellant, it is very apparent, that this court, in its construction of the statute for reforming the proceedings in writs of right, has looked more to the effect of the pleadings, than to the forms prescribed and set out in the statute; which was fully warranted by the words of the statute, so often repeated, that the count and the pleadings shall each be in the form there given, "or to that effect." And the inquiry, in all the cases cited, has always been, is there sufficient certainty in the description of the land and premises, demanded in the pleadings, to give full notice to the parties of the controversy on which the mise was joined, so that the judgment or the verdict would be a bar to another writ for the same matter? To require greater strictness in the pleadings, after verdict, would countenance all the delays of the view, which embarrassed the proceedings at common law, which had been abolished by the statute of 1734, ch. 6, §

10, (4 Hen. stat. at large, p. 402,) and 5 which, among *other inconveniences, the statute for reforming the method of proceeding in writs of right was intended to obviate. At the common law, the tenant by waiving view, and joining the mise, took upon himself a knowledge of the land demanded in the count; and, under the statute, by joining the mise, he waives all objection to the description of the land demanded in the count, if it be sufficient for the purposes before stated. The cases of Turberville v. Long, 3 Hen. & Munf. 309, Lovell v. Arnold, 2 Munf. 167, and Bolling v. Mayor of Petersburg, 3 Rand. 563, illustrate this doctrine.

In the case before us, the first objection is to the sufficiency of the description of the tenement demanded in the count: "a certain tenement, consisting of the one stone house with the appurtenances" &c. This, it is insisted, is uncertain, because by a grant of a house eo nomine, the curtilage, which is of no fixed extent, will pass, and therefore ought to be described in the pleadings by metes and bounds. Had the count merely demanded a stone house and its appurtenances, it might possibly be within the case of Beverly v. Fogg. But the demand is of a certain tenement consisting of the one stone house and its appurtenances; limiting the description to the tenement or land on which the house stands. A tenement consisting of the one stone house, I think, can include no more.

The other objections to the blanks in the plea, and to the bad grammar of the replication, cannot be entitled to any weight, after a verdict on the mise joined, which is responsive to the charge to the jury. The tenant could not be permitted to set aside the verdict for faults in his own plea, especially in a case in which the blanks in the plea are supplied by the charge to the jury.

The other judges concurred, and the judgment was affirmed.

Equity Jurisdiction—Account*—Case at Bar—Bill in chancery stating running accounts for many years between plaintiff and defendant, consisting of numerous items of debit and credit or claims for them on both sides, and praying an account and decree for balance: Held, this is a bill for an account which equity will entertain, though assumpsit might have lain at law.

Same—Exceptions to—Time of Taking.—Where bill in chancery states matter proper for relief in equity, and defendant without pleading to jurisdiction in abatement, answers the bill, he is precluded from taking exception to jurisdiction afterwards, by stat. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 66, § 86. Aliter, if bill on its face, shew case not properly relievable in equity.

Equity Jurisdiction—Account.—In matters of account, courts of equity possess a concurrent jurisdiction in most, if not all, cases with courts of law. Tillar v. Cook, 77 Va. 480, citing the principal case.

In discussing the jurisdiction of courts of equity in matters of account Petty v. Fogle, 16 W. Va. 518, and Yates v. Stuart, 39 W. Va. 129, 19 S. E. Rep. 425, cite the principal case.

For further information on this subject, see foot-note to Coffman v. Sangston, 21 Gratt. 263; foot-note to Sturtevant v. Goode, 5 Leigh 83; monographic note on "Jurisdiction" appended to Phippen v. Durham, 8 Gratt. 457.

Same—Exceptions to—Statute—Application.—By statute, 1 Rev. Code 1819, p. 214, § 86, it was provided that "after answer filed and no plea in abatement to the jurisdiction of the court, no exception for want of jurisdiction shall ever afterwards be made; nor shall the court every thereafter delay or refuse justice, or reverse the proceeding for want of jurisdiction, except," etc. Notwithstanding the strong language of this statute, it was unanimously decided in Pollard v. Patterson, 3 Hen. & M. 67, that the statute meant to embrace those cases only in which the bill showed on its face proper matter for the jurisdiction of equity, and the exception had to be taken by plea; and that the omission to plead gave equity no power to decree in favor of the plaintiff. If the case appeared upon the face of the bill to be a mere legal question. The construction of the statute adopted in this case has ever since been followed. Stuart v. Coalter, 4 Rand. 74; Hickman v. Stout, 2 Leigh 6; Morgan v. Carson, 7 Leigh 238.—MONCURE, J., delivering the opinion of the court in Hudson v. Kline, 9 Gratt. 386. Chancery Practice—Statute of Limitations—How Relied on.—The statute of limitations cannot be insisted on in equity, without being pleaded, or in some form, relied on as a defence, in the pleadings.

Stout exhibited his bill against Hickman, in the superiour court of chancery of Clarksburg, setting forth that there had been for a series of years mutual accounts between him and Hickman, consisting on his part of charges for blacksmith's work done by him for Hickman, and on the other side of credits for various articles supplied and payments otherwise made to him by Hickman; that on these accounts there was a balance justly due to him of some 325 dollars; but that owing to his confidence in Hickman, to the circumstance of his frequently doing his smith's work by himself, and to the nature of the account, consisting of numerous small charges and running during several years, he was unable to adduce full proof of the items. He exhibited his state of the account with the bill; called upon Hickman for a discovery as to the justice of it; and prayed an account, and a decree for the balance that should be found due to him.

Hickman answered, that it was true that Stout had a claim against him for blacksmith's work, but he could not state the just amount due to him; that he had seen the account exhibited with the bill; it was in some parts just, in others unjust; there were items of debit against him in it, with which he was not justly chargeable, and he was entitled to credits that were not allowed him; but the answer did not 7 *specify either the items unjustly charged to him, or the credits unjustly omitted, in the account exhibited by Stout.

Many depositions were taken and filed by both parties. The answer of Hickman being vague and general, and affording no specific evidence of the justice of Stout's claim, or of any part of it, Stout had to rely intirely on his own proofs. He was only able to adduce specific evidence of a part of the items of his account, and evidence of his having done Hickman's blacksmith's work for several years, and of the probable quantum of work required by him; so that the case, in the event, depended upon an estimate of the probable amount of the work yearly done, to be made upon consideration of all the circumstances. It appeared, that all the evidence which was adduced by Stout in the progress of the cause, was in his power at the time he exhibited his bill; and it is obvious, that the evidence was of a nature to avail him as well in an action at law, as in this suit in equity.

The charges in Stout's account, commenced in 1814; and his bill was exhibited in 1823; so that the charges of some three or four years were of an older date than five years before the commencement of the suit.

Chancellor Tucker referred the accounts between the parties to a commissioner, who made a report, which the chancellor disapproved; and, proceeding himself to adjust the account, upon the principle of a fair annual allowance to Stout for the work done by him for Hickman, he decreed to Stout 163 dollars with interest from March 1823; a sum far short of Stout's demand. From this decree Hickman appealed to this court.

The case was argued here by Michie for the appellant, and Wyndham Robertson for the appellee. Two points of law were made in the argument:

1. Michie objected to the jurisdiction of the court of chancery; and argued, that the case set forth in the bill was so exactly the proper subject of an action of assumpsit, that *if this bill should be entertained, every case of assumpsit might be brought into equity.

Robertson answered, that this was a bill for a discovery, and a case too of mutual accounts, which was a settled head of equity, and that the objection came too late. He referred to the statute, which provides, that "after answer filed, and no plea in abatement to the jurisdiction of the court, no exception for want of jurisdiction shall ever afterwards be made, nor shall the superiour courts of chancery, or any other court, ever thereafter delay or refuse justice, or reverse the proceedings for want of jurisdiction, except in controversies respecting lands lying without the jurisdiction of such court, and also of infants and femes covert." 1 Rev. Code, ch. 66, § 86, p. 214; Pollard v. Patterson, 3 Hen. & Munf. 67.

2. Michie insisted, that all the items of Stout's account of an older date than five years before the commencement of the suit ought to have been disallowed, as being barred by the statute of limitations; and, for the same reason, the chancellor on his principle of adjusting the claim, ought not to have carried the yearly allowances to Stout farther back than five years.

Robertson answered, that the statute of limitations was not pleaded, or in any way relied on.

Michie replied, that it could not have been pleaded; for, in the account which Stout exhibited with his bill, there was no debit to Hickman of an older date than the five years: the objection appeared in the progress of the cause, when the accounts came to be stated by the commissioner.

CARR, J. It was insisted for the appellant, that this was a simple demand for work and labour done, the proper subject of an action of assumpsit, and therefore no case for relief in equity. To which it was answered, that the objection comes too late, and that this is a bill for a discovery, and a case of mutual accounts. The posi-graphic note on "Jurisdiction" appended to Phippen v. Durham, 8 Gratt. 457.

Chancery Practice—Statute of Limitations—How Advantage Taken.—No rule is better established than that one cannot avail himself of statute of limitations, in a suit in equity, without pleading it. To this effect the principal case was cited in Gibson v. Green, 80 Va. 526, 16 S. E. Rep. 661; Hubble v. Poff, 98 Va. 647, 37 S. E. Rep. 277; Woodard v. Polsley, 14 W. Va. 220.

In Humphrey v. Spencer, 36 W. Va. 18, 14 S. E. Rep. 413, and Bartles v. Gibson, 17 Fed. Rep. 298, the principal case was cited to the point that the statute of limitations must be in some way relied on by demurrer, plea, or answer. While this seems to be the West Virginia rule, in Virginia, the defense must be made by plea or answer; it cannot be taken advantage of by a demurrer to the bill. See Foot-note to Colvert v. Millstead, 5 Leigh 88.

tion, that the objection comes too late, was rested on the 86th section of the statute "concerning the courts of chancery. The very point was considered by this court, and ably and learnedly discussed in Pollard v. Patterson. The unanimous opinion of the court was, that the statute meant to embrace cases, where the bill shewed a case proper for equity, and the exception had to be taken by way of plea; but that the omission to plead gives equity no power to decree in favour of a plaintiff, upon a case appearing upon the face of the bill, to be merely a legal question. This opinion is supported by sound reason, and unquestioned authority; and the point has ever since been considered as settled. We must, therefore, inquire, whether this bill, on its face, states a case exclusively proper for law? whether, in other words, a demurrer to it would have been sustained? I do not think such demurrer could have been sustained. The bill states mutual accounts between the parties, running through a series of years, and consisting of numerous items of blacksmith's work, on the one hand; and on the other, of various articles of country produce delivered, such as wood, coal, hay, wheat, potatoes; of money paid at different times; of work done with wagons &c. When I speak of the bill, I consider the account filed with it, as a part of it. The bill also seeks a discovery: but without considering this last point, the first is sufficient, I think, to support the jurisdiction. It is laid down, in all the books of practice, that account is a settled head of equity jurisdiction. This point was before this court in the case of Smith v. Marks, 2 Rand. 449, where the authorities were examined, and this conclusion drawn, that the word account is to be understood as applying to every case, where there is a demand on one side, and a set-off on the other; that a single matter could not be the subject of a bill in equity, but there must be mutual demands. In the case of the Corporation of Carlisle v. Wilson, 13 Ves. 278, the chancellor states the grounds of this jurisdiction: "the principle (he says) upon which courts of equity originally entertained suits for an account, where the party had a legal title, is, that though he might support a suit at law, a court of law either 10 "cannot give a remedy, or cannot give so complete a remedy, as a court of equity; and by degrees courts of equity assumed a concurrent jurisdiction in cases of account; for it cannot be maintained, that this court interferes only when no remedy can be had at law." He concludes, that equity exercises a sound discretion, in decreeing or refusing an account. I do not think, therefore, that a demurrer to this bill could have been sustained.

It was also insisted in the argument, that the statute of limitations, though not pleaded, ought to have been applied to the appellee's account. There is no rule better established, than that one cannot avail himself of the statute of limitations, in a suit in equity, without pleading it. This was admitted as the general rule; but the appellant's counsel argued, that this case was taken out of it, because neither the bill, nor the account exhibited with it, shewed any items of more than five years standing. If this were the fact, I do not think it would have entitled the defendant to avail himself of the statute without pleading it, however he might have taken advantage of the defect in another way: but it appears on examination, that the counsel is mistaken as to the fact: the account exhibited with the bill, the account which Hickman in his answer said he had seen, commences as early as 1814.

The chancellor has reduced Stout's demand more than I should have done upon the evidence; but of this the appellant cannot complain, and the appellee does not.

The other judges concurring, the decree was affirmed.

11 *Waller v. Armistead's Adm'rs.

February, 1830.

(Absent COALTER and GREEN, J.)

Husband and Wife—Antenuptial Conveyance—Fraud on Husband.—Deeds executed by a woman immediately before her marriage, giving away her property, without knowledge of her intended husband, are fraudulent as to the husband.

Guardian and Ward—Release Deed Executed by Ward Shortly after Attaining Majority—Validity.—Deeds of gift, or of release and acquittance, made by ward to guardian or person who has borne part of guardian, shortly after ward's attainment to full age, but before delivering of ward's estate and without any settlement of accounts, are void on the principle of public policy, without proof of actual fraud; much more, if circumstances of transaction evince actual fraud.

Same—Same—Same.—No just distinction. In this respect, between deeds of gift, and deeds of release and acquittance, by ward to guardian: both equally condemned by equity.

Same—Same—Lapse of Time—Effect.—Female ward makes deed of general release and acquittance to guardian, without any settlement of accounts, and deed of gift to guardian's infant son, without having its contents and effect explained to her; and marries the same day: husband lives for more than 20 years, and then dies: Held, the lapse of time during the coverture does not affect the right of the wife to impeach the deeds in equity.

Lucy B. Armistead, daughter of John Armistead who died in 1780, and of Mary his wife, who survived him and died in 1792, became entitled, on the death of her mother, to sundry slaves and to an interest in a tract of land in New Kent. She was then an infant, yet, as it appeared, she never had any guardian legally and regularly appointed; but her brother Robert B. Armistead, who was the administrator de bonis non of their father and the administrator of their mother, acted for her in the place of a guardian. He took upon himself the care of supporting her during her infancy, and possessed himself of the slaves

Husband and Wife—Antenuptial Conveyance—Fraud on Husband.—Where the disposition of her property by an intended wife is made in pursuance of an agreement entered into before the marriage was definitely contemplated, all presumption of fraud is negatived. Gregory v. Winston, 23 Gratt. 126, citing principal case.

See further, on this subject, monographic note on "Husband and Wife" appended to Cleland v. Watson, 10 Gratt. 159.

Guardian and Ward—Release Deed Executed by Ward Shortly after Attaining Majority—Validity.—To the point that the law, on a principle of public policy, vacates, without proof of any actual fraud whatever, all conveyances by a ward to his guardian shortly after attaining his majority, the principal case is cited in Pye v. Jenkins, 20 Fed. Cas. 98.

belonging to her, employing them either on his own farm, or hiring them out and receiving the hires. This state of things continued till December 24th 1801, when she married Aylet Waller. Robert B. Armistead had made no settlement of the accounts of his guardianship, or agency for his sister; and he still retained in his own hands the estate she was entitled to, though she had then attained to full age.

12 But, on the very *day of her marriage, a few minutes before the ceremony, he stated to her in the absence and without the knowledge of her intended husband, that the advances he had made for her would, on a fair settlement, be about equal to the amount of the hires of her slaves; and without exhibiting any account, or stating any particulars, he proposed that she should give him an acquittance of the hires, and tendered a writing which he had previously prepared for the purpose, for her signature. She executed the instrument: it was a deed, dated December 24th 1801, whereby, after reciting that the parties had mutually agreed to settle all accounts, and to release, each to the other, all demands for money on any and every account whatsoever, the sister acquitted the brother of all demands, and acknowledged full satisfaction of whatever he might owe her. And at the same time, she executed another deed, bearing the same date, which had also been prepared by her brother, but which was not explained to her, nor did it appear that she had any knowledge of its contents or object: this purported to be a deed of gift, in consideration of natural love and affection, to her nephew John D. Armistead, an infant son of Robert B. Armistead, of all her right, title, interest, and proportion, of the proceeds of the sale of the tract of land in New Kent, on which Robert B. Armistead then lived, and which had been previously sold under a decree of the county court of New Kent, to a proportion whereof she was entitled as one of the children of John and Mary Armistead.

Robert B. Armistead died in the year 1811, without having ever settled his accounts of his administration of his father's or mother's estates. And, during his lifetime, Aylet Waller and his wife made no effort to set aside the deed of acquittance, or the deed of gift, of the 24th December 1801, or to compel him to settle his accounts of administration of the estates of his father and mother, and to distribute the surplus. But, in March 1813, they brought two suits, in the superiour court of chancery of Richmond: the one against George Semple and William Armistead, administrators

13 *of Robert B. Armistead, of which the object was to set aside the deed of acquittance of the 24th December 1801, as a fraud on the marriage, and have an account of the profits of the slaves while in R. B. Armistead's hands: the other against the same administrators and several other persons, to set aside the deed of gift to John D. Armistead of the 24th December 1801, and to compel a settlement and distribution of the estates of John and Mary Armistead, of which Robert B. Armistead had been the administrator. In these two causes, the facts in regard to the execution of the two deeds of the 24th December 1801, appeared as above stated; indeed, the most material of them were admitted by William Armistead, one of the administrators of Robert B. Armistead deceased.

The two causes were heard together: and chancellor Taylor declared the two deeds in question valid and binding as between the parties and all persons claiming under them, and therefore dismissed the bill in the first suit: in the other case, he directed accounts to be taken of R. B. Armistead's administration of his father and mother John and Mary Armistead's estates, and other proper accounts.

Waller and wife appealed to this court, for the purpose of having the principle settled as to the validity of the deeds. Pending the appeal here, Waller died, his wife surviving him; and, as the suit was brought in her name and in her right, it survived to her, and the appeal was prosecuted in her name until she also died; after which it was revived in the name of her representative.

The cause was argued (very concisely) by Stanard for the appellant: no counsel appeared for the appellees.

CABELL, J., delivered the opinion of the court. The only question is as to the validity of the deeds. It may be well to premise that although Robert B. Armistead was not appointed the guardian of his sister, in the forms prescribed by law, yet, under the circumstances of this case, a court of equity must regard and treat him as if he had been her legal 14 *guardian; and as the deed of gift was procured by him, for the benefit of his infant son, that deed will be regarded as if it had been executed directly to himself.

As the rights of Aylet Waller, whatever they may have been, were lost by his death in the lifetime of his wife, it is not necessary for the court to decide what his rights would be, in case he were still alive. We deem it proper, however, to observe, that deeds executed by a woman just before her marriage, and giving away her property without the knowledge of her intended husband, are fraudulent and void as to the husband.

As to the rights of Mrs. Waller: The case of Hatch v. Hatch, 9 Ves. 292, (to which many others might be added) is extremely strong to shew the readiness and determination with which the courts will protect the interest of wards, by setting aside conveyances made by them in favour of their guardians, shortly after they attain their age, or at or before the time of settling the accounts and delivering up the estate. So many undue advantages may be taken in such cases, by means of the influence which may, in various ways, be exercised by the guardian, that the law, on a principle of public policy, vacates all such conveyances, without any proof of actual fraud whatever. On this ground, the court is clearly of opinion, that the deed of gift executed by Miss Armistead, is null and void. But there are particular circumstances which make it still more apparent. The time selected for the execution of the deed, a few minutes only before the marriage; the absence of all proof of any previous intention of Miss Armistead to execute any such deed; the absence of proof that she had, at the time it was executed, any knowledge of its character or object; added to the care with which it was concealed from her friends, and particularly from her intended husband, who was then in the house; combine to stamp it with the foulest fraud.

Then, as to the deed of acquittance and discharge, executed by Miss Armistead to her brother. Chancellor Kent, in Kirby v. Taylor, 6 Johns. Ch. Rep. 242, 15 draws a distinction "between a deed giving a gratuity or bounty to a guardian in remuneration of an antecedent duty, and a deed of release, acquittance or discharge. He admits that the policy of the law utterly reprobates the former, as being absolutely null and void; but he contends that a simple release is prima facie good, and consequently (as we understand him) will not be set aside, unless it be shewn to be unfairly obtained. We cannot perceive the justness of this distinction. A simple release, by which the guardian is exonerated from accounting, and consequently from paying a just balance which may be in his hands, is as much a gratuity as a direct gift by formal conveyance. It may be as gainful to the guardian, and as disadvantageous to the ward, as a direct gift would be. And if such a practice were tolerated, it would lead to greater mischiefs than would result from sanctioning direct gifts or gratuities; for wards might be much more easily induced to grant releases for unascertained balances of unsettled accounts, than to make direct gifts of what they have in possession, and know to be their own. Besides, if we say that every acquittance executed by a ward is prima facie good, we exempt the guardian from the obligation of shewing that it was given in consequence of a just settlement, or that if a settlement had been made, nothing would have been due to the ward; and we throw upon the ward the burthen of proving that the settlement (if one was made) was not fair, or that if a fair one were made, the guardian would be brought in debt. This shifting the burthen of proof, in such cases, is intirely contrary to our ideas of propriety. We think therefore that an acquittance or release given shortly after a ward comes of age, or before or at the time of giving up the estate, so far as it may be sought to be used either as evidence of a fair settlement or a discharge from the obligation of making such a settlement, stands on the same footing as a direct gift or gratuity. But in addition to the great principle of public policy, the acquittance, in this case, stands reprobated by all the circumstances of fraud, which we have already mentioned as attaching to the deed of gift.

16 *The objection as to the length of time that was permitted to elapse before the institution of the suit, cannot be made to apply to Mrs. Waller; because she was under the legal disability of coverture from the date of the deeds to the time when the suit was brought. It is not material, and therefore we give no opinion as to the effect of such an objection, if it had been made against Waller. We shall only observe, that in the case of Hatch v. Hatch, before referred to, relief was given after a much longer time, and even to a husband who had participated in the fraud.

Decree reversed.

Lovell v. Arnold.

Writ of Right-Abatement-Revival-Case at Bar.
—Writ of right abates by death of tenant in 1812, and the abatement is entered of record; sci. fa. sued out by demandant in 1820, to revive the suit against heirs of tenant: HELD, the abatement was absolute, and suit could not be revived under provision of statute of 1819, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 37, that provision being prospective.

This was a writ of right brought by Elisha Arnold against Markham Lovell in his lifetime, for sixty acres of land in the county of Franklin. The case was before this court in 1811, when the court reversed a judgment that had been recovered for the demandant, and remanded the cause to the circuit court of Franklin, for a new trial. See Lovell v. Arnold, 2 Munf. 167. Afterwards, in the circuit court at May term 1812, before the new trial was had, an entry was made that the suit abate by the death of the tenant. No further proceeding was attempted till April 1820, when the demandant sued out a scire facias against the heirs of the deceased tenant, to revive the suit, under the provision of the statute enacted at the revival of 17 1819, 1 Rev. Code, *ch. 128, § 37, p. 496, 7. The tenant's heirs named in the scire facias, were ten in number: the process was served on only two of them, William and John Lovell: and John only appearing, the cause was at last tried, upon the original pleadings, as between the demandant and that heir alone. Verdict and judgment for demandant; to which, on the application of Lovell, this court awarded a supersedeas.

Johnson, for the plaintiff in error, said, that the abatement in 1812 put an end to the cause. As the law then stood, a writ of right, abated by the death of a party, could never be revived in any way: the abatement was absolute. The new provision of the statute, which obviated the abatement of real actions by the death of either party, and gave the scire facias to revive, for or against the heirs of the deceased party, was altogether prospective: the provision is, that "where any action, real or mixed, is now or shall be depending &c., for the recovery of any lands &c., and any party thereto shall die before verdict rendered, such action shall not abate" &c. This suit having been determined by abatement in 1812, was surely not a suit pending at the time of this enactment. But, if the demandant had a right to the scire facias, the sequel of the proceedings was palpably irregular and erroneous; for the scire facias being against ten heirs of the tenant, was served on only two of them, and then the cause was tried only as against one of those two.

Wynndham Robertson, for the defendant in error, insisted, that the objection to the scire facias was in truth an objection to the form of action, and an objection of which the tenant might have availed himself by demurrer to the scire facias; and he endeavoured to shew, that the objection was obviated by the provision of the statute of jeofails, which, after verdict, cures all defects whatsoever, whether of form or substance, which might have been, but have not been, taken advantage of by demurrer. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128,

18 *§ 103, p. 512. As to the proceedings on the scire facias: the heir against whom the cause was tried, instead of going into trial on the mere right, might have pleaded the joint tenure of his co-heirs in abatement; but not having done so he could not rely on joint-tenure as a defence in bar. Green v. Litter, 8 Cranch, 243. Much less could he avail himself of such matter, after trial, verdict and judgment, as a ground of reversal.

Johnson replied, that the statute of jeofails by no means dispensed with pleadings, but only gave to a verdict the effect of curing such defects in pleading, as would have been properly demurrable. Here, there was nothing to demur to: there were no pleadings; the whole proceeding consisted of the scire facias and trial. The authority of Green v. Litter did not touch the present case: the only matter of abatement here, was the death of the tenant: that had been pleaded, and judgment of abatement rendered. And the objection now is, that from the time of the abatement, the cause was out of court, and therefore no farther proceeding could be had in it.

PER CURIAM. The suit was at an end, by the abatement in 1812 by the death of the tenant, and could not be revived.

Judgment reversed, and judgment entered for the plaintiff in error.

Equitable Assignment—What Constitutes*—Case at Bar.—A. holding a bond of B. places in C.'s hands, to collect the money for him when due, and if not paid, to put it in an attorney's hands to collect by suit: the money was not paid when due, and C. put the bond in attorney's hands for collection: then A. addressed a letter to C., telling him he owed D.

Equitable Assignment—What Constitutes.—A mere promise or agreement to pay a debt out of a designated fund when received, does not give an equitable lien upon the fund nor operate as an equitable assignment of it. Something more is necessary. To constitute an equitable assignment there must be an assignment or transfer of the fund or some definite portion of it, so that the person owing the debt or holding the fund on which the order is drawn can safely pay the order, and is compellable to do so, though forbidden by the drawer. Hicks v. Roanoke Brick Co., 94 Va. 744, 37 S. E. Rep. 596, citing among others the principal case.

In discussing the question as to what constitutes an equitable assignment, in Elb v. Martin, 5 Leigh 138, 145, JUDGES BROCKENBROUGH and BROOKS, both cite the principal case with evident approval.

In Brooks v. Hatch, 6 Leigh 588, JUDGE BROCKENBROUGH said that, in the principal case, the letter of Fawcett would have been adjudged to be an equitable assignment, but for the condition contained in it, that the payment was to depend on the about $200 out of the money B. owed him: and desiring C., when he collected the money from B., if A. himself should not happen to be present, to pay the whole to D.; and this letter being presented by D. to C., without accepting the order therein contained, only told that B.'s bond was in the attorney's hand: the amount of B.'s bond to A. exceeded the amount due from A. to D.

Held, the letter of A. to C. was neither an equitable assignment by A. to D. of so much of B.'s debt to A., nor a security given by A. to D. for the debt he owed him.

Clayton in the autumn of 1818, sold Fawcett a parcel of fatted cattle, for 900 dollars. Fawcett drove the cattle to Richmond, and there sold them to Samuel Carlisle, and took his bond for the price or part of it, which he left in the hands of Martin Baker of Richmond, with instructions to collect the money if he could, if not, to place the bond in the hands of an attorney for collection. Fawcett made several payments to Clayton, which reduced the debt of 900 dollars he owed him, to about 200 dollars; and this balance remaining due, he addressed a letter or order to Baker, dated October 1, 1820, and delivered it to Clayton, in these words: "Sir, When you collect the money from Mr. Carlisle of me, and I should not happen with you, you will please pay the same to W. Clayton, as I am indebted to him about 200 dollars of the money due to me from Carlisle; and oblige your friend &c. (Signed) B. Fawcett." Meanwhile, Baker had put Carlisle's bond into the hands of Shepherd, an attorney at law, to collect by suit. On the 1st December 1820, Clayton presented Fawcett's letter to Baker, who informed him that Carlisle's bond was in Shepherd's hands for collection: there was no acceptance by Baker, of the 20 order for the payment of the *money to Clayton, contained in the letter. On the 21st December 1820, Fawcett died, in insolvent circumstances. And in February 1821, Clayton applied to Shepherd, who told him, that he had collected the money due from Carlisle; but, that he would not undertake to determine, whether Clayton was entitled to receive it on the strength of Fawcett's letter to Baker, or the representatives of Fawcett; and that he should deposit the money in bank, till the right to it should be decided.

Clayton then exhibited a bill in the su-

drawer's being absent. To the same effect, see Hulings v. Hulings Lumber Co., 38 W. Va. 380, 18 S. E. Rep. 631.

And in Brooks v. Hatch, 6 Leigh 548, TUCKER, P., said: "When it is clear, that the order or power over the fund is given for satisfaction of a debt or for value, it is inferred that a transfer was intended: the transaction is looked upon and treated as a contract: it is irrevocable; and thus constitutes a complete equitable assignment. But where the drawer retains a power over the fund,—where the transaction shows he had no design to part absolutely with that power,—it is looked upon as no equitable assignment, however valuable the consideration may be which moved him to its exercise. Thus in Clayton v. Fawcett's Adm'rs, 2 Leigh 19,—A. owing B. about 200 dollars, drew an order on C. desiring him when he collected certain money of D. to pay the whole to B. if A. himself should not happen to be present. The amount to be collected exceeds the sum due to B. and that fact, and the provision that it should be paid to B. 'if A. should not happen to be present,' were properly held to evince, that the drawer A. did not part with his power over the fund, and so there was no assignment."

For further information on this subject, see foot-note to Elb v. Martin, 5 Leigh 132; foot-note to Brooks v. Hatch, 6 Leigh 584; monographic note on "Assignments" appended to Ragsdale v. Hagy, 9 Gratt. 400.

perior court of chancery of Greenbrier, against Fawcett's administrators and Shepherd, setting forth the facts as above stated; insisting, that Fawcett's letter to Baker, of the 1st October 1820, was, in effect as it was in design, an assignment of Carlisle's bond to him; and praying, that Shepherd might be decreed to pay him the amount due to him from Fawcett, out of the amount in his hands collected of Carlisle; and general relief.

The administrators of Fawcett, in their answer, contested Clayton's right to the money, and stated that Fawcett's estate being inadequate to his debts, this money ought to be paid to his creditors in due course of administration.

Shepherd, being a mere stakeholder, did not answer.

The chancellor dismissed the bill; and Clayton appealed to this court.

Johnson, for the appellant. Fawcett's letter to Baker of October 1820, was an equitable assignment of Carlisle's bond to Clayton, or an order for the payment of the proceeds thereof to him. The letter shews that Fawcett considered Baker as having complete authority and control over the collection, and that he owed Clayton 200 dollars of this very money; therefore, he directed Baker to pay the money to Clayton. It may be objected, that those words of the letter, and I should not happen to be with you, evince that he meant to retain the power to receive the money himself. Suppose he did, he only 21 meant to retain *the right to receive it, on condition that he should be present; and that condition not having happened, then by the terms of the letter, the right to receive it was given to Clayton. But Fawcett honestly intended this money for Clayton, and if he himself came to Richmond, he meant to receive it for Clayton, and pay it to him: this was his reason for inserting those words; and they are not at all inconsistent with the design to transfer the subject to Clayton. If it be objected, that this is an order of Fawcett, not accepted by the drawee, and therefore revoked by the death of Fawcett before acceptance; I answer, that, if I am right as to the construction and effect of the letter, it is an order for paying over the specific fund; an equitable assignment of the fund; and, in that case, the death of the drawer or assignor can have no influence on the rights of the assignee. An order for the payment of money out of a specific fund, is not a bill of exchange, but an assignment of the subject; and even a letter of attorney to receive a debt, if given for a valuable consideration, is not a revocable instrument. Peyton v. Hallett, 1 Caines' Rep: 379; Bromley v. Holland, 7 Ves. 28; Powell v. Gordon, 2 Esp. 735; Hammonds v. Barclay, 2 East. 227; Cutts v. Perkins, 17 Mass. Rep. 206; Row v. Dawson, 1 Ves. sen. 332; Yeates v. Groves, 1 Ves. jun. 280.

Wickham, for the appellees. The whole question is, What is the just construction and effect of Fawcett's letter to Baker? is it an assignment to Clayton, of the debt due from Carlisle? or only an instruction by Fawcett to Baker as his agent, for the disposition of the money when collected? If the letter had contained an absolute order for the payment of a specified sum out of the money collected, it would have presented another question. But the letter directs Baker to pay Clayton, the whole of the money, which he should collect of Carlisle for Fawcett, if Fawcett should not happen to be present to receive it himself, as (he says) he owed Clayton about 200 dollars out of the money. It is apparent, then,

22 *that the parties knew the debt due by Carlisle to Fawcett exceeded Fawcett's debt to Clayton. If Fawcett's letter is a good assignment of any part of Carlisle's debt to Clayton, it is an assignment of all, so that if Clayton had assigned the order, his assignee would have taken the whole: which, surely, was not the intent of the transaction. The letter contains an authority to Baker to pay the money to Clayton, and an authority to the latter to receive it, only in case Fawcett should not be present to receive it himself. Notwithstanding the letter, then, Fawcett had the right to demand the money. How can this letter be regarded as an assignment, when it left and reserved to the assignor the right to take the subject? The letter is addressed to Baker, who was himself the mere agent of Fawcett, without any interest in the subject; and this agency of Baker was revocable at Fawcett's pleasure; nay, it was revoked, by the very terms of its creation, the moment Carlisle's bond was put into the attorney's hands for collection; and if it had not been so revoked, it would have been revoked by Fawcett's death. Baker had no authority to receive the money of the attorney, while Fawcett was yet living, much less after his death. In this state of things, the proposition that Fawcett's letter to Baker is an assignment of this subject to Clayton, is incongruous and hardly intelligible.

Johnson, in reply. Fawcett told Baker, he owed Clayton about 200 dollars out of the money which was due to himself from Carlisle, and which he had trusted Baker to collect. Now, if this was only intended as an instruction to Baker, and not as an assignment to Clayton; as a naked authority to Clayton to receive, without the transfer to him of any interest in the subject; why this acknowledgment of the debt to Clayton, and of a debt payable out of the very money to be collected from Carlisle? The circumstance that the money to be collected of Carlisle, exceeded Fawcett's debt to Clayton, cannot affect the question: the assignment operated as a security for the debt Fawcett owed Clayton.

23 *BROOKE, P. As the merits of this case must depend on the construction of the order of the 1st October 1820, drawn by Fawcett on Baker, I shall confine myself to that point only.

It is insisted for the appellant, that this order was an equitable transfer of the money due by Carlisle to Fawcett, or so much thereof as was equal to the amount due by Fawcett to the appellant. Fawcett's administrators claim it, as being still part of his estate, for the benefit of his creditors, to whom it is payable in due course of administration. In examining this question, as there is no pretence of fraud or mistake, the meaning and intention of the parties must be collected from the terms of the order itself. The general rule is, that a power ceases with the life of the person who gives it. The exception to the rule is, that if the power be coupled with an interest, it survives the person giving it. But such an interest to be coupled with the power, must be an interest in the subject, on which the power is to be exercised; not an interest only in that which is produced by the exercise of the power itself; in other words (as is said by the chief justice Marshall in the case of Hunt v. Rousmanier, 8 Wheat. 204) the power must be ingrafted on an estate in the thing. I think it impossible to give to the order before us, a construction that would give the appellant an interest in the money due by Carlisle, in exclusion of the rights of the drawer Fawcett in his lifetime, or of his representatives since his death. It contains no words of transfer or assignment. The word pay, in the order, though generally a word of transfer, was not used in that sense; for if it was, it would assign over the whole of the money due by Carlisle to Fawcett, which was certainly not intended. Those words of the order, "if I should not happen with you," limited the power both of Baker to pay, and of the appellant to receive, to the case of Fawcett's being absent. Nor did this condition affect any right of the appellant to receive the money; it formed no stipulation between the parties to the order; it was merely directory to Baker, and indicated *to him, that the appellant was to supply the place of the drawer, in case he was absent when the money was received from Carlisle, and to receive the money for him (Fawcett) not for himself. The words in the order, "as I am indebted to him about 200 dollars," do not affect this construction: they only assign the motive of the drawer for substituting the appellant to receive the money in his absence. If any stipulation had been intended, it would have been expressed in other terms: if the order had been intended as a payment, the sum due would have been more accurately ascertained. That was clearly left to be ascertained after the money should be received by the appellant (as the agent, I think, of Fawcett) as was also the surplus of the money due from Carlisle over and above what should suffice to satisfy the appellant. That the order was not intended as a security for the money due from the drawer to the appellant, is quite manifest; as that idea is inconsistent with the right reserved to the drawer, to receive the money himself, if present. A security that could be thus defeated, would be worthless. The power given to the appellant, to receive not only the amount that might be due to himself, but the excess above that sum due from Carlisle to the drawer, in the event that he was not present to receive it himself, was, I think, a naked power as to the whole subject, and gave to the appellant no lien in equity on the fund on which the order was drawn. He could in no form of action have claimed either the money or any part of it of Baker, or of the attorney in whose hands the bond of Carlisle had been placed for collection. The right of the drawer to receive it himself, by the terms of the order, survived to his representatives. The cases cited by the appellant's counsel, are intirely consistent with this opinion. Row v. Dawson was a case in which the interest was coupled with the power to receive the money: the order was drawn on a present consideration, in payment for money lent at the time; and though not a bill of exchange, was an equitable transfer of its amount, and attached on the fund on which it was 25 *drawn. The case of Yeates v. Groves was an order given on a specific fund, for a foregone consideration; but the original note for the amount was given up to the drawer. It was a power coupled with an interest in the subject drawn on. I think the decree is correct.

The other judges concurred, and the decree was affirmed.

Tiernans v. Schley & Shroeder.

February, 1830.

(Absent CABELL and COALTER, J.)

Foreign Attachment—Discharge of Appearance of Defendant.—In a foreign attachment in chancery against an absent debtor, laid on personally in hands of garnishees, and on lands claimed by persons under conveyance of absent debtor, the question being, whether conveyance gave vendees priority over rights of attaching creditors, or attachment gave these priority over vendees, the absent debtor was, upon motion of attaching creditors themselves, who waived demand of security from him, allowed to appear and file his answer, without giving security to abide and perform the decree:

Held, the attachment was thereby discharged, and the attaching creditors could, thenceforth, only prosecute their claim against their debtor, personally.

Henry R. Simmerman of Wythe county Virginia, being indebted to Luke and Charles Tiernan of Baltimore, Charles Tiernan came to Wythe in the summer of 1821, for the purpose of obtaining payment of or security for the debt; and an arrangement was made between them, that Simmerman should sell and convey to L. & C. Tiernan a tract of 287 acres of land near Evansham in Wythe, in satisfaction of the debt, which was 8,500 dollars, upon condition, however, that Luke Tiernan should approve and ratify the arrangement. In execution of this arrangement, Simmerman and wife executed a deed of bargain and sale, *conveying the land to L. & C. Tiernan in fee: the deed was dated the 7th June 1821, and was regularly acknowledged before two justices of Wythe, by Simmerman, and by his wife on privy examination, and their acknowledgment certified by the justices, in order that it might be recorded: and this deed, thus perfected, was confided to the private care of John P. Matthews, the clerk of the county court of Wythe, to be kept by him till Luke Tiernan's approbation and ratification of the arrangement, or dissent from it, should be signified to him; and if and when he should approve and ratify it, and signify the same to Mr. Matthews, then the contract was to be consummate, and Matthews was to act officially, and to record the deed; and if he should dissent from it, the deed was to be returned to Simmerman or destroyed. No time was appointed, within which Luke Tiernan's assent or dissent from the contract, should be signified to Matthews; it was, however, expected to be made known within a short time. Luke Tiernan hesitated some months: at length, on the 15th December 1821, he addressed a letter to Matthews, wherein he gave his assent to the contract, and directed him to record the deed, and to deliver the original to the bearer of the letter. This letter was received by Matthews on the 17th February 1822, and thereupon he recorded the deed in his office.

Foreign Attachment—Discharge of Appearance of Defendant.—In Kelso v. Blackburn, 3 Leigh 311. It is said: "It is admitted, on all hands, that an appearance discharges the attachment, where the property attached is personal. Surely, the same effect follows where land is attached, both from the reason of the case, and the care with which the land of an absentee is protected from sale, while there is any personal fund in the power of the court. And this very point was decided in Tiernans v. Schley, etc., 2 Leigh 25. In that case, the appearance of the absent defendant was what, in the judgment of this court, changed the nature of the suit, and discharged the land."

But before Luke Tiernan had agreed to accept the deed, in October 1821, Schley & Shroeder of Baltimore, creditors of Simmerman, exhibited their bill in the superior court of chancery of Wythe, against Simmerman, L. & C. Tiernan and divers others, setting forth the debt due by Simmerman to them, and that he had recently removed from Virginia and was now a non-resident of this state; and stating, inter alia, the circumstances touching the deed executed by Simmerman to L. & C. Tiernan of the 7th June preceding; insisting, that that deed, not having as yet been accepted by the purchasers, was still inoperative to pass the subject; and praying to attach the land mentioned in the deed (as well as other property of Simmerman in the 27 *hands of other defendants) to answer their claim, under the 1st section of the statute concerning foreign attachments in chancery, as amended at the revision of 1819. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 123, § 1, p. 474.

The Tiernans, in their answer to the bill, insisted, that the deed they claimed under, gave them a right to the land it conveyed, in preference to the attaching creditors.

And thus the question between the attaching creditors Schley & Shroeder and the Tiernans, being, whether or no, under the circumstances, the right of the former to have satisfaction out of the land in question, attached to the land by force of their attachment, before the title thereof was vested in the Tiernans by the deed of June 1821; the absent debtor, Simmerman, on the 27th May 1823, appeared, and "upon the motion and by consent of the plaintiffs, who waived all exceptions to the filing of his answer," was permitted by the court to file his answer, without giving any security for performing the decree according to the 2d section of the statute.

A long litigation ensued in the court of chancery, concerning other matters as well as those above stated; other matters not necessary to be here stated, since they did not at all affect the point on which alone the cause eventually turned in this court.

At the hearing before the chancellor, the counsel for the Tiernans, insisted, that the order of May 1823, made by consent and at the instance of the attaching creditors, whereby the absent debtor Simmerman was permitted to appear and file his answer, without giving security to perform the decree, was an absolute discharge of their attachment, by virtue of which alone they could pretend to any preference over the rights of the Tiernans under the deed of June 1821, or indeed to any lien whatever on the property of the absent debtor; and this point they alleged was preliminary to, and precluded the necessity of, all further inquiry. But the chancellor was of a different opinion; and considering the attachment as yet in full force, he held that 28 the rights of *the attaching creditors, by virtue of that process, attached to the land conveyed to the Tiernans, before the conveyance to them became operative, that is, before the deed was assented to and accepted by Luke Tiernan; and, therefore, he held the land in question subject to the claim of the attaching creditors, and decreed that it should be sold to satisfy their demand against Simmerman. The Tiernans appealed to this court.

The cause was argued here by Wickham and Leigh for the appellants, and Stanard and Johnson for the appellees, on all the points (and there were many) presented by the record. But the only point considered and decided by the court was the preliminary question made in the court of chancery, above mentioned, viz. Whether the permission of the absent debtor, Simmerman, to appear and answer, without giving security to perform the decree, on the motion and by consent of the attaching creditors, was not a discharge of their attachment? For if it was, Schley & Shroeder had no longer any ground to stand on, as against the Tiernans, or any garnishee, or any specific property of the debtor; they had only a right to proceed against the debtor himself, personally.

BROOKE, P., delivered the opinion of the court. The only question in this case, which it is necessary to decide, is, Whether the appearance of the absent defendant Simmerman, and the filing of his answer without giving security to perform the decree, at the instance and on the motion of the plaintiffs, was not a discharge of their attachment on the land in controversy? This question will be more satisfactorily settled by reference to the statutes on the same subject, preceding the revised statute of 1819, under which the attachment issued. By the act of 1744, ch. 1, 5 Hen. stat. at large, p. 220, the absent defendant was permitted to appear, plead or file his answer as the case might be, without giving security to perform the decree; after which the proceedings

29 against him were in the ordinary course of the court; and *the object of the act being only to compel him to appear and defend the suit, the attachment as to the property was thereby discharged. It was by the act of October 1777, ch. 15, 9 Id. p. 396, establishing the high court of chancery (which incorporated, substantially, the above mentioned act of 1744, and transferred the jurisdiction to that court) that security was first required of the absent defendant, when he appeared and defended the suit. That provision is re-enacted in the revised statute of 1819. If the defendant Simmerman had given the security required by it, there can be no doubt the attached property would have been discharged; and the plaintiffs having dispensed with that security, can be in no better condition than if it had been given.

The decree is, therefore, reversed, and the bill dismissed as to the appellants, with costs.

Post-Nuptial Settlements.—The doctrine of post-nuptial settlements discussed.

Post-Nuptial Settlement—Presumption—Consideration—Burdens of Proving—Evidence—Answer.—Although a post-nuptial settlement will be supported when it appears to have been made in the execution of a fair contract, founded upon a valuable consideration, yet, from the relative situation of the parties and the convenient cover which such settlement afforded a debtor to protect his property and impose upon the world, they are always watched with jealousy. Every such settlement, therefore, where the settler is indebted, is as against his existing creditors, presumed to be voluntary and therefore fraudulent and void; and the onus is upon those claiming under it to prove that it was made for a valuable consideration moving from the wife; and the answer to a bill charging that it is voluntary is not allowed to shift this presumption, nor is it held to be evidence for the respondents; but, on the contrary the defence set up in the answer must be established by proof. To this effect the principal case was cited in Fink v. Denny, 75 Va. 669; Hatcher v. Crews, 78 Va. 465; Lewis v. Mason, 84 Va. 730, 10 S. E. Rep. 529; Robbins v. Armstrong, 84 Va. 811, 812, 6 S. E. Rep. 180; Campbell v. Bowles, 30 Gratt. 663; Nulton v. Isaacs, 30 Gratt. 748; Beecher v. Wilson, 84 Va. 815, 6 S. E. Rep. 210; Yates v. Law, 86 Va. 119, 9 S. E. Rep. 508; Massey v. Yancey, 90 Va. 325, 19 S. E. Rep. 184; Rixey v. Detrick, 85 Va. 45, 6 S. E. Rep. 615; Keagy v. Trout, 85 Va. 401, 7 S. E. Rep. 329; Perry v. Ruby, 81 Va. 323; Witz v. Osburn, 83 Va. 229, 2 S. E. Rep. 33; foot-note to Lewis v. Caperton, 8 Gratt. 149; foot-note to William & Mary College v. Powell, 12 Gratt. 372. The principal case was distinguished in Barton v. Brent, 87 Va. 888, 18 S. E. Rep. 29.

But a voluntary post-nuptial settlement is not void as to subsequent creditors, unless tainted with actual fraud. Witz v. Osburn, 83 Va. 227, 2 S. E. Rep. 33, citing Code 1873, ch. 114, §§ 1 and 2; Fink v. Denny, 75 Va. 663; Blow v. Maynard, 2 Leigh 29; Hatcher v. Crews, 78 Va. 460; Perry v. Ruby, 81 Va. 317.

See further, monographic note on "Fraudulent and Voluntary Conveyances" appended to Cochran v. Paris, 11 Gratt. 348.

Same—Consideration—Relinquishment of Rights in the Husband's Estate.—It is settled that the relinquishment by the wife of a certain or even a contingent interest in her husband's estate will support a post-nuptial settlement when there is no badge of fraud; so, likewise, the releasing her jointure or dower. DeFarges v. Ryland, 87 Va. 407, 12 S. E. Rep. 305, citing principal case. See also, foot-note to W. & M. College v. Powell, 12 Gratt. 372. It follows a fortiori, that her parting with her own estate, or making a charge upon it for her husband's benefit, will support such settlement. William & Mary College v. Powell, 12 Gratt. 386, citing principal case.

Where the wife relinquishes an interest in her husband's estate in consideration of a settlement upon her, and the deed of relinquishment and the deed of settlement are contemporaneous, or made about the same time, so that it may be reasonably presumed that the two deeds are parts of the same transaction, the court will so presume, and will look upon the relinquishment as the consideration which produced the settlement. This qualification of the rule laid down in the first paragraph of this note was—according to Keagy v. Trout, 85 Va. 401, 7 S. E. Rep. 329,—recognized in the principal

Same—Consideration—Evidence—Recitals in Deed.—

The recital in a post-nuptial settlement, of an agreement as the consideration of the deed, is evidence against persons claiming under the settler, but not against a creditor of the settler contesting the fairness and validity of the deed.

Principal and Surety—Release of Surety—Effect—Discharge of Obligation by Surety—Liability of Principal.

—B. is bound assurety for D. in a guardian's bond; the guardian dies indebted to his ward; the ward sues surety for the debt: the surety compromises case. To the same effect, see the principal case cited in Fink v. Denny, 75 Va. 669, 670. In Keagy v. Trout, 85 Va. 401, 7 S. E. Rep. 329, the interval between the deed of relinquishment and the deed of settlement was only sixteen days and the court held the two deeds were virtually parts of the same transaction.

But where the relinquishment of the wife's interest has been first made by deed containing no recital of any agreement to make a settlement in consideration thereof, and a subsequent settlement made two years afterwards, is sought to be set up, there must be a distinct proof of the previous agreement. Fink v. Denny, 75 Va. 669, 670, citing principal case. See also, foot-note to William & Mary College v. Powell, 12 Gratt. 372.

Same—Same—Loan by Wife to Husband.—The simple fact that the husband used the wife's money is not a sufficient consideration to support a post-nuptial settlement, in the absence of proof that, at the time and times the various sums of money were received from the wife, it was understood to be loaned, and that then and subsequently both husband and wife recognizing it as a debt, and intended to stand to each other in the relation of debtor and creditor. Beecher v. Wilson, 84 Va. 815, 6 S. E. Rep. 211, citing principal case; William & Mary College v. Powell, 12 Gratt. 372; Campbell v. Bowles, 30 Gratt. 663.

Same—Same—Previous Parol Agreement—Statute of Frauds.—On this subject, see principal case cited in Perry v. Ruby, 81 Va. 321, 323, 324; Beecher v. Wilson, 84 Va. 817, 6 S. E. Rep. 211.

Same—Same—Evidence of Recitals in Deed.—Subsequent decisions sustain the proposition laid down in the principal case, that the recitals in post-nuptial settlements as to the consideration, though admissible as against the person claiming under the settler, are not evidence against a creditor by whom the fairness and validity of the deed is assailed. See, citing principal case, William & Mary College v. Powell, 12 Gratt. 384; Brockenbrough v. Brockenbrough, 31 Gratt. 597; Perry v. Ruby, 81 Va. 317, 325; Massey v. Yancey, 90 Va. 332, 19 S. E. Rep. 184; Flynn v. Jackson, 93 Va. 346, 25 S. E. Rep. 1; foot-note to William & Mary College v. Powell, 12 Gratt. 372.

Same—Same—Declarations of Wife.—Nor are declarations of the wife at the time of executing a deed, or at other times, that it was executed in consideration of a promise of the husband to make a settlement upon her, or because he had made such a settlement, sufficient evidence of a contract to support such a settlement if made, even to the extent of a reasonable compensation for the right of dower relinquished. William & Mary College v. Powell, 12 Gratt. 384; Perry v. Ruby, 81 Va. 325; foot-note to Lewis v. Caperton, 8 Gratt. 149, all citing the principal case.

Joint Obligors.—Release of One—Effect.—As recognizing the rule that the release of one of two or more joint and several obligors, releases all, whether standing in the relation of principals or sureties, the principal case was cited in Hewitt v. Adams, 1 Pat. & H. 37. In this case, the principal case is distinguished from the case at bar; and, while the decision in the principal case is approved, it is questioned whether the decision should have gone as far as it did, on the reasoning of the judges who sat in it. See discussion of the principal case at pp. 37, 38, 39. See Va. Code 1887, § 2856.

Principal and Surety—Discharge of Obligation by Surety—Liability of Principal.—The contract between a principal and his surety is for indemnity only, and therefore, if the surety discharges the obligation of the principal at a less sum than its full amount, he cannot, as against his principal, make himself a creditor for the whole amount, but can only claim as against his principal what he has actually paid in discharge. This rule seems settled, and several cases cited the principal case in support of it. See Tarr v. Ravenscroft, 12 Gratt. 663; Kendrick v. Forney, 22 Gratt. 753; Southall v. Farish, 85 Va. 406, 7 S. E. Rep. 534; Feamster v. Withrow, 9 W. Va. 317; Matthews v. Hall, 21 W. Va. 514. See principal case also cited in Cromer v. Cromer, 20 Gratt. 284.

Sureties—Contribution.—A fortiori, where one surety compromises the obligation of the principal, his co-sureties are entitled to the benefit, and rethe suit with the ward, and pays her a less sum than on a settlement of the guardian's accounts was justly due her: and the ward by deed assigns to the surety all her claims upon the guardian's estate, and by the same instrument releases the surety from all demands on the guardian's bond: Held, 1. that the deed releasing the obligation as to the surety, released it also as to his co-obligor the principal, and thus left nothing for the assignment to operate upon: and 2. that the surety, notwithstanding the assignment, was only entitled, in equity, to demand indemnity from his principal's estate, for the money actually paid by him to the ward in satisfaction of her claim.

Dower—Reversion of Lands.—A husband dies entitled to reversion of lands; his widow is not entitled to dower thereof.

Same—Reality Fraudulently Conveyed by Husband.—

A husband makes a fraudulent conveyance of real estate to the use of himself and children, and contingently to the use of his wife, who does not execute the conveyance; the husband dies; a creditor exhibits his bill against the children and the widow, to avoid the conveyance as voluntary and fraudulent; the widow claims under the conveyance; it is declared fraudulent and void; Held, the widow is entitled to dower of the estate.

Fraudulent Conveyance—Liability of Grantees for Rents and Profits.—A man makes a conveyance of real estate to the use of his children and contingently to the use of his wife, and dies; upon a bill by a creditor after grantor's death, against grantees, who claim under the deed, conveyance declared not only voluntary but fraudulent in fact on the part of the grantor: Yet Held, that the grantees are not accountable for rents and profits prior to the decree.

Rents and Profits—Liability of Heir for.—Upon a bill against an heir at law, to subject real estate descended to a debt of the ancestor, the heir at law is not accountable for rents and profits accrued before decree.

Chancery Practice—Sale of Land Descended and Fraudulently Conveyed to Pay Ancestor's and Donor's Debt.—A father makes a voluntary and fraudulent conveyance of real estate to his children, and dies leaving other real estate which descends; upon a bill by a creditor against the donees and heirs at law, to subject the land conveyed and land descended, to debt of the donor and ancestor, chancellor may decree a sale of both, out and out, to satisfy the creditor's demand.

The county court of Norfolk, in December 1797, appointed John Davis guardian of his infant brother and sisters, James, Evelina and Margaret Davis; and Richard Blow was his surety in the bond he gave to the county court, for the faithful discharge of that trust.

The county court, at September term 1807, upon the petition of Blow, representing that he was apprehensive of suffering loss by reason of this suretyship for Davis, summoned Davis to appear at the ensuing October term, and give counter-security to Blow, or deliver up the estate of his wards for his indemnity. And at October term, the summons having been returned executed on Davis, the court made a peremptory order, that he should give counter-security to Blow, or deliver the estate of his wards into his hands: which order having been served on Davis, he made a report to the court at

February term 1808, of the specific 31 *property of his wards in his hands, which he offered to deliver up, and to render an account of the profits of their estate by him received, when required. Blow objected to the report, that it did not exhibit the whole estate of the wards, and moved for an attachment against Davis for not delivering up the whole: that motion the court continued till the next term, but ordered, that the estate specified in Davis's report, should be delivered up to Blow, and that Davis should render an account of the estate of his wards, of the profits thereof, and of his transactions as guardian, before commissioners appointed for that purpose, who were directed to make report to the next term. The commissioners did not make up their report till July term; when they submitted a report to the court, founded on Davis's own statements and vouchers, shewing balances due by the guardian, to his ward Margaret Davis, £370. 15. 3. and his ward Evelina Davis, £1053. 8. 10. This report was silent as to the guardian's account of the ward James Davis, who had died in 1804, for a suit was then pending in which the distributees of James were claiming their portions of his estate, and an order had been made that he should settle his accounts of the guardianship of James, before commissioners; under which order he had notice to attend the commissioners on the 10th October 1807, but he excused himself from attending at that time. In this suit it was afterwards ascertained, that he was indebted to James's estate 3019 dollars 64 cents.

John Davis, the guardian, by bill of sale bearing date the 10th June 1807, expressed to be in consideration of 2000 dollars, conveyed ten slaves to Eleanor Maynard, a Dower.—On the subject of dower, see generally, monographic note on "Dower" appended to Davis v. Davis, 25 Gratt. 587.

Same—Estates in Expectancy.—In Cocke v. Phillips, 12 Leigh 257, it is said: "The widow has no claim to dower of the land in which her husband died entitled only to an estate in remainder expectant on his mother's life estate. To entitle a widow to dower, the husband must have been seized in fact or in law. If the husband maketh a lease for life of certain lands reserving rent, and be taketh wife and dieth, the wife shall not be endowed; neither of the reversion (albeit, it is within the word tenements) because there was no seisin in deed or in law of the freehold; nor of the rent, because the husband had but a particular estate therein, and no fee simple." *Co. Fraudulent Conveyances.—On this subject, see monographic note on "Fraudulent and Voluntary Conveyances" appended to Cochran v. Paris, 11 Gratt. 348.

The principal case was also cited in Bank v. Hupp, 10 Gratt. 42.

Chancery Practice—Sale of Lands Descended and Fraudulently Conveyed to Pay Ancestor's and Donor's Debts.—To the point that on a bill to marshal assets, or to set aside fraudulent conveyances in favor of judgment or bond creditors, after the debtor's death, a court of equity may sell the land conveyed or descended, the principal case was cited in Tennent v. Patton, 6 Leigh 201, 210, 220, 223, 225, 228. On the same subject, see the principal case cited in Buchanan v. Clark, 10 Gratt. 177; Price v. Planters' Nat. Bank, 92 Va. 481, 23 S. E. The Virginia statute, Code 1887, § 3571, Code of W. Va., ch. 189, § 7, was designed to clear up the difficulties arising under the decisions of Haleys v. Williams, 1 Leigh 140; Blow v. Maynard, 2 Leigh 29; Tennent v. Patton, 6 Leigh 196; McClung v. Belrne, 10 Leigh 304; McNew v. Smith, 5 Gratt. 84; and to maiden aunt of his wife, living in his family at the time; and by another bill of sale, bearing date the 19th September 1807, expressed to be in consideration of 100 dollars, he conveyed another slave to her. There was evidence, and this court thought sufficient proof, that the first of these bills was antedated, having been in fact executed about the 14th October 1807. These two bills of sale were the subject of controversy in the case of Blow against Maynard.

32 *And on the 14th October 1807, Davis executed two other conveyances of his property: by one of which, in consideration of natural love and affection, he conveyed to his two children Samuel and Elizabeth (then infants, not above seven years old) a wharf in Portsmouth, with the improvements thereon, and the land adjoining the same: and by the other (reciting, that he had acquired by his wife Elizabeth a considerable estate, part of which was real; that upon her consenting to relinquish her right in her own real estate, he had agreed to convey to her and her issue other real property in lieu thereof; that he had appropriated the proceeds of the sale of his wife's real estate, and much of the personal estate acquired by his marriage, to the building a large brick house in Portsmouth, and to the purchase of furniture then in the house; and, therefore, he considered himself bound to secure that house and the lot it stood on and the furniture in it, to his wife and her children, Elizabeth and Samuel) in consideration thereof and of natural love and affection towards his wife and children, he conveyed the house and lot and furniture to S. Whitehead; in trust for himself for and during his life; remainder to the two children and the survivor of them, in fee, with an express power to them to alien after their attainment to full age; remainder, in case the children should die during the life of his wife and without issue living at the time of their death, to the wife in fee. These two deeds were the subject of controversy in the case of Lawrence against Blow.

It appeared, that the two bills of sale to Maynard, and the two deeds of the 14th October 1807, comprised all the visible property which Davis then had in possession.

He died in 1811. His widow Elizabeth married, in 1814, a second husband David Lawrence, who died about the year 1820. At the commencement of these suits she was again a widow.

Margaret Davis, the ward of John Davis, married Edward Young: Evelina, the other female ward, married John B. Levy, and died, living her husband, who took administration of her estate: and William

33 Dickson was the administrator of the ward James Davis, who died in 1804. And in 1821, a suit was brought upon the guardian's bond against Blow the surety, in the name of the justices of the county court, at the relation of Young and wife, Levy the administrator of Evelina, and Dickson the administrator of James Davis, to recover of Blow, the surety therein, the balances due from the estate of John Davis, to his wards respectively, upon his accounts of guardianship. Blow compromised the case with Young and wife, and with Levy the administrator of Evelina, by the payment of 1000 dollars to each of them. The administrator of James Davis prosecuted the suit to judgment, for the interest of his intestate, and recovered 3019 dollars 64 cents; which was afterwards reduced by discounts, to the sum of 1483 dollars 81 cents; and this last was the sum Blow paid him.

Young and wife, upon the compromise between them and Blow, by deed dated the 27th June 1821, assigned to Blow, all rights, claims and demands, which they had upon the guardian's bond, against Blow himself, or against the estate of John Davis, on account of his guardianship of Mrs. Young; and by the same instrument, released to Blow all suits and actions whatsoever, including, of course, their right of action on the guardian's bond. And upon the compromise between Levy (the administrator of Davis's ward Evelina) and Blow, Levy by the deed dated the 3d August 1821, released to Blow, all claim and demand for or on account of the guardianship of his deceased wife by John Davis &c.

In 1822, Blow exhibited two bills in the superior court of chancery of Williamsburg, impeaching the above mentioned conveyances made by Davis of his property in his lifetime, as fraudulent and void as to creditors.

One was a bill against Eleanor Maynard, Elizabeth Lawrence, and Matthew Manning, sheriff of Norfolk and administrator of John Davis deceased; wherein after setting forth at large all the facts above stated, he alleged that the considerations expressed in the two bills of sale of slaves, 34 *executed by Davis to Maynard, of the 10th June and 19th September 1807, were feigned; that, in fact, no money was ever paid by Maynard to Davis; that the slaves conveyed by those deeds were constantly held by Davis till his death, he taking and enjoying all the profits; and that the property had ever since his death been held by Mrs. Lawrence, and the profits thereof applied by her to the use of herself and family; that these bills of sale were, therefore, fraudulent and void as against him, and the slaves thereby conveyed ought to be subjected to the debt due to him from Davis's estate; and that attempts had been made to send the slaves out of the state, in order to defeat the plaintiff's claim to have satisfaction out of that property; so that an injunction was prayed, to restrain the defendant in possession of them, from carrying them beyond the jurisdiction of the court, and a decree to set aside the bills of sale, and subject the property to Blow's demand.

The defendants in their answers, denied the circumstances of fraud imputed in the bill; and insisted, that the bills of sale were fairly and bona fide made, and the considerations therein expressed, actually paid.

The only questions in this cause, were questions of fact; and a great many depositions were taken and filed on both sides. It is only necessary to mention, that it appeared in proof, that Miss Maynard had always resided in the family of Mrs. Lawrence and her children; and that the profits of the slaves in question, had been applied to the use of the whole family, ever since Davis's death.

The chancellor thought the bills of sale fair, and dismissed the bill: and Blow appealed to this court.

The other bill was exhibited against Mrs. Lawrence, Samuel, Elizabeth and Christian Davis, infant children and heirs of John Davis, S. Whitehead, the trustee in the deed of the 14th October 1807, reconveying the house and lot in Portsmouth, Manning the administrator of John Davis, Edward Young and wife, and Levy administrator of his wife Evelina. In this bill also,

35 Blow detailed all the facts *above stated; and he represented the deed made by Young and wife to him of the 27th June 1821, and that made by Levy of the 3d August 1821, as assignments to him of their claims against John Davis's estate on account of his guardianship, entitling him not only to the money he had paid those parties in the compromise of their claims, but to the full amounts that should be found due to them, respectively, upon a settlement of Davis's guardian's accounts. He farther stated, that some real estate of Davis had descended to his heirs; of which he asked an account, and prayed that it might be subjected to his claim. But the chief purpose of this bill was to impeach and set aside, as fraudulent and void as to creditors, Davis's two deeds of the 14th October 1807. The bill alleged, that the deed conveying the wharf and improvements and adjoining land to his two infant children, was manifestly voluntary: and as to the deed conveying the brick house and lot and the furniture in Portsmouth to the trustee Whitehead, that the recital of the deed was false; that the wife had little or no real estate of inheritance; that if she had any, and had joined in the sale and conveyance of it by her husband, there had never been any agreement between them, that he should make any settlement on her and her children, as an equivalent for her inheritance: that the trusts declared in the deed were inconsistent with the agreement alleged in the recital, the deed being in fact a settlement of the subject to the use of Davis himself and his children, with only a contingent resulting use to the wife; that, considering these conveyances in connexion with the bills of sale of slaves to Maynard, and comparing the dates of the conveyances and bills of sale, with the dates of Blow's proceedings against Davis in the county court, it was obvious, that the conveyances were designed to defeat the claims of Davis's wards against him for the balances he owed them, and to defeat his surety's claim to indemnity; and that Mrs. Lawrence had ever since Davis's death been in possession of the brick house and lot and furniture in Portsmouth, receiving and enjoying the rents and profits thereof.

36 Wherefore, *the bill prayed, that the conveyances might be set aside as fraudulent and void, and the subject appropriated to the payment of the debts due by Davis's estate to his respective wards; accounts of Davis's guardianship, to ascertain the debts; accounts of the rents and profits of the property fraudulently conveyed by the deeds of October 1820; an account of the furniture conveyed; and general relief.

The answer of Mrs. Lawrence insisted, that, in all events, Blow could only demand what he had paid to the wards of her first husband: and, as to the deed of conveyance of the brick house and lot and furniture to the trustee Whitehead, upon the trusts therein declared, she insisted that that deed was fair and valid; that the recital therein contained was true, she having in fact joined her husband Davis in the sale and conveyance of her own inheritance, upon the faith of his solemn promise to convey and settle other real estate upon her and her children; and she was content to have the principal benefit of the agreement given to her children; and that the furniture, for the most part, had been removed from Portsmouth to City Point during the late war, and there accidentally destroyed by fire.

Levy, in his answer, said he had, by his deed of August 1821, assigned to Blow all his interest in the debt due by Davis as guardian of Evelina his late wife and intestate, and had thereby acquitted Blow of all demand against him as Davis's surety in the guardian's bond.

An answer was put in for the infant defendants, heirs of Davis; but the answer was merely formal. As to the defendants Young and wife, Whitehead the trustee, and Manning the administrator of Davis, the bill was regularly taken pro confesso.

It appeared, that Mrs. Lawrence had real estate of inheritance, namely, a tract of land in Charles City county, which was sold by her first husband Davis, and she joined him in the conveyance of it: this conveyance was made as early as December 1801.

37 *There was a great deal of parol evidence, relating to the imputations of fraud.

The chancellor directed accounts to be taken, 1. of John Davis's guardianship of his three wards, respectively, and of Blow's demand against the estate of Davis; 2. of the defendant Manning's administration of Davis's estate; 3. of the value of the real estate of Mrs. Lawrence's own inheritance, sold by Davis in 1801; 4. of the value of the wharf &c. conveyed by Davis to his children by the deed of October 1807, and of the value of the brick house and lot in Portsmouth, conveyed by the deed of the same date to the trustee Whitehead, at the time of the conveyances, as well as the present value; 5. of the value of the furniture conveyed by the last mentioned deed; 6. of the rents, issues and profits of the brick house and lot, since Davis's death, shewing by whom the same had been received; and 7. of the real estate of John Davis descended to his heirs.

The commissioner reported: 1. That John Davis was indebted to his three wards, the aggregate sum of 12627 dollars 38 cents with interest on 7124 dollars 17 cents, part thereof (being the principal) from July 1st 1825; but, supposing Blow entitled to demand only what he had paid, in consequence of his compromises with Young and wife and Levy, his demand amounted to only 4243 dollars 63 cents, with interest from July 1st 1825, on 3483 dollars 81 cents, part thereof, being the whole amount of principal actually paid by him. 2. That Manning administrator of Davis, owed the estate of Davis a balance of 90 dollars 75 cents. 3. That Mrs. Lawrence's real estate of inheritance, sold by her first husband Davis, in December 1801, was worth at the time, 1500 dollars. 4. That the value of the wharf &c. conveyed by Davis to his children by his deed of October 1807, was at that time, 2000 dollars, and its present value was 500 dollars; and the value of the brick house and lot in Portsmouth conveyed by Davis to Whitehead the trustee, by his deed of October 1807, was then 5000 dollars, and the present value thereof was 2500

38 dollars. *5. That the value of the furniture conveyed by the last mentioned deed, was, at the time of the deed, 500 dollars; and its present value 350 dollars, which the commissioner charged to Mrs. Lawrence, with interest from the 1st July 1811, the time of Davis's death, amounting, principal and interest, to 644 dollars. 6. That the rents and profits of the brick house and lot in Portsmouth, accrued since Davis's death, was 1960 dollars; all of which he charged to Mrs. Lawrence, with interest on the rents yearly as they accrued, amounting, principal and interest, to 2669 dollars. And 7. That the value of the real estate descended to Davis's heirs, was 750 dollars. This was a reversionary interest expectant on an estate of dower, which did not expire till after Davis's death.

And then, the cause coming on to be further heard, the chancellor, declaring that no rule of law or equity precluded Blow from acquiring and claiming as assignee for valuable consideration, the amounts justly due by John Davis to his wards Margaret and Evelina, and that, therefore, Blow was entitled to demand of Davis's estate the sum of 12627 dollars 38 cents, with interest &c. reported by the commissioner as the sum actually due by Davis to his wards, decreed that sum to Blow against Manning the administrator of Davis; that is to say, 90 dollars 75 cents, the balance reported to be in Manning's hands, to be levied de bonis propriis, and the residue to be levied of assets of Davis's estate, quando acciderint. He declared, that the widow was not entitled to dower of the real estate of Davis, which descended to his heirs, as Davis in his lifetime was only entitled to the reversion thereof; and he ordered, that the lands descended should be sold, and the proceeds brought into court to be applied towards the satisfaction of Blow's demand. And then, declaring that Davis's two deeds of October 1807, were fraudulent and void as to his creditors, but that his widow was nevertheless entitled to dower of the real estate thereby conveyed, he decreed, that 39 Mrs. Lawrence should pay Blow, the sum of 644 dollars, being the *present value of the furniture, with interest thereon from Davis's death, and the sum of 1779 dollars 87 cents (being the balance of the rents of the brick house and lot after deducting one third thereof for her dower) with interest on 1306 dollars 67 cents (being two thirds of the principal of the rents).

And, in case the sum directed to be paid by the administrator Manning, and the proceeds of the sale of the real estate descended, and the sums decreed to be paid by Mrs. Lawrence, should not suffice to satisfy the debt decreed to Blow, he directed Mrs. Lawrence's dower to be assigned her; and, that done, that the marshal should sell the wharf &c. and the brick house and lot, conveyed by Davis's two deeds of October 1807, and bring the proceeds of the sales into court, to be applied to the payment of the debt decreed to Blow.

From this decree, Mrs. Lawrence appealed to this court.

The causes were argued here, by Johnson and Leigh for Maynard and Lawrence, and by R. B. Taylor and Stanard for Blow. The questions discussed at the bar, were,

I. Whether the conveyances made by John Davis in 1807, namely, the two bills of sale to Maynard, and the deed conveying the house and lot in Portsmouth, and the furniture in it, to the trustee Whitehead, were fraudulent and void, as against Davis's creditors?

The question as to the bills of sale to Maynard, was intirely a question of fact, depending chiefly on the proofs in regard to the reality of the transaction, whether the considerations expressed in the bills of sale, were actually paid by Maynard to Davis or not. The fact, that Maynard had always lived with Lawrence and her children and that Lawrence had enjoyed the profits of the property jointly with Maynard, was relied on as an evidence that the bills of sale to Maynard were fictitious transactions; but the question, whether Lawrence was therefore accountable jointly with Maynard for the profits of the slaves, though it was decided by the court, was not made or discussed at the bar.

40 *The question as to the validity of the conveyance of the house and lot and furniture to the trustee Whitehead, was a mixed question of law and fact. The opinion of judge Carr exhibits, very fully, all the topics of the argument.

II. Whether Blow was entitled to demand as the assignee of the wards Margaret and Evelina, the full amounts due to them from Davis, on the accounts of his guardianship, or, as a surety bound in the guardian's bond, indemnity only, that is, the sums he actually paid to those wards on his compromise with them?

III. Supposing the conveyance of the house and lot in Portsmouth, fraudulent and void, whether Lawrence who had received the rents and profits since the death of Davis, was accountable for any rents and profits at all before the decree? Supposing her so accountable, whether she was accountable for the rents that accrued during her second coverture with David Lawrence? And whether, in all events, the decree was not erroneous in decreeing interest on the rents?

IV. Whether the decree was right in decreeing a sale of the real subject, instead of leaving the creditor to his extent?

V. Whether, supposing the two conveyances of Davis, of October 1807, fraudulent and void, his widow Mrs. Lawrence was entitled to dower of the real estate thereby conveyed?

CARR, J. The first question is as to the amount, which Blow can claim of the guardian's representatives? The administrator of James has recovered against him as surety in the guardian's bond; to the amount of this recovery, he claims as surety; and thus far it is agreed, that he has a right to indemnity only. But, as to the claims of the wards, Margaret and Evelina, there has been no recovery against him: the suit on the guardian's bond was at the relation of these wards, as well as James; but pending that suit, Blow bought up their claims, and the suit as to them was dismissed. He now contends, that, as purchaser and assignee, he is entitled to stand in their shoes, and recover of 41 Davis's *estate the full amount of their claims: it is contended, on the other hand, that Blow, being a surety, could not become a purchaser, otherwise than as trustee for his principal, to whom, as well as to himself, the benefit of the purchase must accrue; in other words, that he is entitled to nothing more than the money he had paid, with interest. The chancellor has decided, that there was nothing in Blow's character of surety, which prevented him from purchasing, for his own exclusive benefit, the rights and interest of the wards: and I am well satisfied that he is correct.

The analogy attempted between the surety in a bond and a trustee or other agent, does not (as it seems to me) hold. Trustees, agents, auctioneers &c. are intrusted confidentially with the property of others, for the purpose of selling it to the best advantage: it is their duty to use every fair effort, to enhance the sale: but if they are suffered to purchase this property for their own benefit, self-interest prompts them to depress instead of enhancing it; and he must be ignorant indeed of human nature, who has not learned, that in a conflict between interest and duty, the latter is too commonly the victim. To prevent these conflicts, and the temptations to fraud, which it is always difficult and often impossible for courts to unravel, the law has wisely determined, that no such agent shall purchase of himself for himself. But how does this reasoning apply to the surety in a bond? He has bound himself with his principal to pay a sum of money; to the obligee he is a debtor for that sum: but this creates no fiduciary relation between his principal and himself. He has lent the principal his name and his credit: but the principal has trusted nothing to him. In the case before us, Davis was appointed guardian for the three infants, and Blow as his surety, became bound with him, that he should discharge his trust faithfully, render just accounts, and pay and deliver to his wards, all such estates as should appear to be due to them, when thereto properly required. The guardian wasted the estate of his wards. At the instance of the surety it was taken from him, and 42 he was ordered to settle *his accounts.

This settlement was made on vouchers furnished wholly by himself, and he was found largely a debtor to each of his wards.

The guardian died leaving things in this situation: time passed on; the infants married; and suit was brought on the bond against the surety, who, thus bound for the claims of the wards, bought out the interests of two of them. Did he in this, violate the letter or the spirit of that rule, which forbids a trustee to purchase for himself? I cannot conceive how. He bought, not of himself, but of the owners: his purchase was of their rights merely, and did not fix the amount of their claims. Nor was this amount to be fixed in any proceeding against him, or in which he could by collusion influence the decision. So far as he was a purchaser, he had to sue the representatives of his principal, and in that adversary proceeding establish the amount of the debt due from the guardian to his wards. No body will deny, that any stranger could have bought the rights and interests of the wards, and would have stood precisely in their shoes: and shall we deny the same power to the surety, whose kindness had exposed him to the danger of losing such large sums, and who had a much stronger and higher motive than the mere speculator, for seizing upon this tabula in naufragio? What right have the representatives of the guardian to make objections, or to claim the benefit of the purchase? Was it made with their money, or their credit, or at their risk, or by reason of any advantageous position in which they or the guardian had placed the surety, and which imposed on him a fiduciary character? Nothing of all this is pretended. The case, in my mind, stands intirely clear of the analogy attempted to be established.

But it was argued, that there is a privity between the principal and surety; that the latter is let into all the secrets and points of defence of the former, and should not be suffered, with the aid of these, to compromise the claim, and then demand the full amount from his principal. I can see nothing in the privity which should affect the case, especially in equity; and as to the secrets of defence being imparted to 43 *the surety, and enabling him to compromise, something must be shewn in the record to support these allegations, before we can venture to found conclusions on them. There seem to have been no secrets, no points of defence in the case. The guardian himself had furnished the materials for making up the accounts; and in the only case in which a judgment was rendered on the bond against the surety (that of Dickson administrator of James Davis) it was rendered for the amount appearing on the guardian's account previously settled. In this particular case, Blow claimed, as surety, to recover only what he had paid, and no objection was made as to the amount of the judgment. As to the two other cases, the surety purchased the rights merely of the wards: they might be something or nothing; the guardian might be solvent or otherwise; these were risks which he had to run. He bought just as any other would, and had to establish the claims by suit, in which his situation as surety gave him no advantage, and ought to subject him to no disadvantage.

There was another point made at the bar:

that Blow cannot recover more than the sum he paid to Levy, because the deed executed to him by Levy is not an assignment but a release, and a release to one obligor discharges all his co-obligors. The correctness of the legal position, that a release to one of several obligors releases all, cannot be doubted; and, if applicable, its effect would seem to be, not merely to restrict the claim of Blow to what he had paid, but to extinguish it altogether. Davis's representative might say to Blow, "you claim of me under this bond, into which you entered with Davis; but you have got a release from this bond, and that discharges your co-obligor, and me as his representative." So, when a surety pays off a bond, lord Hardwicke says, it would be useless for him to take an assignment of it; and the Master of the Rolls, in a subsequent case, assigns the reason; for he says, if the surety should sue upon it, he must do so in the name of the obligee, and the obligor could plead payment, and defeat the action. But these principles do not apply here: for we

44 know that *so soon as a surety has satisfied the creditor, he takes his place in equity, with all his rights, and all his powers. And what difference does it make to the principal debtor, whether the surety suffers a judgment first, or discharges the bond without? Suppose A. as principal and B. as surety execute a bond to C. for 1000 dollars. If there is judgment, and B. discharges it (no matter how), A. must pay the amount to him. But if B. takes up the bond, before judgment, what then? he applies to A. "Here is your bond to C. in which I was surety; I have taken it up, and you must pay me the money." A. may say, "you should have applied to me before you discharged the bond; I do not owe the money; the consideration has failed, or there was a fraud; and I will not pay you." In such a case, B. no doubt, would have to litigate the question, and could only recover of A. what he was found to owe C. But suppose A. should say to the surety, "I acknowledge that I owe this money; I had a valuable consideration from C. for the bond; and you were so kind as to lend me your credit: but for all this I cannot agree to pay you: you have given only 500 dollars for the bond; and besides, you have taken no assignment of the claim, but a release merely, which enures to my benefit, as well as yours." Would not reason and justice and equity reply, "you admit that you owe this money: here is an extinguishment of the claim of your creditor, which your surety has obtained: for what consideration he got it, or whatever the form of the transaction, are questions which do not concern you: you owed the debt to C.; your surety has extinguished his claim, and that transfers his rights and makes you debtor to the surety, for the precise sum you owed him." Does not this strike the common sense of every man? If not, it must be because he has perplexed his mind with the legal ideas of the equal obligation under which principal and surety come to the creditor, and the operation of a release to one co-obligor: but these ideas have no place in the view which equity takes of the transaction. It considers the debt due by the principal only, 45 *though both are bound by the bond; and the moment the surety discharges the claim of the obligee, equity makes him the obligee. In the case before us, therefore, it seems to me a matter of no moment, for what consideration Blow obtained the discharge of Evelina's claim, provided he acted fairly, nor in what form it was taken, provided it effectually shielded the representative of Davis from that claim. Blow states, in his bill, that he purchased the claim, and took an assignment: Mrs. Lawrence says, she knows nothing of this transaction, and leaves Blow to his proof. The instrument is in the form of a release. Levy, who executed it, says he sold and assigned his claim, as administrator of his wife, to Blow. These are mere forms of speech, and cannot affect the real character of the transaction before the court. The true questions are, did Davis, as guardian of Evelina, owe her money? and had Blow extinguished that claim in a fair manner? If so, he stands in the shoes of Evelina. These principles appear so clear to me, that I cannot doubt of their correctness. I do not think, therefore, that the form of the deed, whether an assignment or a release, is material: and, though I think it of little moment, whether we take Blow as a surety extinguishing the debt, or a surety purchasing the claim, yet I think we must take him in the latter character; both because the parties to the transaction (and the only parties concerned) say it was a purchase; and because from the nature of the thing it seems so. It was the payment of a sum certain, for an uncertain, unliquidated claim, which might be more or less, and which might turn out a total loss from the insolvency of the debtors.

The next question is, as to the validity of the two deeds made by Davis of the 14th October 1807. It is agreed, that the deed conveying the wharf &c. to his two children, in consideration of natural love and affection, is fraudulent and void as to creditors. As to the other deed, conveying the brick house and the lot it stood on in Portsmouth and the furniture in the house, to the trustee Whitehead; it is contended, on the one hand, that this deed is also fraudulent 46 *and void as to creditors, and on the other, that though this is a post-nuptial settlement, it was fairly made for a valuable consideration, and therefore valid. As these settlements have not often come before the court, I have given the subject some examination, and shall state what seems to me the amount of the cases I have looked into.

That there are circumstances, under which post-nuptial settlements will be supported, both against creditors and purchasers, there can be no doubt. Thus, many cases decide, that a voluntary payment of a portion by any friend of the wife, will be a consideration which will support a settlement made after marriage. Colville v. Parker, Cro. Jac. 158; Jones v. Marsh, Ca. Temp. Talb. 64; White v. Thornborough, Prec. in Cha. 425; Ward v. Shallet, 2 Ves. sen. 18; Ramsden v. Hylton, Id.

304; Russel v. Hammond, 1 Atk. 13; Stileman v. Ashdown, 2 Id. 479. The portion, however, must be paid in consideration of the settlement. Gardner v. Painter, Ca. Temp. King. 65. So the giving up an interest in the settler's estate, will support a post-nuptial settlement; Jones v. Marsh, ubi supra. And though the relinquishment of this interest be not expressed to be in consideration of the settlement, yet if it be by the same deed, and the settlement is in favour of the person relinquishing, the relinquishment will be presumed to have been the inducement, and not that both were voluntary. And it is the opinion of Atherley, in his able Treatise on Marriage Settlements, (pp. 159-60,) that though the interest was not relinquished by the settlement, but by another deed; yet if it was done about the same time, so that it might be reasonably presumed to be a part of the same transaction, the court would so presume, and look upon it as the consideration which produced the settlement. For this opinion the cases of Scot v. Bell, 2 Lev. 70, and Chapman v. Emery, Cowp. 278, are cited. In the first of these, the wife joined the husband in levying a fine, and selling a tract of land, which had been settled for the benefit of herself and issue; and on the same day, the husband covenanted

47 *to stand seized of the manor of B. to the same uses, to which the land sold had been settled. The husband, some years after, mortgaged the manor of B. And one claiming under the mortgagee, having brought ejectment, the question was, whether the settlement of the manor of B. was fraudulent quoad the mortgage: and by Hale and the court, "the settlement is not void as to the mortgage, for the old settlement being destroyed, and the new made the same day, an agreement by him to make the new settlement, in consideration the wife would pass the fine, and bar the old settlement, shall be intended, and the consideration shall extend to all the uses of the old settlement." In the case in Cowper, the point was not directly before the court; but lord Mansfield expresses a pretty strong impression the same way. The cases also shew, that not only the relinquishment by the wife, of a certain and fixed interest in her husband's estate, but also of a contingent interest, will support a post-nuptial settlement, where there is no badge of fraud; as the giving up her interest in a bond, though contingent. 1 Eq. Ca. Abr. 19; 2 Ves. 16. So, likewise, the releasing her jointure or dower. Pre. in Cha. 113; 2 Lev. 70, 147; 2 Vern. 220. If the parting with these contingent interests by the wife, will support such settlements; it follows, a fortiori, that her parting with her own estate, or making a charge on it for her husband's benefit, will support them; 2 Lev. 148, Cowp. 278, and lady Arundell v. Phipps, 10 Ves. 139. It has also been decided, that in settlements after marriage, a consideration moving from the wife, will support limitations to her children, as well as in her own favour; Ward v. Shallet, before cited, Lavender v. Blackstone, 2 Lev. 147. But though these settlements will be supported, where they appear to have been made upon a fair contract for a valuable consideration, and in the execution of such a contract; yet, from the relative situation of the parties, and the convenient cover they afford a debtor to protect his property and impose upon the world, they are always watched with considerable jealousy.

48 The *weight of authority goes to say, that a post-nuptial settlement will be good against subsequent creditors, even where there is no consideration, provided the settler is not indebted when he makes it, and the transaction is free from circumstances of fraud. But, where the debtor is greatly indebted, and harassed by his creditors, the very fact of his making a settlement, excites strong suspicion; and to support it, an adequate consideration must be shewn, together with the absence of those other badges, which generally attend a fraudulent transaction.

With this view of the law, let us examine the transaction before us. The deed from Davis and wife conveying her land in Charles City, was executed in December 1801. The price and value of this land was 1500 dollars. The deed from Davis to the trustee, for his children and wife, was executed in October 1807, (nearly six years after), and conveys real property valued at 5000 dollars and personalty worth 500 dollars. It was insisted, that these conveyances were made, in execution of an express positive agreement between the husband and the wife, by which she agreed to part with her inheritance, and he, in consideration thereof, bound himself to convey and settle the property mentioned in this deed of trust, to the use of her and her children. We have seen, from some of the cases I have cited, that if the deeds had been made the same day, or about the same time, so as to afford a fair presumption that they were parts of the same transaction, the court might have so presumed; but the lapse of six years takes away all ground for such presumption; and the case must stand (as indeed it was placed in the argument) upon the footing of express and positive contract. It was contended, that this contract was proved, 1. by the answer; 2. by the recital in the deed; 3. by the parol evidence. As to the answer; every voluntary post-nuptial settlement, where the settler is indebted, is, as against his creditors, fraudulent and void; and every settlement will be taken as voluntary, unless those claiming under it can shew, that it was made for a valuable consideration.

49 *The charge of fraud in the deed, made by the creditor here, is the common charge which every creditor would make under such circumstances; and there is no discovery sought of Mrs. Lawrence, by way of evidence as to the deed. If, under such circumstances, that defendant, charged with fraud in accepting and holding under a voluntary deed, could by her own answer, supply proof of a contract, and the execution of it, by which she establishes a valuable consideration for the deed; then in truth it may be said, that to require proof of a consideration at all is a mere farce, and the statute of frauds (calling for a written contract) a dead letter. But there is no such law: the defendant who, in his answer, sets up a contract by way of defence, must establish it by legal and disinterested evidence. As to the recital in the deed; this point rests upon principles pretty nearly akin to the last. It would put into the hands of a fraudulent debtor, a most dangerous weapon: he could, at pleasure, by his own act, furnish evidence to support every conveyance he might make. In some early cases, it does however appear, that much more weight was given to such recitals than they deserved: see an anonymous case, Pr. in Cha. 101, and Dundas v. Dutens, 1 Ves. jun. 196. But in Batterbee v. Farrington, Swanst. 106, the master of the rolls places the subject in the true light: he says, "The distinction, I apprehend, is, that against all persons claiming under the settler, the recital is conclusive; but it would be difficult to maintain, that a recital in a post-nuptial settlement of ante-nuptial articles of the existence of which there is no distinct proof, would be binding on creditors. Such a doctrine (he adds) would give to every trader a power of excluding his creditors by a recital in a deed to which they are not parties." Lastly, the parol evidence relied on as proving the agreement, does not prove it. One of the witnesses, whose evidence is relied on, proves nothing at all to the purpose. Another witness proves, not an agreement indeed, but a loose and vague conversation between the husband and wife, in which the husband proposed,

50 that "if the wife would join in the conveyance of her real estate, he would build her a house on a lot of his in Portsmouth, which house and lot he would convey to her. It is impossible to regard this conversation as a contract, without an utter disregard of the policy and letter of the statute of frauds; but take it as the contract, can we consider this deed as made in execution of that contract? They are six years apart. By the contract, he was to convey a house and lot; by the deed, he conveyed a house, two lots, and 500 dollars worth of furniture: by the contract, he was to convey the house and lot to her alone; by the deed, he conveys to the use of himself for life, then to the use of his two children in fee, with power to them, or either, to sell the whole so soon as they arrive at age, and directions to the trustee to convey to their vendee, and it is only in case they shall not choose to alienate, and shall both die without issue living at their death, in the lifetime of the wife, that the trustee is directed to hold the property for her use. Is this executing a contract by which he agreed to convey the property to the sole use and benefit of the wife? It may be said she choose to have it settled on her children; but of such change in the contract (as I call it for argument sake) there is no proof; nor can we presume, that she would wish the land so settled as to cut herself off from all but a bare possibility of ever enjoying it; a possibility predicated upon the death of both her children without issue in her lifetime. In Lavender v. Blackstone, 2 Lev. 147, a man married before he was of age: he received a portion of £2000, with his wife, and promised that when he should arrive at age, he would settle his estates on the marriage. Some three or four years after he came to age, being much indebted, he made a settlement; and this afterwards coming in question, lord C. J. Hale and the court say, in their fourth resolution, "Though it was proved that the infant, upon the marriage, promised to settle his estate when he came to age, upon himself and his issue (which it was agreed, was a sufficient consideration to avoid 51 fraud, though *an infant by law is not compellable to fulfil his promise) yet this settlement, not being made till three or four years after he came of age, and not being made directly according to the said promise, it shall not be presumed to be made in performance of the promise, without direct proof to that purpose." And the settlement was declared fraudulent. This decision, it must be observed, was made in the 27th year of Charles II. before the statute of frauds, when it was no objection to the promise, that it was by parol. The case of Reade v. Livingston, 3 Johns. Ch. Rep. 481, bears some resemblance to ours. A post-nuptial settlement was made by one in debt, and it was alleged to be in execution of an ante-nuptial parol promise; fourteen years had elapsed between the marriage and the settlement; and the provisions of the settlement did not exactly agree with those of the alleged ante-nuptial parol promise, but they agreed more nearly than in our case. The chancellor, in the course of his opinion, says, "If the present case had arisen prior to the statute of frauds, I apprehend it would have been deemed a fraudulent settlement in regard to existing creditors, from the want of a sufficient connexion in point of time, and of correspondence in point of proof, between the settlement and the alleged agreement."

I should pronounce this settlement, then, fraudulent as to existing creditors, upon these grounds, if there were none other: 1. that there is no contract proved; 2. that if a contract, it is a parol contract for land; 3. that there is such a lapse of time between the alleged contract and the settlement, and such a discrepancy in their terms, that the latter cannot be presumed to be in execution of the former.

But there are other and strong evidences of fraud attending this settlement. The situation of the settler: he had given up business, had become idle and intemperate. The large debts due to his wards, with the full extent of which he was well acquainted, were pressing heavily upon him. A suit was pending against him to compel him to settle the accounts of his guardianship 52 of his deceased ward James *Davis, and distribute his estate; he had been ordered to render his account, and was summoned to attend the commissioners on the 10th October 1807, but excused himself from attending at the appointed day. On the 21st September 1807, his surety Blow, had had him summoned to the ensuing October court, to give him counter security, or deliver up the estate of his wards. And on the 14th October, this settlement was made, just before the court to which he was summoned; for on the 19th October 1807, the court made an order, that Davis should give counter security at the December term, or deliver up the estate, the summons issued against him having been returned executed. Nor is this all: on the same 14th October, he executed to his two children, a deed for his house and wharf in Portsmouth; a deed confessedly voluntary and fraudulent. About the same time, too, as it appears in proof, he executed a bill of sale (antedated 10th June 1807), conveying to Miss Maynard, the aunt of his wife, living in his family, ten slaves, and a second bill of sale conveying to her another slave, probably forgotten when the first was made. By these deeds, he divested himself of every atom of property he held in possession; of house, lands, furniture, slaves; every thing of most necessary and daily use in living. And to whom were these conveyances made? A wife, two children not above seven years of age, and a maiden aunt of his wife, who had always lived, and always continued to live in his family. Could he possibly have selected instruments better fitted for his purpose, if his intention was to cover his property from his creditors, and still retain the use of it? And, accordingly, it is abundantly proved, that he did, to the day of his death, retain the actual use, possession, and substantial ownership of the whole property real and personal. Again; it is clearly proved, that the transactions were conducted with that sort of secrecy which is always a badge of fraud. There is yet another objection to which this settlement is obnoxious: the consideration for which it is alleged to be made is the wife's land, worth 1500 dollars; the property settled is worth 5500

53 *dollars, four times the value; and in these settlements, inadequacy of price, especially if the settler be embarrassed, and the inadequacy gross, is considered among the strongest evidences of fraud. See the very sound remarks of Atherley, in his chapter headed "Considerations which will support settlements after marriage," and the cases he cites, especially Dewey v. Bayntun, 6 East. 257. These objections taken together force my mind irresistibly to the conclusion, that this settlement was fraudulent in fact and void against creditors.

In the account taken, the commissioner has charged Mrs. Lawrence with the annual value of the house while she occupied it. This charge was sustained by the chancellor, and formed one of the grounds of objection to his decree, in the argument. With respect to this question of rents and profits, my brethren are against the decree allowing them. I have not been able to bring my mind to the same conclusion, though I cannot say that I have come decidedly to a different one. I, therefore, choose to leave this point open for a fuller court.

As to the case of Blow v. Maynard, in which the chancellor has declared the two bills of sale of slaves, made by John Davis to Eleanor Maynard, bearing date the 10th June and the 19th September 1807, fair and valid as against Davis's creditors, I differ with him in opinion toto cælo. I have seldom seen a case, which, in my judgment, was more strongly marked with actual fraud. The evidence leaves no doubt on my mind, that the first of those instruments, though it bears date on the 7th June, was probably not executed, and at all events not delivered, till about the 14th October, when Davis was settling all his real estate in possession to the use of his family: that Maynard never paid the considerations expressed in the bills of sale, or any part of them, and never had any means of making such payment: that the payments were feigned, and the transactions wholly fictitious: that notwithstanding the bills of sale

Davis continued in possession of all 54 the slaves, taking and enjoying *the profits, thenceforth, till his death: and that these deeds were designed and contrived to defraud Davis's creditors, and especially his wards, of their just demands.

GREEN, J. Agreeing with my brother Carr, that the conveyances sought to be set aside in these causes, are fraudulent, in law and in fact, and void as to the creditors of the grantor, I shall confine myself to the examination of the questions which arise in consequence of such a declaration.

The first of these is as to the true amount of Blow's claim. He paid, in order to discharge himself from his responsibility as surety for John Davis, in his bond as guardian of Margaret, Evelina and James Davis, the sum of 3483 dollars 81 cents, upon compromises severally made with those who represented their rights: and if he is only entitled to claim indemnity, as a surety entitled to the remedies which belonged to the creditors, his recovery must be limited to the amount he so paid, and interest thereon. But he insists that he is entitled to claim as assignee of Margaret and her husband, and of the administrator of Evelina, the full amount due from Davis to them, which, together with the amount which he paid to the administrator of James upon a judgment, would be equal to nearly three times the amount of what he was really out of pocket.

The bill alleges, that, in consideration of 1000 dollars &c. the administrator of Evelina assigned to Blow his claim against Davis; and the deed of the administrator, is exhibited in support of that charge. The administrator, in his answer, admits that, by a deed executed by him, a copy of which was exhibited as a part of his answer, he did, for the consideration therein mentioned, assign and transfer to Blow all his interest in the debt due by John Davis to his intestate as her guardian, and released him from all claims on account of Davis's guardianship. From these pleadings, no one could possibly conceive, that Blow intended to affirm, or the administrator to admit, that there was any contract

55 between the parties, other than that evidenced by the deed *exhibited by both (for they are precise copies of each other) as the evidence in support of the declaration and admission, that an assignment had been made: there is no suggestion, that there was any agreement other than that evidenced by the deed, or that there was any mistake or omission in reducing the agreement to writing. When we look at that deed (which is perfectly formal) it contains a simple release of Blow's liability for Davis's guardianship, and not the slightest intimation of an intent or agreement to assign the claim against him. The fact of the assignment averred in the bill, is put in issue by the answer: it was one in which the defendants had a deep interest, and in respect to which they had a right to call for proof: and no proof is given. The answer of the administrator would be no evidence against the other defendants, even if it admitted an assignment otherwise than by the deed itself.

The deed executed by the parties, in pursuance of the compromise between Blow and the other ward, Margaret, does indeed contain a formal assignment to him, of all her claims upon Davis's guardian's bond: but, at the same time, it contains also a general release of Blow's responsibility as his surety. This release extinguished the obligation in toto, as to all the parties. A release of one of several obligors, whether the obligation be joint only, or joint and several, is a release of all, even if it contain a proviso that the others shall not have the benefit of it. Everard v. Herne, Litt. Rep. 191; Clayton v. Kynaston, 2 Salk. 574. It was argued, that the surety might take an assignment of the debt and obligation of his principal, with the same effect as any stranger. Admit it (though the position is not maintainable) and what would be the effect of a release of one obligor, and an assignment quoad the other, to a stranger, by the same instrument? The assignment would pass nothing, since the release would annihilate the obligation intirely. But suppose there had been no release connected with the assignment, the effect would have been the same; it would have been a payment or satisfaction of the debt, which the 56 principal *might have pleaded with effect, since no man can owe a debt to himself. And this was in effect the judgment of lord Hardwicke in Gammon v. Stone, 1 Ves. sen. 339, in which he held, that a surety upon paying the debt, could not claim an assignment, because "it would be quite useless." Neither is there any instance in which a surety has come into a court of equity, claiming as a legal or equitable assignee, the benefit of the securities given by his principal to the creditor: he can only claim to be substituted to the right of the creditor, in respect to such securities, so far as to indemnify him. And this, I think, is the measure of the relief, to which Blow, the surety here, is entitled.

In respect to the personal property fraudulently conveyed, those who have held and enjoyed it, are accountable to the creditors of the fraudulent donor, for it and its proceeds and profits, in like manner as a rightful executor would be. The grounds upon which such creditors may resort to a court of equity, were examined in Chamberlayne v. Temple, 2 Rand. 384. In the present case, there was an additional ground of jurisdiction; the necessity of resorting to that tribunal, to prevent the property from being withdrawn from the claims of the creditor: an ordinary branch of equitable jurisdiction, in cases of fraud combined with danger to the property, or of misconduct, waste or improper disposition of the assets, even in the case of a rightful executor. Anon. 12 Ves. 4; Middleton v. Dodswell, 13 Id. 266.

The chancellor properly held, that Mrs. Lawrence was not entitled to dower in the lands descended to Davis's children, which were held by his mother in dower until after his death, and that she was entitled to dower in the real property conveyed by Davis to his children and the trustee Whitehead, not indeed for the reason assigned, that the fraud, with which these conveyances were tainted, cannot be imputed to her by reason of her coverture, but because she did not join in the conveyances.

Another question is, whether the lands descended to Davis's heirs (the dower lands of his mother) and those conveyed *by him to his children and Whitehead (which, for the purposes of this cause, must be also considered as descending to the heirs of Davis, the conveyances being void), ought to be sold out and out, or only extended for the satisfaction of the plaintiff's claim. I do not know, that this question has ever been considered in this court. In the late cases of Coleman v. Cocke, 6 Rand. 618, and Halley v. Williams, 1 Leigh, 140, it did not occur. In the former, no objection was made to the decree directing the sale of the lands, as it was said to be wholly immaterial to the interests of the parties whether they were sold or not; and, in the latter, there was a valid mortgage which the judgment creditors had a right to redeem, and to stand in the shoes of the mortgagees, and (selling the land under the mortgage) to tack their judgments.

The real question here is, not whether a court of equity setting aside a fraudulent deed in favour of a judgment creditor in the lifetime of the debtor, can sell the land (a power repudiated by lord Hardwicke in Higgins v. The York Buildings Co., 2 Atk. 107.) but, whether, in such a case, in a proceeding in equity against the heir and fraudulent donee of the debtor, upon a judgment against him in his lifetime, or on his bond binding his heirs, the lands can be sold? In the case of a creditor, who had obtained a judgment in the lifetime of the debtor, lord Hardwicke decided that question in the affirmative, decreeing a sale of a moiety only of the land, because only a moiety was bound by a judgment at law: declaring, that equity, whilst it could not change the rights of the parties, might accelerate the payment, by directing the sale of a moiety, and not let the creditor wait until he was paid out of the rents and profits. This principle was asserted by lord Redesdale in O'Gorman v. Comyn, 2 Scho. & Lef. 138, and O'Fallon v. Dillon, Id. 13. He states, that such was the settled doctrine in Ireland, where, we know, the english law is established, both in the courts of law and equity. The rule seems to have been established in England, as

58 far back at least as 1730; when, *in the case of Robinson v. Tong, 3 Vin. Abr. Assets, A. pl. 28, p. 145, it was affirmed by counsel; and, in that case, an advowson was decreed to be sold at the instance of creditors, as assets descended, and the decree was affirmed in the house of lords. The creditors, there, do not appear to have been, and probably were not, judgment creditors. This principle, so far as I am informed, has been uniformly practised on in Virginia, in the cases of heirs bound by the obligations of their ancestors. And although I cannot see clearly the foundation of this equity to sell, when the law only authorizes an extent, or a personal judgment or decree against the heir, for the value of the assets descended, whether alienated by him or not (see the statute of fraudulent devises), yet, I think we are bound by the practice founded on these precedents so long acquiesced in.

The only portion of the real property in question, which has produced any profits since the death of Davis, is the house in which he resided, and the lots connected with it. These have been occupied by Mrs. Davis, during her widowhood, both before her second marriage, and after the death of her second husband, and by him during his life. Estimated rents (abating one third for her dower) with interest during the whole time, have been decreed against Mrs. Lawrence. The propriety of that part of the decree is questioned.

The decree is certainly erroneous, so far as it subjects her to the payment of rents and profits accruing during her second coverture, and with interest on any portion of them.

There is no adjudged case, either here, or in the courts of Westminster hall, so far as I am informed (and the counsel in this cause admitted it to be so) which determines the question, whether or no, in a case where there is no incumbrance on the land descended, either by judgment against the ancestor or otherwise, and a creditor by bond binding the heir, sues him at law or in equity, the rents and profits received by him can be reached as assets. There are, however, various dicta to be found in respect to that question.

59 *The first is in the year book of 48 Ed. 3, 32, b., which as abridged by Viner (vol. 3, Assets, C. pl. 3, p. 147,) is to this effect: "If the heir aliens the assets by fraud to oust the debtee of his action, and takes the profits to the value of the debt, this shall be assets." But Brooke, in abridging the same case (tit. Assets by descent, pl. 10, quoted 3 Vin. Assets, B. pl. 3, p. 146, note) states it more at large, thus: "So when the plaintiff said that assets descended to the heir, and that he had conveyed them away by fraud to oust him of his action, of which lands the heir took the profits; and the defendant said, that he made a feoffment to J. R. in fee upon condition, and as to taking the profits no law will put him to answer; and it was not adjudged: Nevertheless it seems, that it is not assets to charge him, for he had no franktenement in him of it." And in Heningham's case, Dyer 344, pl. 1, Dyer said, extrajudicially, "If the profits of the land descended, from the death of the ancestor to the day of the writ, amount sufficiently to satisfy the debt, and the plaintiff will shew that to the court, in an action of debt against the heir, and he cannot deny it, the plaintiff shall have a general judgment and execution immediately;" that is a personal judgment against the heir; which Manwood denied totis viribus. In Shetelworth v. Neville, 1 T. R. 454, in an action of debt against an heir upon the bond of his ancestor, he pleaded, that particular lands specified descended to him, that his ancestor was bound to him in a bond for a specified sum, and that he had laid out for repairs of the property £100. beyond the rents and profits received before the suing out of the writ; to which the plaintiff demurred; and the court sustained the demurrer, upon the ground, that the plea was bad for want of an averment, that the repairs were necessary, and made before he had notice of the plaintiff's demand. And Ashurst, J., added as "a more substantial objection to the plea, in point of reason, that the case of an heir at law is not like that of a trustee for the payment of debts. A trustee is not at liberty to 60 use: they *must go in diminution of the just debts; but that is not the case with respect to an heir at law; for till possession is recovered against him, he is entitled to the rents and profits; he is entitled to receive them till judgment is given against him. In the meantime, he may have received more than sufficient to pay for the repairs." In the case of Higgins v. The York Buildings Co., 2 Atk. 107, several judgment creditors filed a bill to set aside a deed for an estate, as being fraudulent as to them; which being done, they claimed against the fraudulent donees an account of the rents and profits from the filing of the bill; which was refused. The observations of lord Hardwicke are stated in a most confused and blundering way, after the manner of that reporter; who attributes to him the declaration, that "he did not know, in the case of fraudulent conveyances, that the court of chancery had ever done any thing more than remove the fraudulent conveyances out of the way; nor were there any cases which he could find, of decreeing profits back against the original debtor and owner of the estate, received pendente lite, in that court, in favour of judgment creditors from the filing of the bill, nor any instance of a decree for a sale; but equity follows the law and leaves them to their remedy by elegit, without interfering one way or the other." It does not appear, whether the fraudulent donor was dead or alive; but I presume he was alive, as is indicated from the tenor of the foregoing remarks, and the fact, that shortly after, in the case of Stileman v. Ashdown, he decreed the sale of a moiety of the debtor's land in a suit by a judgment creditor against the heir. Lord Hardwicke is also reported to have said, that the plaintiff (speaking of one only where there were several) but for the fraudulent conveyance, might have had an elegit at law, but that could have entitled him only to a moiety: but there being more judgment creditors than one, gave a handle to decree an account of profits from the time of the decree. No reason is assigned for this conclusion; nor can I imagine any, which would not apply to one as well as 61 to several judgment creditors, *under the same circumstances; especially, if the chancellor followed up the principles laid down by himself in the same case, and, removing the impediment, left the plaintiffs to their remedy by elegit; in which case, no account of profits from the time of the decree, could be of any benefit to them, as immediately after the decree they might execute their elegits. This reporter attributes a further remark to the chancellor: "the most usual case in this court, is a judgment creditor coming here against an heir at law, for an account of the rents and profits received by him, being considered as assets of the ancestor; for, if he brought an action of debt, he would have judgment for the full value of the estate, and therefore courts of equity make their decrees conformable to the judgment at law." This indicates that lord Hardwicke was of opinion, that in some cases a judgment creditor was entitled to an account of rents and profits from the heir, but it is not clear, whether he meant a creditor by judgment against the ancestor, or one who had obtained a judgment against the heir, or both. From the terms of the decree in the case of Stileman v. Ashdown (shortly after determined) as reported by Ambler, which reserved the question as to rents and profits, it would seem, that he had in his mind the case of creditors by judgments against the ancestor, which were a lien on the estate. But this is contradicted by the subsequent remark, that "if he had brought an action of debt against the heir" &c. Such an action could not be maintained upon a judgment against the ancestor; the only mode, in which it could be enforced against the lands descended, being by a scire facias against the heir as terretenant, and that only for a moiety and not the whole estate or its value. And yet he could not have referred to a creditor by judgment against the heir, for he supposes no action of debt to have been brought against him. All we can make of this confused report (the fault of the reporter, and not of the eminent judge who decided the case) is, that in whatever cases lord Hardwicke considered the heir responsible for rents and profits, he grounded

62 *his opinion upon the capacity of the creditor to recover the full value of the estate, by force of the statute against fraudulent devises; which is the same, to this purpose, with us as in England. That statute allowed the creditor to recover that full value, either when the heir had alienated the estate before the suing out of the writ, or without such alienation, if the heir pleaded "nothing by descent." The plaintiff might reply that he had assets by descent, and if the jury found that he had, the plaintiff might, at his election, have a special judgment against the land descended, or a general and personal judgment against the heir. This statute applies, in terms, to bills in equity, as well as suits at law, and gives no remedy for profits received by the heir. Lord Hardwicke's declaration, that decrees in equity were conformable to the judgments at law, whether generally or under the statute, excludes the idea, that any such decree can be given for profits, since no such judgment at law was ever given.

We can make nothing of these dicta; and without the aid of authority and precedent, this question must be decided upon principle.

A creditor of the ancestor, by bond binding his heirs, had no lien upon the land descended, as is proved by the consideration, that if the heir had aliened the land bona fide before suit brought, he was intirely discharged from all responsibility for the debt at common law; although in equity, even before the statute against fraudulent devises, he was held to be responsible to the creditor for the value of the land aliened. Coleman v. Winch, 1 P. Wms. 777. The statute imposed the same responsibility upon him, in that case, in a suit at law; and gave to creditors a priority according to the date of their judgments, as in suits by creditors in equal degree, against executors and administrators; and also subjected the heir to a personal judgment for the value of the land descended, whenever he falsely pleaded nothing by descent. This was a relaxation of the common law, by

63 which in such case the heir was liable to *a personal judgment for the whole amount of the debt. This statute substituted the value of the land for the extent at common law. That did not reach the profits already received by the heir; nor does the statute subject such profits to the claim of the creditor in any case. A court of equity, instead of a personal decree against the heir, for the value of the land remaining in his hands, gives, in effect, relief to the same extent, by giving the proceeds of the sale of such lands; thus conforming to the spirit of the statute, and only changing the form, not the substance of the relief. But, if it gave also the rents and profits received by the heir, this would be changing the rights of the parties. If Blow could have maintained an action at law upon the guardian's bond against Davis's heirs, and they had pleaded, as they have in this case, that they had nothing by descent, and an issue had been taken on the plea; the very question of fraud involved in this suit, would have been involved in that issue; and if found for the plaintiff, all he could have had would have been an extent of all the land, or a personal judgment against the heirs for its value, at his election, and could not have reached the previous rents and profits. Why then should he be entitled to an account of these rents and profits in equity? I can, indeed, see a very persuasive reason for holding, in a case of a judgment against the ancestor (which binds his lands from its date, and under which a moiety might be taken immediately, and delivered to the creditor at a reasonable extent, so as to give him the subsequently accruing rents and profits, and he is deprived of that benefit by a fraudulent conveyance), the fraudulent donee, whether in the lifetime or after the death of the debtor, whether a stranger or his heir, should compensate in equity for the injury done by his fraud, and the amount of that compensation should be determined by the amount of the rents and profits, enjoyed by him, and lost to the creditor, by reason of the fraud. But, in the case of a suit against the heir upon the ancestor's bond, no right accrues to the plaintiff to have the rents and profits until judgment 64 *or decree; and, therefore, a fraudulent conveyance, either to the heir or a stranger, deprives the creditor of no part of the rents and profits, which he would have been entitled to and received, but for the impediment of the fraudulent conveyance. For, whether such a conveyance existed or not, the creditor must have prosecuted a suit to judgment or decree, before his title to the rents and profits could accrue.

I am, therefore, of opinion, that in such case, the creditor is not entitled to an account of past rents and profits, whether received by the heir or a stranger.

CABELL, J. I concur in the opinion, that all the deeds are fraudulent and void. Indeed, few cases have come within my observation, where the fraud was more foul, or more thinly covered.

Several important questions of law arise in the case of Lawrence v. Blow. The first of these relates to the amount of Blow's recovery: whether it is to be restricted to the sums which he actually paid, or shall extend to any farther sums, which, on a fair settlement of Davis's accounts as guardian, shall be found due from his estate to his wards? This question can arise only as to the payments made to Young and his wife, formerly Margaret Davis, and to Levy as administrator of his deceased wife, formerly Evelina Davis. For, as to the sum paid to the administrator of the other ward, that was established by a judgment, which must be admitted to be conclusive.

As to the sum paid to Young and wife, Blow contends, that their assignment to him authorises him to recover, not only the sum which he paid as the consideration of that assignment, but whatever sum Davis owed them. The deed from Young and wife to Blow contained an assignment to him, of all the right, demand &c. which Mrs. Young had against Blow or Davis's estate on account of Davis's guardianship of Mrs. Young, and a release to Blow, of all suits, actions and remedies whatever. This release extended, unquestionably, to the bond executed by Blow as surety 65 for *Davis, and was in law, as it was in fact intended to be, an absolute discharge thereof, as to Blow. A release to one of two joint obligors, or to one of two joint and several obligors, is a release to the other. The bond is thereby discharged as to both, and no action can be sustained upon it. No body denies that this is so, in a court of law; and there is not an instance in any of the books, in which it has been held to be otherwise in a court of equity. The principle, that a release to one is a release to all, not less obligatory on courts of equity than on courts of law. The assignment to Blow of all the rights &c. of Mrs. Young cannot strengthen the case; for, by the release, the bond was functus officio; there was nothing left for the assignment to operate upon. And this would be equally the case, whether the assignment of a released bond, were made to a surety in the bond or to a stranger.

The payment made to Levy, cannot stand on more favourable ground; for, in that case, there was nothing more than absolute release.

The only ground on which Blow can recover, is the implied contract between principal and surety, that if the surety shall pay the money, the principal will pay it. On this ground, he might have brought an action at law; and it is on this ground only, that he can be admitted in a court of equity, by substitution to the remedies of the creditors against the principal. But this ground will support a demand for nothing beyond what he has actually paid, and the interest upon it.

Another question is, whether the chancellor was right in decreeing the rents and profits of the land. It must be borne in mind, that this is a case in which no judgment or decree had been obtained against the debtor in his lifetime, or against his heir since his death. The suit is brought, merely on the bond of the ancestor, against his heir and alienee. There are many contradictory dicta, which would seem to bear on this subject; but there is no decision giving rents and profits under such circumstances. Nor do I think 66 *such a decision would be consistent with the principles of the law. Until a creditor has obtained a judgment or decree, he has no lien on the land of his debtor, and, consequently, is not entitled to its possession, or to the profits of it. The decree, therefore, was wrong in giving the profits antecedent to the decree. And even if it were right to give the profits, it would be clearly wrong to give interest on those profits.

The chancellor has directed a sale of the lands, out and out; and a question is raised, whether this was proper; or whether he ought not to have left the party to his extent on the land, for paying the debt out of the rents and profits.

In the case of Stileman v. Ashdown, 2 Atk. 607; Ambler, 13, where a creditor, having obtained a judgment against his debtor, who afterwards made a fraudulent conveyance, and then died, came into a court of equity against the heir at law and fraudulent alienee, to set aside the conveyance, lord Hardwicke directed a sale of the moiety of the land: And it is believed that similar decrees are frequently made by the english chancellors. The decrees for a sale of the moiety of the land, in such cases proceed on the principle, that the creditor has, by his judgment, a lien on the moiety of the land for the payment of his debt out of the rents and profits; and the courts of equity, on the ground of rendering more effectual, accelerate the payment, by directing a sale, instead of levying the debt out of the rents and profits. 2 Scho. & Lef. 139. The principle, which justifies a sale of the moiety of the land, in the cases just mentioned, applies, in all its force, to the case before us, and extends to the sale of the whole land. Blow, by his decree, acquired a lien on the whole land; and has, consequently, the same equity to demand a sale of the whole, that the plaintiffs in Stileman v. Ashdown, had to demand a sale of the moiety.

In Blow v. Maynard, the opinion of the court was, that the bills of sale to slaves made by J. Davis to the appellee Eleanor Maynard, under dates of June 7, 67 and September *19, 1807, were fraudulent and void as to his creditors; and that she is accountable for the slaves thereby conveyed, and the increase of the females of them, and their hires and profits accruing since his death, as executrix in her own wrong, in a like manner as a rightful executor would be accountable; and that the appellee, Elizabeth Lawrence, having been privy to the fraud, and having held and enjoyed the profits and produce of the property, so fraudulently conveyed, in common with E. Maynard, was in like manner responsible, jointly with her, except in relation to transactions in respect to the slaves, which occurred during her coverture with David Lawrence. Decree reversed with costs.

In Lawrence v. Blow, the court declared that Blow was entitled to recover against the defendants in this suit, only 4243 dollars 63 cents with interest on 3483 dollars 81 cents, the principal part thereof, from the 1st July 1825, that being the whole amount paid by him in satisfaction of the claims against him as surety for J. Davis in the guardian's bond: that none of the defendants were responsible for the rents and profits of the real estate in the proceedings mentioned: and that the said decree was erroneous so far as it conflicted with the foregoing opinion, and no farther. Decree reversed with costs.

Sheriffs—Summary Motion by Sureties.—Under the statute concerning sheriffs, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 78, § 7, giving remedy to sureties of sheriffs against their principals, a summary motion does not lie for such sureties against their principals to recover judgment for the money paid; but only to obtain execution against the lands.

Principal and Surety—Summary Motion by Sureties.—And under the statute giving summary remedy to all sureties against their principals, Id. ch. 116, § 1, no motion lies for sureties against devisees of their principals.

The commonwealth recovered judgment in the general court, against Theron Gee, the surety of John B. Williams deceased, late sheriff of Prince George county, for 169 dollars with interest and costs, due from the sheriff on account of taxes on merchants' licences by him collected and not accounted for. Gee paid the debt; and then gave a notice to Richard and Julia Bacchus, heirs at law and devisees of Williams, of a motion to be made against them in the general court, for the amount so paid by him as the surety of their ancestor and devisor. The notice being duly proved, and the defendants not appearing to defend the motion, the court gave judgment for Gee against them personally, for the amount of his claim, without any inquiry as to the amount of the real assets de-sended or devised, or whether there were any. And this court upon the petition of the defendants allowed a supersedeas to the judgment.

1. The first question was, whether the statutory summary remedy by motion, lay for a surety, bound in the official bond of a sheriff, for judgment against the heirs and devisees of the principal, or for any surety against the devisees of his principal? which depended on the construction of the 37th section of the statute concerning sheriffs, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 78, p. 285, and of the 1st section of the statute providing summary remedy for sureties generally, Id. ch. 116, p. 460.

2. It was objected, that if the remedy lay, the proceedings were irregular, and the judgment unjust: that heirs or devisees are only chargeable in respect of the real assets that come to their hands, and to the extent thereof: yet here was an absolute judgment against heirs and devisees personally, without any inquiry what or whether any assets had been received by them. There ought to have been a writ of inquiry to ascertain the amount of assets. To which it was answered, where the heir or devisee makes default, an absolute judgment against him personally ought regularly to be entered. 2 Wms. Saund. 7, n. 4.

COALTER, J., delivered the resolution of the court:

That the 37th section of the statute concerning sheriffs, does not authorise a summary proceeding by motion by the sureties of a sheriff or collector, for a judgment for money paid by such sureties for their principals: the provision was only intended to bind the lands of the sheriff, to his sureties who pay his debt to the public, in like manner as his lands are bound to the commonwealth; and, a judgment being previously obtained for the sureties against the principal or his representatives, to authorise the court, upon motion, to award a like execution thereupon, against the lands in the hands of the principal, his heirs or devisees, as might be issued on a judgment for the commonwealth against the principal for the same debt. And that, taking the motion in this case, as a motion made under the 1st section of the statute providing the summary remedy for sureties, that statute does not authorise a judgment, in this form of proceeding, against devisees; and as the judgment here charges the plaintiffs in error both as heirs and devisees, the court, without deciding any other question made in the case, was of opinion that the judgment was erroneous.

amount of the rents and profits, enjoyed by him, and lost to the creditor, by reason of the fraud. But, in the case of a suit against the heir upon the ancestor's bond, no right accrues to the plaintiff to have the rents and profits until judgment 64 *or decree; and, therefore, a fraudulent conveyance, either to the heir or a stranger, deprives the creditor of no part of the rents and profits, which he would have been entitled to and received, but for the impediment of the fraudulent conveyance. For, whether such a conveyance existed or not, the creditor must have prosecuted a suit to judgment or decree, before his title to the rents and profits could accrue.

I am, therefore, of opinion, that in such case, the creditor is not entitled to an account of past rents and profits, whether received by the heir or a stranger.

CABELL, J. I concur in the opinion, that all the deeds are fraudulent and void. Indeed, few cases have come within my observation, where the fraud was more foul, or more thinly covered.

Several important questions of law arise in the case of Lawrence v. Blow. The first of these relates to the amount of Blow's recovery: whether it is to be restricted to the sums which he actually paid, or shall extend to any farther sums, which, on a fair settlement of Davis's accounts as guardian, shall be found due from his estate to his wards? This question can arise only as to the payments made to Young and his wife, formerly Margaret Davis, and to Levy as administrator of his deceased wife, formerly Evelina Davis. For, as to the sum paid to the administrator of the other ward, that was established by a judgment, which must be admitted to be conclusive.

As to the sum paid to Young and wife, Blow contends, that their assignment to him authorises him to recover, not only the sum which he paid as the consideration of that assignment, but whatever sum Davis owed them. The deed from Young and wife to Blow contained an assignment to him, of all the right, demand &c. which Mrs. Young had against Blow or Davis's estate on account of Davis's guardianship of Mrs. Young, and a release to Blow, of all suits, actions and remedies whatever. This release extended, unquestionably, to the bond executed by Blow as surety 65 for *Davis, and was in law, as it was in fact intended to be, an absolute discharge thereof, as to Blow. A release to one of two joint obligors, or to one of two joint and several obligors, is a release to the other. The bond is thereby discharged as to both, and no action can be sustained upon it. No body denies that this is so, in a court of law; and there is not an instance in any of the books, in which it has been held to be otherwise in a court of equity. The principle, that a release to one is a release to all, not less obligatory on courts of equity than on courts of law. The assignment to Blow of all the rights &c. of Mrs. Young cannot strengthen the case; for, by the release, the bond was functus officio; there was nothing left for the assignment to operate upon. And this would be equally the case, whether the assignment of a released bond, were made to a surety in the bond or to a stranger.

The payment made to Levy, cannot stand on more favourable ground; for, in that case, there was nothing more than absolute release.

The only ground on which Blow can recover, is the implied contract between principal and surety, that if the surety shall pay the money, the principal will pay it. On this ground, he might have brought an action at law; and it is on this ground only, that he can be admitted in a court of equity, by substitution to the remedies of the creditors against the principal. But this ground will support a demand for nothing beyond what he has actually paid, and the interest upon it.

Another question is, whether the chancellor was right in decreeing the rents and profits of the land. It must be borne in mind, that this is a case in which no judgment or decree had been obtained against the debtor in his lifetime, or against his heir since his death. The suit is brought, merely on the bond of the ancestor, against his heir and alienee. There are many contradictory dicta, which would seem to bear on this subject; but there is no decision giving rents and profits under such circumstances. Nor do I think

66 *such a decision would be consistent with the principles of the law. Until a creditor has obtained a judgment or decree, he has no lien on the land of his debtor, and, consequently, is not entitled to its possession, or to the profits of it. The decree, therefore, was wrong in giving the profits antecedent to the decree. And even if it were right to give the profits, it would be clearly wrong to give interest on those profits.

The chancellor has directed a sale of the lands, out and out; and a question is raised, whether this was proper; or whether he ought not to have left the party to his extent on the land, for paying the debt out of the rents and profits.

In the case of Stileman v. Ashdown, 2 Atk. 607; Ambler, 13, where a creditor, having obtained a judgment against his debtor, who afterwards made a fraudulent conveyance, and then died, came into a court of equity against the heir at law and fraudulent alienee, to set aside the conveyance, lord Hardwicke directed a sale of the moiety of the land: And it is believed that similar decrees are frequently made by the english chancellors. The decrees for a sale of the moiety of the land, in such cases proceed on the principle, that the creditor has, by his judgment, a lien on the moiety of the land for the payment of his debt out of the rents and profits; and the courts of equity, on the ground of rendering more effectual, accelerate the payment, by directing a sale, instead of levying the debt out of the rents and profits. 2 Scho. & Lef. 139. The principle, which justifies a sale of the moiety of the land, in the cases just mentioned, applies, in all its force, to the case before us, and extends to the sale of the whole land. Blow, by his decree, acquired a lien on the whole land; and has, consequently, the same equity to demand a sale of the whole, that the plaintiffs in Stileman v. Ashdown, had to demand a sale of the moiety.

In Blow v. Maynard, the opinion of the court was, that the bills of sale to slaves made by J. Davis to the appellee Eleanor Maynard, under dates of June 7, 67 and September *19, 1807, were fraudulent and void as to his creditors; and that she is accountable for the slaves thereby conveyed, and the increase of the females of them, and their hires and profits accruing since his death, as executrix in her own wrong, in a like manner as a rightful executor would be accountable; and that the appellee, Elizabeth Lawrence, having been privy to the fraud, and having held and enjoyed the profits and produce of the property, so fraudulently conveyed, in common with E. Maynard, was in like manner responsible, jointly with her, except in relation to transactions in respect to the slaves, which occurred during her coverture with David Lawrence. Decree reversed with costs.

In Lawrence v. Blow, the court declared that Blow was entitled to recover against the defendants in this suit, only 4243 dollars 63 cents with interest on 3483 dollars 81 cents, the principal part thereof, from the 1st July 1825, that being the whole amount paid by him in satisfaction of the claims against him as surety for J. Davis in the guardian's bond: that none of the defendants were responsible for the rents and profits of the real estate in the proceedings mentioned: and that the said decree was erroneous so far as it conflicted with the foregoing opinion, and no farther. Decree reversed with costs.

Sheriffs*—Summary Motion by Sureties.—Under the statute concerning sheriffs, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 78, § 37, giving remedy to sureties of sheriffs against their principals, a summary motion does not lie for such sureties against their principals to recover judgment for the money paid; but only to obtain execution against the lands.

Principal and Surety—Summary Motion by Sureties.—And under the statute giving summary remedy to all sureties against their principals, Id. ch. 116, § 1, no motion lies for sureties against devisees of their principals.

The commonwealth recovered judgment in the general court, against Theron Gee, the surety of John B. Williams deceased, late sheriff of Prince George county, for 169 dollars with interest and costs, due from the sheriff on account of taxes on merchants' licences by him collected and not accounted for. Gee paid the debt; and then gave a notice to Richard and Julia Bacchus, heirs at law and devisees of Williams, of a motion to be made against them in the general court, for the amount so paid by him as the surety of their ancestor and devisor. The notice being duly proved, and the defendants not appearing to defend the motion, the court gave judgment for Gee against them personally, for the amount of his claim, without any inquiry as to the amount of the real assets descended or devised, or whether there were any. And this court upon the petition of the defendants allowed a supersedeas to the judgment.

1. The first question was, whether the statutory summary remedy by motion, lay for a surety, bound in the official bond of a sheriff, for judgment against the heirs and devisees of the principal, or for any surety against the devisees of his principal? which depended on the construction of the 37th section of the statute concerning sheriffs, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 78, p. 285, and of the 1st section of the statute providing summary remedy for sureties generally, Id. ch. 116, p. 460.

2. It was objected, that if the remedy lay, the proceedings were irregular, and the judgment unjust: that heirs or devisees are only chargeable in respect of the real assets that come to their hands, and to the extent thereof: yet here was an absolute judgment against heirs and devisees personally, without any inquiry what or whether any assets had been received by them. There ought to have been a writ of inquiry to ascertain the amount of assets. To which it was answered, where the heir or devisee makes default, an absolute judgment against him personally ought regularly to be entered. 2 Wms. Saund. 7, n. 4.

COALTER, J., delivered the resolution of the court:

That the 37th section of the statute concerning sheriffs, does not authorise a summary proceeding by motion by the sureties of a sheriff or collector, for a judgment for money paid by such sureties for their principals: the provision was only intended to bind the lands of the sheriff, to his sureties who pay his debt to the public, in like manner as his lands are bound to the commonwealth; and, a judgment being previously obtained for the sureties against the principal or his representatives, to authorise the court, upon motion, to award a like execution thereupon, against the lands in the hands of the principal, his heirs or devisees, as might be issued on a judgment for the commonwealth against the principal for the same debt. And that, taking the motion in this case, as a motion made under the 1st section of the statute providing the summary remedy for sureties, that statute does not authorise a judgment, in this form of proceeding, against devisees; and as the judgment here charges the plaintiffs in error both as heirs and devisees, the court, without deciding any other question made in the case, was of opinion that the judgment was erroneous.

of Respondent.—A defendant in equity is charged as executrix and as devisee of a decedent: in the caption of her answer, she professes to answer only as executrix; but, in the body of her answer, she in fact answers as devisee: HELD, such answer places her before the court in her character of devisee.

Administrators.—Advances to Estate—Subrogation to Rights of Creditors Satisfied.—Bill by creditors against ex'ors and devisees, to charge their demands on decedent's real estate, the same being charged with debts by his will: on the settlement of the ex'or's accounts, it is found he is largely in advance to the estate, for payments made by him to creditors, beyond the available assets by him received; though there is a much greater amount, due the testator's estate, of debts not desperate: HELD, the ex'or shall rank as a creditor on the real, by substitution in the place of the creditors, whose demands he has satisfied out of his own pocket.

Chancery Practice—Bill to Charge Debts on Realty Devised—Parties.—Upon a bill by certain creditors of a decedent, to charge the debts due them on the debtor's real estate in the hands of his devisees, the court ought always to make an order to call in all creditors, to receive their dividends of the real assets.

This was an appeal from a decree of the superiour court of chancery of Staunton, upon a bill exhibited by the appellees, Harvey & Worth, Baker & Comegys, and John Thompson, merchants of Philadelphia, against the appellants Ann Kinney and Erasmus Stribling, executors of Jacob Kinney deceased, late of Staunton, and the same Ann Kinney with Jacob, Francis and Ann Stribling, his devisees, setting forth, that the plaintiffs in Kinney's lifetime, had placed certain claims they had against one Gideon Morgan, in Kinney's hands for collection, as their attorney at law and agent; which claims, though originally several and distinct, had been blended together by Kinney in the course of his agency, in the same securities obtained by him from the debtor, with the approbation of his clients and principals; and that Kinney, by his conduct in this agency, had incurred a personal liability to them, for large balances, and died without paying the same, or rendering any account:

71 *Shewing, that Kinney, by his will, charged his real estate, in the hands of his devisees, with all his just debts: Praying, therefore, an account of Kinney's transactions in the agency and collection confided to him; an account also of the administration of his personal estate by his executors, and an account of his real estate in the hands of his devisees; and a decree for the balances which should be found due to the plaintiffs, against Kinney's executors, if his personal assets should be sufficient to discharge the same, and if not, that the debts found due them might be charged on the real estate.

The defendants filed a joint answer, the caption of which was thus: "The answer of Ann Kinney and Erasmus Stribling executors of Jacob Kinney deceased, and of Erasmus Stribling as guardian ad litem for his infant children," (meaning Jacob, Francis and Ann Stribling). Mrs. Kinney, the executrix, was the widow and principal devisee of the testator: and though, in the caption of the answer, she professed to answer only in her character of executrix, yet the sequel of the answer related to all the allegations of the bill, and as well to the real as the personal estate. It submitted the question of the court, whether the testator's will, charged his debts on his real estate. It admitted the fact of Kinney's agency for the plaintiffs, as alleged in the bill. And Stribling stated, that he was the sole acting executor; that he had administered all the personal assets of his testator's estate, which had come to his hands, excepting some outstanding claims for monies due the estate, the recovery whereof he had as yet been unable to accomplish; and that the estate was indebted to him in a large balance, for debts paid by him over and above the available assets he had received: and he claimed to be substituted in the place of the creditors, whose claims he had discharged, for satisfaction out of the real estate; in effect, to rank as a creditor on the real estate in proportion to the balance due him on his accounts of administration.

72 *It appeared, that Kinney died in 1812. His will, clearly, charged his real estate with his debts; and, subject to debts, devised it to his wife, part in fee, and part for life with remainder to his grand-children, the defendants, Jacob, Francis and Ann Stribling. The executors qualified in April 1812.

The accounts prayed in the bill having been directed by the chancellor, were taken and reported by a commissioner. 1. Of the accounts between Kinney's estate and Harvey & Worth, Baker & Comegys, and Thompson, respectively, the commissioner made several statements, founded on different principles, and shewing different results: those stated on the principle which was approved by the chancellor, shewed balances due from Kinney's estate to the plaintiffs, amounting, in the aggregate, principal and interest computed to the date of the decree, exclusive of five per cent. commission allowed Kinney for collection, to about 8533 dollars. 2. The commissioner reported an account of the executor Stribling's administration of Kinney's estate; shewing a balance due to that executor of about 4684 dollars, with interest from December 1819, for monies advanced by him, in payment of his testator's debts, beyond the amount of available assets that had come to his hands. 3. An account of the outstanding debts due to Kinney's estate, which the executor represented as separate, amounting, principal and interest computed to December 1819, to about 2497 dollars; and of other outstanding debts due to the estate, which, though somewhat doubtful, might ultimately be recovered, amounting, principal and interest, to about 8641 dollars; total amount of outstanding debts 11138 dollars. And 4. An account of the real estate left by Kinney, and devised by his will, estimated at about 9275 dollars.

The chancellor, upon a hearing, settled the principle upon which the accounts between Kinney's estate and the plaintiffs ought to be adjusted, and declared the balance due to them respectively, amounting, in the aggregate, principal and interest computed to the date of the decree, 73 (as above *mentioned) to about $533 dollars: and considering the personal estate, as being (with regard to these creditors) in effect exhausted, he directed a sale, by the marshal of the court, of so much of the real estate as would be sufficient to discharge the debts, principal and interest, so declared to be due the plaintiffs, and the costs of suit, with orders that the proceeds of the sales should be brought into court. And, without taking any notice of the claim of the executors, to be substituted in the place of the creditors of his testator, whose claims he had satisfied out of his own means, and thus to rank on the real estate in proportion to the balance due him on his account of administration, the chancellor recommended that account to the commissioner, with directions to state and report an account of collections of the outstanding debts due the estate, made by the executor since the former report.

The defendants appealed to this court; where the cause was argued by Johnson, for the appellants, and the Attorney General, for the appellees.

I. The first point discussed, was the principle on which the accounts between Kinney's estate and his clients and principals, ought to be adjusted; as to which this court disapproved the principle of the chancellor's decree; but the point depended on the peculiar facts of the case, and involve no general question of law or equity.

II. The next was a point of practice. Johnson objected to the decree for the sale of the real estate, that all the devisees were not as such convened before the court at the time of the decree; for that, though Mrs. Kinney had joined in the answer with the other defendants, she had only answered in her character of executrix, and was not before the court in her character of devisee.

To this it was answered by the Attorney General, and resolved by the court, that though Mrs. Kinney described herself in the caption of the answer only as executrix, yet as the answer itself was responsive to all the allegations of *the bill, and related to the real as well as the personal estate, she thereby placed herself before the court in the character of devisee as well as executrix.

74 III. Johnson insisted, that the chancellor ought to have substituted the executor Stribling in the place of the creditors whose claims he had satisfied out of his own pocket, and thus let him in to rank on the real estate, in proportion to the balance due him on his account of administration; and, moreover, that the chancellor, instead of providing only for the satisfaction of the debts due to the appellees, out of the real estate, ought to have directed all the unsatisfied creditors of the estate to be called in, that they might participate of the real assets, in just and equal proportions.

The Attorney General answered, that it did not appear, that there were any other unsatisfied creditors, and considering the time which had elapsed since the testator's death, and that no other creditors had appeared to charge the real estate devised, it was almost certain there were none: And that as to the claim of the executor Stribling, there being outstanding debts due the testator's estate, to the amount of 2497 dollars, which the executor admitted to be separate, and other debts to the amount of 8641 dollars which he did not allege to be desperate, it must have been owing to his own negligence, that he had not already collected enough to reimburse the balance of 4684 dollars due him for his advances; and that he ought to be left to look to these outstanding debts as the fund to reimburse the balance due him, since it was hardly possible but that he was justly chargeable with a sum equal to the balance reported to be due to him, either on account of outstanding debts actually collected, or of negligence in regard to those debts. Besides, the chancellor had only ordered the sale of the real estate: he had not disposed of the proceeds; he had ordered them to be brought into court, retaining the power to call in the other unsatisfied creditors, if it should appear proper, and to let in the executor Stribling to rank on the real, if upon the further account of his administration, any balance should appear to be justly due to him.

75 *Johnson replied, that there was no way to ascertain whether there were other unsatisfied creditors, but to call them in, and to give them an opportunity to exhibit their claims. That there was no proof, and indeed no allegation, of any negligence in the executor with respect to the outstanding debts: that he ought, at all events, in the actual state of the case, to be allowed his rateable dividend of the real assets, else that which was the only certain fund, might be exhausted in the satisfaction of the debts due to the appellees; and, hereafter, whatever should be collected out of the outstanding debts, would still be to be accounted for, and applied in due course of administration. That it was true, the chancellor's decree left this point open, or rather passed it by without notice; but, on this appeal from an interlocutory decree, it was the province of this court to settle all the principles of the cause.

PER CURIAM. The decree is erroneous, inasmuch as the real estate sought to be subjected to the demands of the appellees, constitutes an equitable fund, out of which all the creditors of the testator Kinney, are entitled to satisfaction, pari passu; and, among others, the executor Stribling, as standing in the place of the creditors whose claims he has discharged, and appearing to be a creditor to a large amount, unless it shall appear, that since the report of the commissioner, he has been reimbursed in whole or in part, by the receipt of personal assets of his testator. And opportunity should have been given to all the other creditors of the testator, coming in and agreeing to bear their proportions of costs, to prove their debts before the commissioner, within a reasonable time prescribed by the chancellor, and to participate equally of the equitable assets.

Decree reversed.

Marriage Settlements*—Setting Aside—Infancy of Wife.

—A deed of marriage settlement is made before marriage, between infant female and her guardian, the intended husband, and trustees; whereby her real estate is settled on her and her children &c. and husband covenants, that he will, when after required, execute any and every further conveyance proper for more effectually settling and assuring the subject to the uses declared by the deed: husband and wife exhibit bill in chancery, praying that this settlement be set aside, on the ground of the infancy of the wife at the time it was executed: and the wife, on a privy examination directed by the chancellor, declares that she had freely and voluntarily joined in the bill: HOLD, whether the infant feme were bound by the deed or not, the husband was bound by his covenant, and equity will not aid him to avoid it; and bill dismissed.

Guardian and Ward—Accounting and Settlement—Overpayment to Ward—Effect—Case at Bar.—S. being second husband of M. and guardian of her infant daughters by first husband; and M. having claim to dower of lands of first husband, descended her infant daughters, over and above provision made for her by first husband's will: S. continually during his wife's life, and after her death, carries the whole profits of the lands descended, to the credit of his wards, and finally settles his accounts, allows them credit for the whole profits, and pays them the balance: one of the wards being married, a bill is filed by her husband and her, praying to open, surcharge and falsify the accounts previously settled; and then S. claims as against them, credit for one third of the profits, accrued during his wife's life, as belonging to her in right of dower: HOLD, that as S. accounted for and paid these profits, with full knowledge of his right, or at least of the facts out of which his right arose, he cannot now recover them back.

Daniel M'Carty, late of Westmoreland, died in the year 1800, having made a will, and leaving his wife Margaret, and two infant daughters, Anne and Elizabeth, him surviving. His will was almost wholly confined to the purpose of making a provision for his wife, out of his real and personal estate, giving her the personal in absolute property, and the real for life. The provision was a large one in proportion to his estate, but it was not expressed to be in lieu of dower. He made no express bequest or devise of the residue of his estate, to his children: but the will was concluded with this limitation: "Should I have no child legitimate, to arrive to lawful age or marry, I give all my property, real and personal, to my said wife Margaret."

77 *The testator's widow obtained administration of his estate with the will annexed, in the county court of Westmoreland. In 1802, she married Richard Stuart, upon whom (of course) the administration devolved, and who was afterwards appointed by the same court, guardian of his two infant step daughters, Anne and Elizabeth M'Carty. Immediately after Stuart's marriage with Mrs. M'Carty, he severed that portion of her first husband's estate, which was specifically devised and bequeathed to her by his will, from the residue thereof, which, thenceforth during his wife's life, and afterwards till the termination of his guardianship, he considered, or at least treated, as the property of his wards, carrying all the profits thereof to their credit.

In 1817, Anne M'Carty intermarried with Henry Lee, she being still an infant: and by deed of marriage settlement, made before the marriage, and dated the 29th March 1817, between her with Stuart her guardian, of the first part, William S. Jett, and M'Kenzie Beverley, trustees, of the second part, and Henry Lee, the intended husband, of the third part, (reciting the intended marriage, and that the settlement was made by the advice and with the approbation of the guardian) the said Anne, in consideration of the intended marriage, and of one dollar paid her by the trustees, conveyed to Jett and Beverley, and to the survivor of them, all the lands and slaves whereof she was seized and possessed in her own right; upon trust, to hold the same to her own use till the marriage; and after the marriage, to the use of the husband and wife during their joint lives; and from and after the death of either, to the use of the survivor for life; and from and after the death of the survivor, to the use of any child or children or descendants of the wife by Lee or any future husband, such descendants to take per stirpes; and in default of such children or descendants, to the use of such person or persons as the wife should, by deed or will, notwithstanding her coverture, direct and appoint; and, in default of such appointment, to the use of such person or persons as should be her heirs, 78 *according to the existing statute of descents in Virginia. And Lee, the intended husband, covenanted with the trustees, that he would at any time after, upon their reasonable request, make and execute, or procure to be made and executed, any and every other deed or conveyance, for the more effectually conveying, assuring and confirming the subject to the trustees, and settling and limiting the same to the uses before expressed. And he covenanted with the trustees, and Stuart, the guardian of his intended wife, that it should be lawful for her notwithstanding her coverture with him, to execute the power of appointment in her vested, by deed or will, as before provided, in favor of any person she should think proper, without any hindrance, denial or molestation from Lee and his heirs, and that he and they would permit her appointment to be carried into effect.

The marriage was, soon after, celebrated. And in the course of the same year (1817), Elizabeth M'Carty made choice of Lee, now her brother-in-law, for her guardian, in the county court of King George: and he was, accordingly, appointed her guardian by that court. In the course of the same year also, commissioners were appointed by the county court of Westmore-

Ex Parte Settlement—Bill to Surcharge—What It Must Specify.—A bill to surcharge and falsify an ex parte settlement must specify the particulars wherein it is supposed to be erroneous. And if the answer to the bill discloses nothing improper in the account, and the complainant exhibits no evidence to sustain his allegations, the bill should be dismissed. Radford v. Fowkes, 85 Va. 846. 8 S. E. Rep. 817, quoting from 4 Min. Inst. (3d Ed.) 1486, and citing, in addition, Wyllie v. Venable, 4 Munf. 369; Lee v. Stuart, 2 Leigh 76; Garrett v. Carr, 3 Leigh 407; Shugart v. Thompson, 10 Leigh 443-4; Corbin v. Mills, 19 Gratt. 406.

But while the plaintiff must specify the items of surcharge and falsification, it is competent for him to show error upon the face of the account. Note to Backhouse v. Jett, 1 Brock. 500, 2 Fed. Cas. 322, case 711.

land, to settle Stuart's accounts of administration of the testator Daniel M'Carty's estate, and of his guardianship of his wards Anne and Elizabeth M'Carty: and in November 1817, the accounts were audited and settled by the commissioners, in the presence of Lee, and then reported to the county court, where they were received without exception, and ordered to be recorded. In these accounts, Stuart credited his wards with all the profits that had accrued on all the estate of their father, except that which was specifically devised and bequeathed by his will to his wife Margaret, afterwards the wife of Stuart. And the accounts shewed a balance of £3627. 13. 2. due to Mrs. Lee, at the time of her marriage, reduced by payments to Lee since the marriage, to £1197. 17. 0.; and a balance due to Elizabeth M'Carty, at the date of the report, of £3479. 13. 10.

Stuart forthwith paid Lee the sum 79 due to himself in "right of his wife; and paid him also, as guardian of Elizabeth, the whole balance due to her: and Lee, in his own right and as guardian of Elizabeth, gave him a complete discharge.

In 1822, Lee and wife exhibited a bill in the superior court of chancery of Fredericksburg, against Stuart (the former guardian of Mrs. Lee and her sister Elizabeth), Elizabeth M'Carty, and Jett and Beverley the trustees; the two principal objects of which, and the only objects which it is necessary to state, were, 1. to open Stuart's accounts settled and reported by the commissioners of the county court in 1817, and to correct, surcharge and falsify them; and 2. to annul and avoid the marriage settlement between Lee and wife, in respect to the real estate thereby conveyed and settled, upon the ground, that it was executed by the wife, the grantor, while she was an infant, and therefore incapable of making any such conveyance or settlement of real estate, even with the concurrence of her guardian, and that, as there was no issue of the marriage, the husband and wife were the only persons in existence, interested in the settlement, and they both desired to have it annulled.

Stuart, in his answer, leaving the question concerning the marriage settlement to the court, denied all the allegations surcharging and falsifying his accounts as settled in 1817, and shewed that the commissioners had committed errors of addition to his prejudice, to the amount of above £700. And he insisted on his part, that these errors of addition should be corrected; and further, that, as the specific bequests and devises, made by Daniel M'Carty to his wife, were not expressed to be in lieu of dower, she was entitled to one third of the residue of his lands and slaves for life, and therefore that he, her second husband, was entitled to one third of the profits thereof during her life; but in the accounts of 1817, he had carried the whole of the profits to the credit of his wards; and now he claimed credit (as against Lee and wife only, not against Elizabeth M'Carty) or his wife's third of the profits of the lands and slaves.

80 *There was no undue influence exercised by Stuart, or any other party, to procure the execution of the marriage settlement: the transaction was perfectly fair in all respects.

The chancellor, on the motion of the plaintiffs, issued a commission to two justices of the peace of the county of Washington in the district of Columbia, where Lee and wife resided, to examine Mrs. Lee, privily and apart from her husband, to explain to her the nature and object of the bill, and to ascertain and certify to the court, whether she had freely and voluntarily, without his persuasion or coercion, consented to join with him in exhibiting the bill to the court, and whether she yet wished not to retract such consent. The justices certified, that they had executed the commission in the manner therein prescribed; and that Mrs. Lee acknowledged to them, that she had freely and voluntarily, without persuasion or coercion of her husband, consented to join with him in exhibiting the bill, and that she had no wish to retract such consent.

The chancellor, nevertheless, upon the hearing, dismissed the bill, so far as the same sought to annul the marriage settlement as to the lands thereby conveyed and settled: and he referred Stuart's account of administration of Daniel M'Carty's estate, and of his guardianship of Anne and Elizabeth M'Carty, settled by the commissioners in 1817, to a commissioner of the court, to be by him stated in regular form, with permission to either party to surcharge and falsify.

Lee and wife appealed from the decree to this court; where the cause was argued by Harrison and Leigh for the appellants, and Stanard for the appellees. The argument turned on two points:

I. It was argued for the appellants, that a deed of marriage settlement of lands, made by an infant grantor, was of no binding effect whatever on the infant. Caruthers v. Caruthers, 4 Bro. C. C. 500; Clough v. Clough, 5 Ves. 717. The consent and approbation of the infant's 81 guardian, and *his joining in the deed, did not help the case, since the powers and trust of a guardian extended not to the execution of any such instrument. And, they said, Mrs. Lee's assent to the exhibition of this bill to annul the deed of marriage settlement as to the real subject, and her concurrence with her husband therein, having been ascertained by a privy examination under a commission issued by the chancellor, with all the solemnity prescribed and required by the law of Virginia, to ascertain the assent of a feme covert to a deed of conveyance, by husband and wife, of the wife's inheritance; that proceeding placed the case in the same situation, to all substantial purposes, as if the coverture had determined, and Mrs. Lee was sui juris, asking the court to annul the settlement.

Stanard, contra, said, the question was not whether the court may not, hereafter, when Mrs. Lee's coverture shall have determined, entertain a bill on her behalf, to set aside this marriage settlement of her real estate, on account of the disability of infancy she lay under at the time she executed it? but, whether the husband and wife, during the coverture, in other words, whether the husband, in the name of his wife, while she remains under a disability equal to that of infancy, shall be entertained to impeach the validity of the settlement, on the mere ground that the wife was disabled by reason of infancy to execute such a deed? And, he maintained, there was no reason, and no authority, to support such a bill as this; for if the wife was disabled by infancy to execute the settlement, she was equally disabled by coverture to annul or avoid it; and whether the settlement were binding on the wife or not, the covenants contained in it were binding on the husband. The bill was, in effect, an application to the court, to discharge the husband from the obligation of his own covenants contained in the deed.

II. Stanard contended for the appellee, that the property devised and bequeathed by the will of Daniel M'Carty to his wife (afterwards the wife of Stuart) not being declared to be in lieu of dower, the 82 wife had not only a right under *the will to the property so devised and bequeathed to her, but to her dower of the residue of the testator's lands; that, consequently, her second husband, Stuart, had a right to one third of the rents of the residue.

It was answered, that admitting the specific and ample provision made by the will of M'Carty for his wife, did not bar her claim to dower of the residue of his lands, still Stuart could not now maintain his claim to the profits of the dower, accrued during his wife's life. For, with full knowledge of all the facts on which his claim to one third of the profits rested, he had carried the whole profits to the credit of his wards, and had not only accounted for but had actually paid them the amount. If he was then aware of the legal right to one third of these profits which he now asserts, he abandoned it by design, and voluntarily paid the money to his wards. If he was not aware of this legal right, yet he was aware of all the facts out of which the right arose; he paid the money to his wards, through a mistake, not of the facts, but of the law; and he was not entitled to recover it back. Brisbane v. Dacres, 5 Taunt. 144; 1 Com. Law Rep. 43, where all the cases on this point are collected.

GREEN, J., delivered the opinion of the court. The objections alleged in the bill against Stuart's guardian's and administration account, are wholly unfounded. It is not surcharged or falsified as to a single item: there is, perhaps, error in it prejudicial to Elizabeth M'Carty, which she does not complain of, and a trivial error in the computation of interest prejudicial to Stuart: but there are no errors prejudicial to Lee and wife. According to the settled doctrine of this court, they have no right to open the account. But there is, on the face of the accounts, an error in addition, prejudicial to Stuart, to the amount of £700 or £800, which ought to be corrected; and there is a library belonging to M'Carty's estate, which is yet to be accounted for to his distributees; and the case should the purpose of correcting the error in addition, and having an account of the library.

There is no shadow of ground, upon which a court of equity can set aside or declare the marriage settlement void, or lend its aid to assist the appellants in attaining their object in this respect. Lee was a party to the deed, and is bound by it; and no fraud or imposition on him being suggested, no court can, under any pretence, relieve him from the obligation of it. He covenanted with the trustees, to execute any further conveyance, and otherwise to give full effect to the provisions of the settlement. The object of the present proceeding is to procure the aid of the court to enable him to violate that covenant. For the only purpose and effect of setting aside the deed of settlement, would be to enable his wife to dispose of the property for his benefit, or according to his pleasure; since she could make no disposition of it without his concurrence. So far from a court of equity assisting him to frustrate the settlement, it ought to interfere, if necessary, to prevent him from assisting her in defeating it. Durnford v. Lane, 1 Bro. C. C. 106; Milner v. Harewood, 18 Ves. 279.

Nor can Stuart reclaim the proportions of the rents of the real estate of M'Carty, which he has passed to the credit of his wards, accounted for and paid, and which he now claims on account of his wife's right to dower. If she ever had such a right, the legal title is gone by her death, and nothing could be claimed at law on that account; the third of the rents and profits accruing during her life could only have been claimed after her death, in a court of equity. And Stuart, with a knowledge of this equity if it existed, or at least of all the facts upon which it arose, has deliberately abandoned it by his own acts.

Decree reversed, and corrected, but at the costs of the appellants, the appellees being the parties substantially prevailing.

Fraudulent Conveyances—Impeachment by Creditor at Large. *—A creditor at large, not having obtained judgment or decree against his debtor, cannot resort to equity to set aside a fraudulent conveyance of his debtor, though interference of the court be also prayed to prevent a sale or removal

Fraudulent Conveyances—Impeachment by Creditors at Large.—In Wallace v. Treake, 27 Gratt. 486, it is said: "Previous to this enactment (Code 1849, ch. 179, § 2, p. 677; Code 1860, ch. 179, § 2; Code 1867, § 2460; Pol. Suppl. § 2460; Code W. Va. 1869, ch. 153, § 2, p. 886) it was the settled rule of the courts, that a creditor at large could not resort to a court of equity, to impeach any conveyance made by his debtor, on the ground of fraud. If real estate was the subject of the conveyance, a judgment was regarded as sufficient. If goods and chattels or any equitable interest therein, although incapable of being levied on, were embraced in the conveyance, the creditor was required to take out execution and have it levied or returned, so as to show that his remedy at law had failed. Chamberlayne v. Temple, 2 Rand. 384; Kelso v. Blackburn, 3 Leigh 300; Rhodes v. Cousins, 6 Rand. 189; Tate v. Liggat & Matthews, 2 Leigh 84." To the same effect, see the principal case cited in McAllister v. Guggenheimer, 91 Va. 319, 280, 21 S. E. Rep. 478; Zell Guano Co. v. Heatherly, 38 W. Va. 415, 18 S. E. Rep. 612; foot-note to M'Cullough v. Sommerville, 8 Leigh 415.

Same—Purchase of Equity of Redemption Pending Suit to Set Aside—Priorities.—Delson mortgages property to secure a fair debt due The Farmers' Bank, and a pretended debt to Tate: L. & M. bring a suit in chancery impeaching the security provided by the mortgage for pretended debt to T. as fraudulent: pending this suit, D. mortgages, not the property, but his equity of redemption in it, to S. & Co. fair creditors, to secure a just debt due them: and then L. & M. obtain a decree for their claim against D. HELD, that S. & Co. purchased only what D. could rightfully convey, that is, his equity of redemption, and took, subject not only to the fair debt due The Farmers' Bank, but the pretended debt secured to T. And L. & M. being creditors by decree, and thus having a right to satisfaction in preference to the pretended creditor T. acquired a preference also over the second mortgagees S. & Co. who were postponed by contract to the pretended creditor T.

Mortgage Creditor—Double Character of Creditor and Purchaser.—A creditor at large, procuring a mortgage of his debtor's property, cannot claim monographic note on "Fraudulent and Voluntary Conveyances" (IV. B. 3) appended to Cochran v. Paris, 11 Gratt. 248.

Same—Effect of Conveyance Made Expressly Subject Thereto.—In Claffin v. Foley, 22 W. Va. 434, 442, a debtor executed two deeds of trust to secure creditors on the same property. The second deed was expressly made "subject to the rights of the creditors secured" by the first deed. It was held that, by their contract, the creditors secured in the second deed acquired simply the equity of redemption in the property therein conveyed, and that, although the first deed was fraudulent on its face and the creditors therein named were not entitled to its benefits, yet as the trustee and creditors in the second deed expressly excepted the amount secured in the first deed from their security, they were by their contract precluded from taking any benefit therefrom under the trust deed to them: that, the first deed being fraudulent on its face, the law conclusively presumed that the creditors in the second deed knew that fact when they took their deed, and that it was their intention to except the amounts secured in the first deed for the benefit of any persons who should in law show themselves entitled thereto. For this holding the principal case is cited as authority. See the principal case also cited in Schuapp v. Hukill, 84 W. Va. 382, 12 S. E. Rep. 504, where a lease was executed subject to a preceding lease of the same property.

Deed of Trust Creditor—Right to Plead Usury in Previous Deed.—Where a creditor is secured by a second deed of trust on the same property, he has but the equity of redemption, and cannot plead usury against a creditor secured under the first trust deed. Lee v. Feamster, 21 W. Va. 114, citing the principal case. On the subject of usury, see generally, monographic note on "Usury" appended to Coffman v. Miller, 26 Gratt. 698.

Same—Double Character of Purchaser and Creditor.—In Watts v. Kinney, 3 Leigh 272, 284, 292, 297, a judgment was recovered against a principal and his sureties. The sureties discharged the judgment and took a deed of trust from the principal debtor for the amount of the judgment. It was argued that by the taking of a deed of trust, the sureties changed their character of creditors into the less advantageous character of purchasers, and the principal case was cited to uphold this argument. But TUCKER, P., who delivered the opinion of the court said: "As to the position, that by taking the deed of trust, the sureties put off their character of creditors and assumed that of purchasers, I cannot understand that the opinion in Tate v. Liggat, referred to designed to go so far as to say, that a creditor by judgment, who takes a mere collateral security for the payment of his debt, thereby loses entirely the benefit of his judgment lien; and unless the principle be extended thus far, it can have no influence upon this case. Be this as it may, I understand that the principle is not considered as settled by that case. I am of opinion, therefore, that there is no validity in this objection."

And, in Runkle v. Runkle, 98 Va. 665, 666, 37 S. E. Rep. 276, a debtor conveyed to a trustee certain real and personal property to secure three classes of creditors. One of the creditors secured in the third class, while claiming under the deed, assailed the validity of other debts secured in the same deed. It was contended that a creditor, while asserting his rights as a beneficiary under a deed of trust given by his debtor to secure him and others, could not at the same time, attack the validity of another debt secured in the same deed: that the rights of a beneficiary under a deed of trust to secure debts as a creditor, or in the double character of creditor and purchaser, but only as purchaser.

Fraudulent Conveyances—Effect on Subsequent Purchaser with Notice.—And per GREEN, J. if A. make a fraudulent conveyance of personal property to B. and then make a conveyance for valuable consideration to C. who has full notice of the previous fraudulent conveyance, the statute of frauds and perjuries does not apply to protect such a subsequent purchaser against the previous fraudulent conveyance, nor upon the principles of the common law can he claim against the previous fraudulent conveyance whereof he had notice when he purchased.

Appeal—Parties Standing on Distinct Grounds—Effect.—Suit in chancery against A. and B. Decree against A. for debt, and against B. declaring a

are not the rights of creditors, but of purchasers, and that, when the creditor accepts the benefit of a trust deed, given by his debtor to secure the payment of his debt, he thereby voluntarily lays down and surrenders all his rights as creditor, and takes in lieu of them his rights as purchaser. But the court held that the attitude of purchaser did not impair his right as creditor to assail other debts in the deed of trust as fraudulent or otherwise void. In delivering the opinion of the court, JUDGE HARRISON said: "It is true that the Virginia decisions speak of creditors as purchasers, and for many purposes, they are so treated. Generally, the question is whether they are affected with notice of the fraud alleged, or their rights are affected by prior equities, but we have never understood that this doctrine had gone to the extent of holding that, where a creditor took a deed of trust to secure his debt, it changed his character of creditor into the less advantageous attitude of purchaser. This theory is not consistent with the course of the Virginia decisions. It seems to find some countenance in Tate v. Liggat, 2 Leigh 84, though it is not clear that the question was necessarily involved in that case. However that may be, the view therein expressed was emphatically discountenanced by JUDGE TUCKER in Watts v. Kinney, 3 Leigh 298, wherein he speaks of it 'as an argument which rests upon a supposed decision of this court in Tate v. Liggat;' and again, referring to the same subject, says, 'the principle is not settled by that case.' At all events, that principle does not appear to have been followed by any subsequent case. On the contrary, the uniform practice in Virginia, as shown by the decisions, has been an unquestioned recognition of the right of one creditor in a deed of trust to attack and have eliminated any debt thereby secured which could be shown to be fraudulent or void."

But in Cox v. Wayt, 26 W. Va. 807, 817, a debtor conveyed certain real estate to a trustee to secure a certain creditor, which deed was never recorded. Later, the same debtor conveyed the same property in trust to secure other creditors, three of whom had notice of the unrecorded deed above mentioned. It was held that the three creditors secured in the second deed having notice of the existence of the prior unrecorded deed were purchasers with notice, and were bound by the unrecorded deed in the same manner as if it had been duly recorded; but that the other creditors secured in the second deed were subsequent purchasers for valuable consideration without notice and that therefore the unrecorded deed was void as to them. JUDGE WOODS, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "It is well settled that a creditor obtaining a mortgage or deed of trust upon the property of his debtor, must claim the same as a purchaser, and cannot claim it in the double character of creditor and purchaser." 2 Leigh 84. In asserting this principle, JUDGE LOMAX says: "In regard to purchasers it would seem reasonable also, that purchasers, within the act relating to registration of conveyances, should be understood to mean the same description, as purchasers within the act relating to fraudulent conveyances. And as under the latter, creditors acquiring in any way, a lien upon their debtor's property by contract with him, are regarded as purchasers, they would be, in like manner regarded under the former." 2 LOMAX Dig. 489; Tate v. Liggat, 2 Leigh 104; Evans v. Greenhow, 15 Gratt. 153; Bird v. Wilkinson, 4 Leigh 266; Beck v. De Baptists, Ird. 349; McClanahan v. Siter, 2 Gratt. 309."

Same—Purchasers.—To the point that a creditor taking a deed of trust on real estate to secure his debt is a purchaser within the purview of the act relating to registration of conveyances, the principal case was cited in Johnston v. Slater, 11 Gratt. 325, 326; Weinberg v. Rempe, 15 W. Va. 858. See also, foot-note to Evans v. Greenhow, 15 Gratt. 153.

Appeal—Parties Standing on Distinct Grounds—Parties Standing on Same Ground—Effect.—When parties stand upon distinct and unconnected conveyance by A. to him fraudulent as against plaintiffs; ca. sa. issued on decree against A. for the debt, and executed; then B. appealed from the decree so far as it affected him; and the court reverses the decree so far as it affected B. but HOLD, that it could not reverse the decree against A. who had not appealed, though the court of chancery had no jurisdiction to make the decree against him.

Charles Deison, by deed dated the 13th May 1820, and duly recorded, conveyed to Garland Tate and David G. Murrell, a tract of 104 acres of land in the county of Campbell, five slaves, and all his stock of horses &c. plantation utensils, and household and kitchen furniture, in trust, 85 *to secure debts due by him to the Farmers' Bank of Virginia at Lynchburg, upon notes indorsed by Whitlocke and Richardson, and discounted by the bank, for his accommodation, to the amount of 2080 dollars, and another debt of 5000 dollars to Edmund Tate (Deison's father-in-law); with power to the trustees to sell the subject at the request of the creditors or either of them, selling the slaves and other personal subject before the real; and to apply the proceeds, first to the payment of the debt due to the bank, and then to the debt due to Tate.

And by another deed, dated the 13th November 1820, and duly recorded, Deison conveyed the same subject, with the moiety of a carriage and harness held by him in common with Edmund Tate, in trust to indemnify Whitlocke and Richardson, his indorsers at the Farmers' Bank, and to secure Tate the debt of 5000 dollars due to him, as mentioned in the former deed, with like provisions as those contained in the former deed, as to the sale of the subject, and the preference of the bank debt.

The trustees advertised the subject for sale on the 24th July 1821, under the first deed of trust. But on the 24th May 1821, Deison executed his bond to Liggit & Matthews, for 1200 dollars payable on demand. And, immediately, on the same day, Liggit & Matthews exhibited a bill in the superior court of chancery of Lynchburg, against Deison, Edmund Tate, and G. Tate and D. G. Murrell the trustees; setting forth their claim against Deison upon his bond for 1200 dollars just executed to them; alleging, that the deed of trust, so far as it secured the debt of 5000 dollars to Edmund Tate, was fraudulent as against Deison's creditors; that no such debts, and indeed no debt of any considerable amount, was due from Deison to Tate; and that the deed was a contrivance of Deison and Tate, to defraud Deison's just creditors; praying, therefore, that the trustees should be in-grounds, where their rights are separate and not equally affected by the same decree or judgment, then the appeal of one will not bring up for adjudication the rights or claims of the other: but where the parties appealing, and the parties not appealing, stand upon the same ground, and their rights are involved in the same question, and equally affected by the same decree or judgment, the appellate court will consider the whole case, and settle the rights of the parties not appealing, as well as those who bring up their cases by appeal. To this effect the principal case was decided with approval in Walker v. Page, 31 Gratt. 652, 653 (see also, foot-note to this case); Saunders v. Griggs, 81 Va. 517; Morgan v. Ohio River R. Co. 39 W. Va. 25, 19 S. E. Rep. 591; foot-note to Purcell v. McCleary, 10 Gratt. 248; Garrett v. Carr, 3 Leigh 418; Blackwell v. Bragg, 78 Va. 541. See also, Lenow v. Lenow, 8 Gratt. 349, and foot-note.

joined from proceeding to sell more of the trust subject than would suffice to satisfy the debt due to the bank; that the deed 86 might be declared fraudulent *and void as to the plaintiffs, so far as it secured the debt of 5000 dollars to Tate; and that the trust subject might be sold to satisfy the debt of 1200 dollars due to them.

The injunction was awarded.

Deison and Edmund Tate, in their answers, respectively, averred that the debt of 5000 dollars secured by the deeds of trust, was really and bona fide due to Tate, and that the deeds were in all respects fair. The trustees in their answer, disclaimed all knowledge on the subject, except that they had consented to act as trustees, and had at the request of Whitlocke (one of Deison's indorsers at bank) advertised the trust subject for sale. These answers were all sworn to before John M. Settle, an alderman of the town of Lynchburg; that of Edmund Tate on the 20th September, that of the two trustees on the 6th October, and that of Deison on the 8th October 1821.

And on the very day on which Deison's answer was sworn to before Settle as alderman, Settle filed in this cause (as Liggit & Matthews alleged) certain articles of agreement, bearing date the 9th July 1821, between Deison, Edmund Tate, and the same Settle; whereby, after referring to the two deeds of trust of the 13th May and 13th November 1820, and reciting that it was the intent of the parties to pay a debt of 2093 dollars, which Deison owed to J. M. Settle & Co. out of the profits of the trust subject in those deeds of trust comprised, Deison conveyed and transferred to Settle, all his interest in the same trust subject, real and personal; and Tate agreed, that the proceeds of the real part of the trust subject, that should be coming to him after satisfying the bank debts therein mentioned, should be placed in Settle's hands, to be by him used, with the assistance and agency of Deison, till, from the profits thereof, the debt of 2093 dollars, with interest, due J. M. Settle & Co. should be paid; and Tate thereby directed the trustees to pay Settle the surplus of the proceeds of the sales of the real subject, which the deeds of trust destined to him, according 87 to this agreement; and Settle relinquished to Tate, all right in *the property and the proceeds thereof, so soon as the debt of 2093 dollars should be discharged.

After the above articles of agreement were executed, Settle obtained a deed from Deison, dated the 10th October 1821, and duly recorded, whereby Deison conveyed to R. C. Haden and J. M. Reynolds, all Deison's right, title and interest in the trust subject, real and personal, comprised in the two deeds of trust of May and November 1820, in trust to secure to J. M. Settle & Co. the debt of 2093 dollars mentioned in the articles of agreement.

Meantime, the suit of Liggit & Matthews against Deison, Tate and the trustees, to annul the two deeds of trust of May and November 1820, was in full prosecution; and a volume of depositions was taken on each side, touching the fraud imputed to Deison and Tate in that transaction.

At the hearing, in November 1823, the chancellor was of opinion, that the debt mentioned in the two deeds of trust as due to Tate, was simulated, and that therefore those deeds so far as they pretended to secure the debt to Tate, were fraudulent; and though he disclaimed jurisdiction to charge the debt due Liggat & Matthews on the trust subject, and dissolved the injunction he had awarded to inhibit the trustees from proceeding to sell it, he nevertheless declared the deeds of trust, so far as they pretended to secure the debt to Tate, fraudulent and void, as to Liggat & Matthews; and he gave them a decree against Deison personally, for the debt of 1200 dollars with interest claimed in the bill, and against Deison and Tate, jointly, for the costs of suit.

Upon this decree, Liggat & Matthews sued out a capias ad satisfaciendum against Deison. He was arrested on that process in December 1823, made a general surrender of his effects, and was discharged as an insolvent debtor. At this time, however, he held only four of the slaves, and the stock of horses &c. comprised in the two deeds of trust of May and November 1870. For Whitlocke, his indorser at bank, (as to whom the deeds were, on all hands, acknowledged to be fair), having paid 88 the debt to the bank, had obtained *a decree subjecting the trust subject to sale for his indemnification; under which the tract of 104 acres of land, one of the slaves, and Deison's interest in the carriage and harness had been sold, and the proceeds applied to reimburse Whitlocke. The other part of the trust subject, namely, four of the slaves and their increase, and the stock of horses &c. which were in Deison's hands when he surrendered his effects and took the oath of insolvency, remained (for aught that appeared) in his possession to this day.

After the ca. sa. had been executed on Deison, and he had been discharged as an insolvent, Edmund Tate applied to this court for an appeal from the decree of the 1st November 1823; which was allowed, upon his giving security for costs. Deison never appealed from the decree.

And after the appeal, pending the case in this court, namely the first mentioned suit of Tate v. Liggat & Matthews, the second suit of Liggat & Matthews v. Morgan and others was commenced. The bill in the second suit, was exhibited by Liggat & Matthews against William Morgan, the surviving partner of J. M. Settle & Co. (Settle being now dead), Deison, Edmund Tate and Haden and Reynolds, the trustees named in Deison's deed of October 1821; wherein, after recapitulating the proceedings in their first suit against Deison, Tate and others, the chancellor's decree therein, the ca. sa. sued out therein against Deison and executed on him, his surrender of his effects and discharge as an insolvent, the pendency of the appeal taken by Tate from the decree, and Deison's acquiescence in it, and the sale of the land &c. to indemnify Whitlocke,—they set forth the articles of agreement of July 1821, between Deison, Settle, and Edmund Tate, and Deison's deed of trust to Haden and Reynolds of October 1821, to secure the debt of 2093 dollars due to J. M. Settle & Co. And they charged, that these two instruments were obtained by Settle, with full notice of Liggat & Matthew's former suit, and of all the allegations of fraud contained in their bill in that suit, and by combination with Deison, to delay, hinder and defeat 89 *Liggat & Matthews of their just claim against Deison; that Settle & Co. acquired no rights by those instruments, that could stand in the way of Liggat & Matthews's claim and proceedings; that their ca. sa. executed on Deison, and his surrender of his effects on taking the oath of insolvency, vested all the trust subject, comprised in the deeds of trust of May and November 1820 (except what had been sold to satisfy Whitlocke) in the marshal of the court for their benefit; that Deison, however, still had possession of the remaining subject, namely, four slaves and their increase, and the stock of horses &c.; that he was an improper depository of the property; and that Morgan, the surviving partner of Settle & Co. was making efforts to have it sold to satisfy the debt due him. Wherefore, the bill prayed an injunction to restrain Morgan, and his trustees Haden and Reynolds, from selling the subject under the deed of trust of October 1821; that that deed, and the articles of agreement of July 1821, might be declared fraudulent and void as against Liggat & Matthews; and that the trust subject then remaining in Deison's hands, might be forthwith ordered into the hands of the marshal, unless security should be given for the forthcoming thereof to answer the decree of the court.

An injunction was awarded against Morgan and his trustees, according to the prayer of the bill.

The defendant Morgan alone put in an answer, which was not explicit as to the charge, that Settle, at the time he procured from Deison and Tate the articles of agreement of July, and from Deison the deed of trust of October 1821, had notice of the proceedings of Liggat & Matthews in their first suit; but he insisted, that, admitting Settle had such notice at the time of the execution of the deed of trust of October 1821, that deed gave Settle & Co. a lien on the subject preferable to any claim of Liggat & Matthews to have satisfaction out of it: there was no fraud designed or practised, no collusion between Settle and Deison or Tate, no effort to favour either; the debt of 2093 dollars was bona 90 vide* due from Deison to Settle & Co. and the agreement of July and the deed of trust of October 1821, were expedients, and honest and fair expedients, to secure the debt.

The only evidence in this case was documentary, namely, the record of the proceedings in the first suit, and the articles of agreement of July, and the deed of trust of October 1821, brought in question in this suit.

On the motion of Morgan, the chancellor dissolved the injunction he had awarded to restrain Morgan, and his trustees Haden and Reynolds, from proceeding to sell the trust subject to satisfy the debt due Settle & Co. And from this order Liggat & Matthews appealed.

In this court the two causes were heard together. The first, Tate v. Liggat & Matthews, was argued by Leigh for the appellant, and Johnson for the appellees: the other, Liggat & Matthews v. Morgan and others, by Johnson for the appellants, and Stanard for the appellees.

I. In the first case, Leigh said, that the question, whether the deeds of trust of May and November 1820, were fraudulent in respect to the security they provided for the debt therein stated to be due to Tate, was a mere question of fact which he should submit to the court upon the evidence, if indeed, the court should think it examinable in this cause. But, in truth, there was a fatal objection to the whole proceeding. Liggat & Matthews were only bond creditors; creditors, who had acquired no lien whatever on the property of their debtor, Deison; who had been no wise hindered of their recovery of the debt due them, by the conveyances they complained of and sought to avoid, since they had instituted no proceeding to encounter the obstruction presented by those conveyances. Now, he said, equity never entertains a bill on behalf of a creditor, to impeach a conveyance of land by the debtor, on the ground of fraud, till the creditor has prosecuted his demand to judgment, which binds the land; or to impeach a conveyance by the debtor

91 *has recovered judgment and delivered execution, whereby the debtor's personality is bound: and, even then, equity only interferes to remove the fraudulent conveyance out of the way. He cited Angell v. Draper, 1 Vern. 399; Balch v. Wastall, 1 P. Wms. 445; Bennet v. Musgrove, 2 Ves. sen. 51; Shirley v. Watts, 3 Atk. 200; Higgins v. York Buildings Co., 2 Atk. 107; Colman v. Croker, 1 Ves. jun. 160; Wiggins v. Armstrong, 2 Johns. Ch. Rep. 144; Hendricks v. Robinson, Id. 296; Brinkerhoff v. Brown, 4 Id. 671; Chamberlayne v. Temple, 2 Rand. 384; Rhodes v. Cousins, 6 Id. 188. And he concluded, that the court had no jurisdiction to entertain this bill, either to decree the debt against Deison, or against Tate to declare the conveyances void, and set them aside.

Johnson admitted, that the general principle stated by Leigh, was sustained by the current both of english and american authorities. But, he said, the rule was not without exceptions; and instanced Smithier v. Lewis, 1 Vern. 398; Stileman v. Ashdown, Amb. 13, and Chamberlayne v. Temple, in this court; wherein, it would be found, the creditors were relieved against conveyances of their debtors, without having exhausted their remedies at law. And he contended, that every case, in which a creditor was under the necessity of resorting to equity to prevent the sale of the property of his debtor justly liable to satisfy the creditor's claim, under a fraudulent and void authority, or the dispersion, removal or eloinment of it, or to subject to his demand equitable interests that cannot be taken in execution, and can only be reached by the court of chancery, ought to be admitted as an exception. And such was this case: the creditors were compelled to resort to the chancellor to prevent the sale of the property of their debtor, which was justly liable to satisfy their demand, and was yet about to be disposed of under the fraudulent deeds of trust. There was no other remedy for them, that would accomplish the ends of justice.

The statute of frauds and perjuries avoids fraudulent conveyances as against all persons, whose just demands "shall 92 *or might be disturbed, hindered, delayed or defrauded." 1 Rev. Code, ch. 101, § 2, p. 372. He asked, whether a bond creditor was not exposed to the mischief? and therefore, a person entitled to avail himself of the statutory provision intended to prevent it?

He said, the reason of the english cases on the subject, had never been clearly announced: but they appear to have proceeded on reasons of policy and convenience affecting the remedy, not the right: they were much influenced by the consideration, that the main object of equitable interference in such cases, was to remove obstructions to the remedy at law, out of the way; and, as the english chancery could not award execution for debt decreed, any remedy which it could administer, must be incomplete till judgment had been recovered at law. Higgins v. York Buildings Co., 2 Atk. 107. The court of chancery of New York, where, as in Virginia, there is a statutory provision giving execution on decrees in chancery, in like manner as on judgments at law, had followed the english cases, without considering the influence which that provision ought to have on the point. And he endeavoured to maintain, that this provision authorising the award of executions on decrees in chancery, dictated the propriety of entertaining a bill in our courts of chancery, on behalf of any creditor, at one and the same time to ascertain and decree the debt due him, award execution for it, and remove fraudulent conveyances out of the way of the decree and execution.

II. In the other case of Liggat & Matthews v. Morgan and others; Johnson premised, 1. that at the time of exhibiting this bill, Liggat & Matthews had obtained a decree against Deison for the debt due them, and had sued out a ca. sa. thereon, upon which Deison had been arrested, and had taken the oath of insolvency and surrendered his effects; so that now, clearly, the creditors had a lien on the property of the debtor, which was justly liable to satisfy their demand: and 2. that the deeds of trust of May and November 1820, appeared 93 *fraudulent in fact, so far as they provided a security for Tate; there was no such debt due.

And then he contended, that Morgan, the surviving partner of Settle & Co. could claim nothing under the articles of agreement of July 1821, between Deison, Tate and Settle, providing for the security of the debt of 2093 dollars due Settle & Co. The motives and design of that agreement were apparent on the face of the transaction. The instrument was a transfer to Settle & Co. of Deison's equity of redemption of the subject pledged by the deeds of trust of May and November 1820, and of the security thereby given to Tate, for the debt of 5000 dollars pretended to be due him; a transfer of Tate's lien, pending the suit of Liggat & Matthews, in which it was impugned as fraudulent; such a transfer of a security for debt, as no creditor not conscious of its fraudulency would ever have made; which was intended to secure a consideration to Settle & Co. for forbearing themselves to contest the fairness of Tate's claim; to defeat Liggat & Matthews, by interposing the claim of Settle & Co. and to preserve Tate's claim to satisfaction out of the subject, though it was postponed to a distant day. The agreement was not only a pendente lite transaction, but it was a combination between Deison, Tate and Settle, wherein the fraudulent intentions of the two former must have been perfectly apparent to the latter; who, lending himself to the accomplishment of their fraud, in consideration of the advantage they agreed to let him derive from it, was a party to the fraud. It was wholly immaterial, that the debt due to Settle & Co. was a real and just debt: they could not, on that account, hold an advantage obtained by a fraudulent combination with others against a just creditor. Sands v. Codwise, 4 Johns. Rep. 536; Garland v. Rives, 4 Rand. 282; Wright v. Hancock, 3 Munf. 521. Neither could the deed of trust of October 1821, whereby Deison conveyed to Haden and Reynolds, his equity of redemption of the subject mortgaged by his two 94 former deeds *of May and November 1820, as a security for the debt due to Settle & Co. avail them, as against Liggat & Matthews. Settle & Co. could not claim as creditors, or in the combined characters of creditors and purchasers: they could only claim as purchasers; as purchasers, namely, of Deison's equity of redemption under the deeds of May and November 1820. Those deeds, though void as against just creditors, in respect to the security they provided for the pretended debt to Tate, were good between the parties. They were binding on Deison. And, as he could not claim any thing by virtue of his equity of redemption, so neither could Settle & Co. his assignees thereof, claim any thing, till the debt secured to Tate, as well as that due to the bank, should be satisfied out of the trust subject. Settle & Co. could not, any more than Deison, contest the fairness of Tate's claim. Claiming under the same deeds under which Tate claimed, standing as Deison's assignees in his place, and claiming only his rights, they recognised and admitted Tate's rights; they took in subordination to them; they were postponed to him. Now, as Liggat & Matthews have obtained the preference to Tate, by establishing the fraudulency of his claims, they of necessity have the preference to Settle & Co. who can only claim after Tate.

He insisted, that, in the case of a conveyance tainted with actual covin however gross, or of a voluntary conveyance by a person overwhelmed with debt, if the grantor afterwards conveyed the same subject to a purchaser for valuable consideration having notice of the previous conveyance, and of the voluntary character of it in the one instance, or of the actual covin in the other, such a subsequent purchaser cannot prevail against the voluntary or fraudulent grantee. How was such a subsequent purchaser defrauded and deceived by the previous conveyance. His intromission was wilful. To allow it, would be to enable a fraudulent grantor to relieve himself from the consequences of his fraud, by the assistance of another person conscious of the fraud. The grantor bound by his previous conveyance however covinous, 95 *could, by no act of his own, relieve himself from it; but if he might be allowed to go to another person apprised of the fraud, sell the subject to him, and pocket the price, the purchaser would thus effectually relieve him from the obligation of his previous conveyance. And if pending the suit of a creditor against a fraudulent grantor and his grantees, to impeach and avoid the fraudulent conveyance, the grantor might sell the subject to a purchaser charged with full notice, and such a transaction should be upheld; what would this be, but to enable the grantor to convert a visible, fixed, tangible subject, into money, which may be easily withdrawn from the creditor's pursuit? in effect, to enable the subsequent purchaser by combination with the fraudulent grantor, to defeat, in most cases intirely, and in all cases to delay, the creditor?

In the present case, he concluded, Settle & Co. purchased the equity of redemption of Deison, with full notice of Liggat & Matthews's suit against Deison and Tate, and with a view to defeat them in the recovery of their just demands, by appropriating the subject in controversy to themselves; which consideration alone sufficed to condemn their pretensions.

Stanard for the appellees, represented that Settle & Co. were acknowledged fair creditors of Deison, as well as Liggat & Matthews: both parties were endeavouring as justly they might, to obtain satisfaction of their demands; the one by a suit in equity prematurely brought before they had a right to ask relief there; the other by diligence exerted out of doors. Whether the motive or the end was regarded, both were alike blameless; and the question was, whether the means they respectively resorted to, were not equally fair and legal? If so, Settle & Co. whose equity was prior in time, had gained a fair preference.

As to the articles of agreement of July 1821, whereby Settle took a qualified assignment of the security provided for Tate by the deeds of trust of May and November 1820, *as a security for Deison's debt to Settle & Co. he said, there was no proof, and no ground to suspect, that Settle had, at the time, any notice of the fraudulency of the deeds of trust in respect to Tate's debt, or of the pending suit of Liggat & Matthews, impugning those deeds as fraudulent in that respect. The fair inference from the circumstances attending that transaction, was no more than this: that Settle & Co. being just creditors of Deison, and finding Deison's visible effects mortgaged to secure a debt due to the Farmers' Bank, and another to Tate his father-in-law; Settle, or Settle and Deison uniting, prevailed with the father-in-law to give Settle & Co. the benefit of his security pro tanto. If Deison and Tate had been guilty of fraudulent conduct, or were actuated by fraudulent designs, there was nothing in the transaction to justify the imputation to Settle, of knowledge of their fraud, or confederacy with them in it.

The suit of Liggit & Matthews against Deison and Tate, viewed as a lis pendens affecting the subject in controversy, could have no influence on Settle & Co.'s case. For that was a suit, which the chancellor could not properly entertain, and in which he could never make any decree that could bind the subject in dispute.

Then with regard to Deison's deed of October 1821, whereby Deison conveyed to Haden and Reynolds, the equity of redemption of the subject mortgaged by his previous deeds of May and November 1820, as a security for his debt to Settle & Co.; he said, it was apparent, that Settle, before whom, as an alderman, the answers of Deison and Tate to Liggit & Matthews's first bill, had just been sworn to, had thereby been put upon inquiry, and had been informed of the fraudulency of the deeds of May and November 1820, with respect to the security they provided for Tate, whereof he had obtained an assignment by the agreement of July preceding; and apprehending that Tate's security of which he had obtained the assignment, was vitiated by fraud, and therefore worthless, he procured of Deison this deed of October 1821, mortgaging his equity of redemption *of the subject, to secure the debt due to Settle & Co. Fraudulent in fact this transaction could not be, unless diligence in a creditor to secure his just demand, in preference to other just creditors, be a fraud; which could not be pretended.

The obvious intent of this transaction, was to prefer Settle & Co.'s claim to satisfaction out of the trust subject, before Tate, if Tate's claim should be set aside as fraudulent. But it was now contended, that whether Tate's claim were fraudulent or not, Settle had notice of it; Settle & Co. took in subordination to it; they could not contest its fairness or validity. Settle had notice, certainly, of the deeds mortgaging the subject to Tate, but he had notice at the same time that those deeds, in respect to Tate, were fraudulent and void: could Settle's notice of a covinous and void conveyance, purify and make it good and valid? Suppose the same subject mortgaged to several creditors in succession, by different instruments, and the youngest mortgagee, at the time he accepted the security, apprised of the existence of all the previous mortgages, and of the fraudulency of some of them, must he when he comes to redeem, pay off every debt charged upon the subject by the previous mortgages, not only those fairly due and secured in good faith, but such as were feigned and secured with fraudulent views? Or, if there be a deed of trust securing the payment of several debts due several creditors in succession, must he who has been postponed to another, either relinquish the security altogether, or consent that the debt preferred to his own shall be paid, though that debt be simulated, and the security as to it fraudulent? and this for the strange reason, that he knew that the security was in that respect fraudulent and void, and therefore paid no regard to it. The argument for the appellants must go the length of maintaining the affirmative of these and all such questions.

He referred to the statute, which, in one breath, avoids conveyances contrived of covin, to defraud creditors of their just demands, or to defraud and deceive subsequent purchasers; *1 Rev. Code, ch.

98 101, § 2, p. 372. If a conveyance be fraudulent, it can no more affect any purchaser, than it can affect any creditor.

He said, there was a wide difference, in the very essence of the transactions, between the supposed case of a purchaser buying of the grantor, a subject previously conveyed by a fraudulent deed, and actually paying him the purchase money, with full notice of the previous deed and of its fraudulency, much more of a suit on behalf of creditors to impeach and avoid the previous deed as fraudulent, and the actual case before the court, in which bona fide creditors have obtained a mortgage to secure a just debt, of a subject before fraudulently mortgaged to secure a pretended debt, with notice both of the previous mortgage and its fraudulent character. In the supposed case, the purchaser would really assist the fraudulent grantor to relieve himself from the effects of his fraudulent conveyance, and to apply the subject to his own use, or aid him to defeat or delay the creditor suing to avoid his fraudulent conveyance, by converting the subject into money, which may be easily put beyond reach. In the actual case, the fraudulent grantor derived no benefit from his second mortgage of the subject, by which he only devoted it to the satisfaction of a debt previously contracted and justly due. Deison's mortgage to Settle & Co. was neither in design nor in effect, of any advantage to himself. A subsequent purchaser from a grantor who has before made a fraudulent conveyance of the same subject, with notice of the previous conveyance and the fraud, may, in so purchasing, commit or make himself party to a fraud; but such subsequent purchase with notice is not per se fraudulent. It may be innocent and just: the circumstances must determine the character of the transaction. And, in the present case, all that could be said was, that Settle had succeeded better and earlier, in securing the debt due to Settle & Co. by diligence out of doors, than Liggit & Matthews by their proceedings in court.

Lastly, he strenuously contested the principle on which Johnson claimed priority of satisfaction for Liggit & Matthews:

99 *that, as they had succeeded in excluding Tate, by shewing that the security provided for him was fraudulent, they obtained the preference to Tate, and by consequence the preference to Settle & Co. also, because as between them and Tate, they could only claim after Tate. The consequence of avoiding Tate's security as fraudulent, was not, and could not be, that Liggit & Matthews were entitled to rank on the subject in Tate's place; the just consequence was, that Tate had no place. His fraudulent security was annulled. The next incumbrancer ranked on the subject, as if the annulled security had never existed. The question was, who was the next incumbrancer? Settle & Co. whose mortgage was executed in October 1821, or Liggat & Matthews whose decree was obtained in 1823? Suppose several debts secured in the same mortgage, or several debts secured by several successive mortgages, and a creditor of the mortgagor should impeach or avoid one of the intermediate debts or mortgages as fraudulent, he thought it impossible to maintain that this creditor acquired priority over the subsequent mortgagees.

GREEN, J. It is admitted to be well settled, as a general rule, that a creditor at large (one who has not in some way acquired a right to have satisfaction out of his debtor's property, specifically), cannot come into a court of equity to impeach any conveyance made by his debtor on the ground of fraud; and, consequently, that the court of chancery had no jurisdiction in the first of these suits, unless, as it was insisted by the counsel for the appellees in that suit, the rule is liable to exceptions, within one of which this case falls.

The rule is founded upon the principle of the common law, essential to the enjoyment and circulation of property, that every debtor, until his property is specifically bound to the satisfaction of his debt, by his own agreement or by some judicial proceeding, has an absolute right to dispose of it at pleasure, to prefer one creditor to another, or even to waste or destroy it; a power which no tribunal whatever 100 *has authority to controul or limit.

The obligation of a debtor is purely personal, and in no way affects his property or any portion of it; and so long as his person is amenable to the process of the courts of justice, there are no means of reaching or affecting his property, but through that medium, and after judgment or decree against him personally. At common law, even when his person was withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the courts, so that process could not be served upon him, there were no means of reaching his property, but by outlawry, which forfeited it, and enabled the creditor in that indirect way to charge it. Our statutes have in such cases (those of absent and absconding debtors) allowed a remedy, which affects the property in the first instance: and these statutory exceptions prove the rule; for if, upon the general principles of equitable jurisdiction, a court of equity could in the first instance act upon the debtor's property, in favour of a creditor at large, these statutory provisions would have been superfluous, since no stronger cases than those provided for by the statutes, could have occurred to justify its interposition.

To this rule no solitary exception can be found, nor can one exist, until the principles of our law are so changed as to authorise courts of equity to administer the estates of living debtors, as if they were dead. The supposed exceptions to the rule, suggested in the argument, are susceptible of ready explanation. In Smithier v. Lewis, Vernon does not state that a fi. fa. upon the judgment, had been delivered to the proper officer: it was sufficient to state, that the bill was by a judgment creditor, leaving it to be inferred, from the known general rule, asserted in the very next case reported, that the creditor had proceeded so far upon his judgment at law, as to entitle him under that rule to resort to a court of equity; and in Madd. Chan. 169, this case is referred to, as one in which there had been a return of nulla bona. In cases in which lands are sought to be subjected, it is sufficient, that the creditor has obtained his judgment, without taking out an elegit, or, in case of the death of 101 the *debtor after judgment, without reviving it against his heirs or terre-tenants, as in the case cited from Ambler, of Stileman v. Ashdown; because the judgment binds all the lands of which the defendant was seized at its date, or at any time thereafter, and the capacity to enforce it and overreach all intermediate alienations and incumbrances, gives the creditor a right to satisfaction out of that specific property, in preference to all others whose rights have not attached upon it before the judgment. Nor is the right of a creditor to resort originally to a court of equity, against his debtor's property in the hands of his heirs or personal representatives, an exception to the rule: for, in those cases, there is no longer any one personally responsible to the creditor, or any one who has a right to dispose of the property at pleasure. The creditor has a right to satisfaction out of the specific property in the hands of the heir or executor, who is liable only in respect to such property; which, though not strictly a lien, is so far in the nature of one, that the creditor can follow the property into the hands of a fraudulent alienee of the debtor, or of his heir or executor. Of this class was the case of Chamberlayne v. Temple, which was relied upon as an exception to the rule. There, the defendants were responsible as executors in their own wrong; and the jurisdiction of the court was founded on the right of a creditor to a discovery of assets, which is universal, and strengthened in that case by the ingredient of fraud.

The circumstance also, that, with us, any execution which may be taken upon a judgment, may be taken on a decree, was relied on as affecting the rule in question. I cannot perceive how that can possibly have such effect, or enlarge the jurisdiction of the court of equity in any respect whatever. It is only substituted as a more simple and direct means of enforcing decrees, than the original remedy by sequestration, which, in effect, bound all the debtor's property, real and personal, to a greater extent than any common law execution; the rents and profits of all his lands instead of 102 a moiety, as under an elegit; the personalty from *the time of awarding the commission, instead of the time of delivering the process to the officer, as in the case of a fi. fa.; and it extended to subjects, which cannot be reached by any common law execution, such as the dividends of bank stock. Hyde v. Greenhill, 1 Dick. 106; Burdett v. Rockley, 1 Vern. 58; Hamline v. Lee, and Fawcett v. Fothergill, cited 4 Ves. 747.

Nor is there any thing in the idea suggested, that, in case of a fraudulent deed, especially a deed of trust, the court can take jurisdiction upon the assumption, that the donees may be considered in equity, as trustees for all the creditors of the donor. If the deed be wholly fraudulent, then such a claim to hold the donee a trustee, would contradict the very foundation of the creditor's suit, who comes for relief upon the ground that the deed is as to him utterly void; or if fraudulent and void in part only, then the holder of the legal estate is in equity a quasi trustee, only as to such creditors as have otherwise acquired a right to satisfaction specifically out of the trust fund.

In the first case, therefore, the court had no jurisdiction as to the question of fraud, nor as to that of debt, taken separately, nor when considered together, unless the addition of two negatives can make an affirmative; and the bill in that case should have been wholly dismissed. But as Deison has not appealed from that part of it decreeing the debt against him, the decree cannot be reviewed as to that point. It can only be reviewed, as it affects the appellant Tate, by setting aside the deeds or far as it provides for his claim, and giving costs against him.

The decree against Deison, and the proceedings under it, afforded a proper foundation for the second of these suits, which brought fairly into discussion, the claims of Liggit & Matthews, Tate and Morgan respectively, to satisfaction out of the trust fund. If the deeds in question were fraudulent and void so far as they purported to secure a debt to Tate (a question to be decided de novo in this cause) and Morgan had the priority over Liggit & Matthews, the *injunction was properly dissolved. If, on the other hand, Liggit & Matthews were entitled in preference to Morgan, it should have been continued, and the fund secured to answer the final decree of the court. And the case presented this question, Whether a debtor making a fraudulent conveyance of personal property, and afterwards giving a deed of trust upon it to secure a debt to a creditor, who has full notice of the fraudulent deed, and afterwards another creditor recovers a judgment and delivers to the sheriffs a writ of fi. fa. or a ca. sa. which is executed, the creditor claiming under the deed of trust, or that under the judgment, is entitled to the preference? Unless, indeed, this question was anticipated by the circumstance, that in the agreement of the 9th July, as well as in the subsequent deed of trust under which Morgan claims, the alleged fraudulent deed is recited, and referred to as a valid deed; and nothing was assigned and conveyed by the deed of trust, but all Deison's right, title and interest in and to the property conveyed by the fraudulent deed; so that, in truth, the parties contracted only for Deison's equity of redemption, subject in the first instance to the payment of both the debts secured by the original deed, one of which is alleged to be fictitious: an inference, which is fortified by the circumstance, that in the first agreement Settle treated with Tate as entitled to a preference under the deed, and procured from him a transfer of his right in the surplus of the real property after satisfying the bank debt. And this I think is the true effect of the transaction, and that Morgan is estopped from impeaching the deed on the ground of fraud, even if in a case, where a debtor having made a fraudulent conveyance of personal property, afterwards gives a deed of trust to a creditor who has notice, professing to convey, not his right only in the property fraudulently conveyed, but the property itself without any reserve, could impeach it for fraud. And without going any farther, I think Liggit & Matthews might be safely declared, on this ground, to have the preference over Morgan, if the original deed was fraudulent as to Tate.

104 *But supposing it otherwise, the question first stated occurs: for Tate did not relinquish his rights under the original deed, to any portion of the property, except the surplus of the real property after paying the bank debt; and all the real property has been disposed of, and proved insufficient to pay that debt. As to the personal property the case stands, as if Tate had not been party to the agreement of the 9th July.

A fraudulent conveyance binds the parties, and the donor has no right which he can transfer to another by his own act, except in cases provided for by statute. Our statute of frauds, pursuing in effect the provisions of the English statutes of the 13th and 27th Elizabeth, avoids fraudulent conveyances of real and personal property as to creditors, but only of real property as to subsequent purchasers. A subsequent purchaser of personal property, cannot impeach such a conveyance, otherwise than upon principles of the common law; according to which no such conveyance can be a fraud upon a subsequent purchaser with notice.*

Creditors acquiring, in any way, a lien upon their debtor's property by contract with him, have uniformly been held to be entitled as purchasers, and in no case that I have met with in the English books, as creditors entitled to the benefit of the statute of the 13 Eliz. The seeming exceptions to *this rule, in the case of the assignees of a bankrupt, and the sheriff in case of an insolvent debtor, are not so in reality. They do not claim as

*The words of the Virginia statute, are: "Every gift, grant or conveyance of lands, tenements, hereditaments, goods or chattels, or of any rent, common or profit out of the same, by writing or otherwise, and every bond, suit, judgment or execution, had or made, and contrived of malice, fraud, or covin, collusion or guile, to the intent or purpose to delay, hinder or defraud creditors of their just and lawful actions, suits, debts, accounts, damages, penalties or forfeitures, or to defraud or deceive those who shall purchase the same lands, tenements or hereditaments, or any rent, profit or commodity out of them, shall be from henceforth deemed and taken (only as against the person or persons, his, her or their heirs, successors, executors, administrators or assigns, and every of them, whose debts, suits, demands, estates, interests, by such guileful and covinous devices and practices, as is aforesaid, shall or might be in any wise disturbed, hindered, delayed or defrauded), to be clearly and utterly void, any pretence, colour, feigned consideration, expressing of use, or any other matter or thing, to the contrary notwithstanding."—Note in Original Edition.

purchasers from the bankrupt or insolvent debtor, and so bound, as he was, by his former conveyances, whether fair or fraudulent; but, as standing in the shoes of the creditors, and representing their rights; and in case of bankrupts and of insolvent debtors discharged under the statute, the creditors acquire a lien on the debtor's property, not by force of his assignment, but by operation of law, the legislative provisions in these cases operating as statutory executions. These subjects were fully examined in the case of Shirley v. Long, 6 Rand. 735, and need not be discussed here in detail. If a creditor taking a lien, by contract with his debtor, upon his personal property before fraudulently conveyed, could unite to his character of a purchaser, that also of a creditor entitled to claim under the statute of the 13 Eliz. we should probably find many cases to that effect in the english books; but we find none. And the settled rule, that no creditor is entitled to avail himself of that statute, who has not in fact been impeded by the fraudulent conveyance, in his proceeding in a due course of law to procure satisfaction of his debt, seems to negative the proposition. Nor is there any equity as between the creditors in such a case; the preference being due to him who has acquired the advantage by greater diligence in the pursuit of his legal remedies. Nor can the debtor complain, that he has lost the right to prefer one creditor to another by his mere volition, in consequence of his own fraud, although that preference might be incidentally given by confessing a judgment.

The only case conflicting with these views, is that of Bayard v. Hoffman, 4 Johns. Ch. Rep. 450, in which a debtor, having conveyed a quantity of public stock to trustees, for the benefit of his wife and children, afterwards assigned all his effects to trustees for the payment of all his debts, and this with the concurrence of many of his creditors, from whom, however, the existence of the prior conveyance of 106 the *stock was concealed. And chancellor Kent held, that the voluntary conveyance was void under the statute, but assigned no reason for this judgment, except to assimilate an assignment by a debtor, of all his effects for the satisfaction of all his creditors, to the case of the assignees of a bankrupt in England; the striking difference between which has been before alluded to, and was more fully examined in Shirley v. Long, to which I refer.

Upon the whole, I think the order, in the case of Liggat & Matthews v. Morgan and others, dissolving the injunction should be reversed, and the cause remanded, that it may be further proceeded in, and that the marshal of the court, in whom the rights of Deison vested, by operation of law, upon his surrender of his effects as an insolvent debtor, may be made a party.

CARR, J. As to the case of Tate v. Liggat & Matthews, I concur with my brother Green, that the chancellor had no jurisdiction of any part of the case, and ought to have dismissed the bill intirely.

As to the other case, Liggat & Matthews v. Morgan, I think the marshal should have been a party, as the interest of Deison vested in him, by the act of insolvency: this can be provided for, when the case goes back. I think Liggat & Matthews have a preference over Morgan, on this ground, that by the agreement of July and the deed of October 1821, Settle contracted for, and the deed conveyed, only the excess after the satisfaction of the debt due the bank, and the debt due Tate; and though the debt of Tate should turn out to be simulated (a point yet to be tried), that cannot enlarge the operation of the deed. My decision rests on this ground alone. As to the general question, viz. if A. makes a fraudulent conveyance to B. and then a conveyance of the same property to secure C. a fair creditor, and D. subsequently gets a judgment against A. which of these two creditors shall be preferred? this question I do not decide. It is very important: it is new with us: it is not necessary

107 *to the decision of this case. I think, therefore, we had better hold it open for the present.

COALTER and CABELL, J., also said, that they concurred in the result, but thought it unnecessary to decide the general question, stated by Carr, J., and therefore they gave no opinion upon it.

After these opinions had been announced, a question arose, in the case of Tate v. Liggat & Matthews, Whether the decree ought not to be reversed in omnibus? that is, not only that part of it, which affected the appellant Tate, by declaring the deeds he claimed under fraudulent and void, and setting them aside, so far as they provided for him, but that part of it also, which decreed to Liggat & Matthews against Deison (who did not appeal) the debt he owed them.

Stanard said, it was plain, and the whole court had so decided, that the chancellor had no jurisdiction to entertain the bill for any purpose whatever. He had no jurisdiction to give a judgment against Deison for debt. The judgment was a mere nullity. Should a judgment rendered by a court without jurisdiction, be allowed to stand, and to avail the creditor, exactly to the same extent as a judgment rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction? and this, in a contest between him and other creditors? Again, the decree was one and intire: the costs are given against Deison and Tate jointly. He referred to the case of Lewis v. Thornton, 6 Munf. 87, 97, in which on an appeal from a decree taken by some of the parties, the court corrected the decree as to parties who did not unite in the appeal.

Johnson answered, that the appellant Tate had no manner of interest in the decree for the debt against Deison, who had acquiesced in it, and it had been executed. As to the argument, that the chancellor had no jurisdiction to make such a decree, an erroneous judgment of the chancellor on a question of jurisdiction, could no 108 more be reviewed and *corrected by this court, without its being brought hither by appeal, than a judgment on any other point; and none but the party aggrieved could appeal.

PER CURIAM. That part of the decree which adjudges the debt to Liggat & Matthews against Deison, cannot be reversed. The appellant Tate has no interest whatever involved in that part of the decree, he is nowise aggrieved by it, he has no right to complain of or to appeal from it, any more than if it had been a judgment at law in an action on the bond against Deison alone. If the court of chancery had dismissed the bill wholly as to Tate, on the ground that it had no jurisdiction as to him, it could not have concerned him at all, whether the court had jurisdiction as against Deison, or whether he was a debtor, or whether a decree should be given against him for the debt, or whether Deison should appeal from such a decree, or not. As Tate could not appeal from the decree against Deison, he could not compel Deison to appeal from it: Deison has acquiesced. Neither did Tate appeal from this part of the decree: he was only held to security for costs; whereas if it had been competent to Tate to appeal from the decree as it affected Deison, and he had done so, or if Deison had appealed from it, security must have been required in the appeal bond, to the full extent of the debt decreed against Deison. The court cannot, upon this appeal, judicially take notice that there was any subsequent suit between the parties; it can only know, that a subsequent suit might be founded on the decree against Deison, as it might be on a judgment at law against him. That the decree is against Deison and Tate, jointly, for the costs, is not material to the point: the costs are wholly separate and distinct from the body and matter of the decree; and Tate can receive no injury from the decree for costs, for as to him we reverse that and every other part of the decree. The case of Lewis v. Thornton is not in point. There, the parties appealing, and the parties not appealing, all stood on the same ground, and their rights were 109 involved *in the same question and equally affected by the decree. That too was an interlocutory decree, all the parties were still in court, and any errors could be corrected by the chancellor when the cause got back; and it is not unusual for this court, in its decrees in cases of that kind, to call the chancellor's attention to omissions or errors that he may supply or correct them. And that was what was done in Lewis v. Thornton: the court said, "according to these principles, the decree in question ought not to prejudice the purchasers under P. and T. R. Rootes; and although they have not appealed from the interlocutory decree in this case, yet these principles will equally apply to them, when a final decree shall be pronounced." The present is a very different case. The two parties, Tate and Deison, stood on distinct and unconnected grounds: the decree is final: and it was executed by a ca. sa. against the one, before the appeal was taken by the other.

Statute of Descents—Construction of Section 18—Alienage of Ancestor—Case at Bar.—A citizen dies

seized of lands in Virginia, leaving a brother who is a citizen, a sister who is an alien yet living, children of the alien sister, who are citizens, and grand-children of the alien sister, who are citizens, though their fathers as well as their grand-mother are aliens: HELD, under the statute of descents, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 96, § 18, the descendants of the alien sister take by descent, one moiety to be divided among them per stirpes, and the citizen brother the other moiety.

Upon a bill exhibited in the superiour court of chancery of Wythe, by the appellees against the appellant, for partition of the real estate of Thomas Jackson deceased, and for other purposes, the case was:

Thomas Jackson, a native of England, but a duly naturalized citizen of the U.

States died in 1824, intestate, 110 *seized of a large real estate in

Wythe and the neighbouring counties. His kindred, living in the U. States, were his brother John Jackson, also a native of England and duly naturalized citizen of the U. States; this brother's children, John, a native of England, never naturalized, and Michael, Thomas and Robert Jackson, natural born citizens of the U. States; Ann Walton, (wife of Richard Walton) a sister of the intestate, and a native of England, who had never been naturalized; the children of Ann Walton (by her second husband Richard Walton) George Walton and Hannah (the wife of John Sanders) natural born citizens; the children of Mrs. Walton by a former husband, Mary Parkin (the wife of Joseph Parkin) and John, William and Robert Raper, all of whom were natives of England, and had never been naturalized; William Millan, a son of Mary Parkin by a former husband, and a natural born citizen; Robert, Ann, John, Eve, Chary and Raper, children of the alien John Raper, and natural born citizens; and Mary and Jane Raper, children of the alien William Raper, and natural born citizens of the U. States. Pending the bill for the partition, John Jackson, the brother of the intestate, died, and the suit was proceeded in against his children Michael, Thomas and Robert.

The question was, Whether the whole estate descended to John Jackson, the naturalized brother of the intestate? or whether the natural born citizens, descendants of his alien sister, Ann Walton, who was yet living, were entitled by descent to one equal moiety, to be divided among them, and John, the citizen brother, to the other moiety? The chancellor declared, that the descendants of the alien sister were so entitled, and pronounced an interlocutory decree accordingly. And the Jacksons appealed to this court.

Leigh, for the appellants. According to the common law, title by descent could not be made, from, to, or through, an alien. Alienage was an impediment to descent, lineal or collateral, in all cases, where 111 it affected the person last *seized, or (Code 1849, p. 523; Code 1887, § 2551.) It is provided: "In making title by descent, it shall be no bar to a party, that any ancestor, through whom he derives his descent from the intestate, is or hath been an alien." This statute removes the bar of alienage in making title by descent through collateral as well as lineal kindred. Garland v. Harrison, 8 Leigh 374, citing principal case as its authority. See also, citing principal case, Hannon v. Hounihan, 85 Va. 483, 12 S. E. Rep. 157.

the person who would otherwise be heir; or where it attached to a medius ancestor, and so intervened between the person last seized, and him who would otherwise be heir: but if it affected neither party, nor any medius ancestor, it was no impediment to the descent, that the person claiming as heir to another, derived his kindred blood from an alien. Harg. Co. Litt. 8, a. n. 37, 12, a. n. 62; Hale's argument in Collingwood v. Pace, 1 Ventr. 417; 2 Vin. Abr. Alien E. p. 269. The statute of 11 and 12 W. 3, ch. 6, relaxed the rigour of the common law in favour of natural born subjects; and the statute of 25 Geo. II. ch. 39, was enacted to explain and amend the 112 statute of W. III.* *The legislature of Virginia, with the principles of the common law and the provisions of both the english statutes in full view, enacted that, "In making title by descent, it shall be no bar to a party, that any ancestor, through whom he derives his descent from the intestate, is or hath been an alien." 1 Rev. Code, ch. 96, § 18, p. 357.

The statute of W. 3, enables natural born subjects to make, not their pedigrees only, but their title by descent, from any ancestor, lineal or collateral, in express terms, though the parents through whom they make or derive their titles or pedigrees, were or are or shall be aliens; most carefully extending the provision to collateral as well as lineal inheritance. If the legislature of Virginia had had the same design, it would have manifested the same care; it would have adopted some of many expressions of the english statute, that distinctly evince the intent. But it did not do so: it cannot be suspected of carelessness or inadvertency; it avoided doing so. It has removed the impediment of alienage, only in favor of citizens deriving their descent from the intestate; that is, their pedigree, their blood, from him. Let the meaning of the words title by descent, or of the word descent taken alone, be what it may, the phrase that one person derives his descent from another, means that he derives his lineage from him. The provision, then, is confined to cases of lineal inheritance. And there might, in the view of the legislature, have been good reason for abandoning the commonwealth's title by escheat, in favour of a man's descendants, deriving their descent from him through an alien, and reserving it as against his collateral kindred: the one had certainly less claim than the other, to the favour of the law, since the intestate, if he had disposed of the estate himself, would not have been under the same natural obligation, and would have had less care to provide for them.

The statute of W. 3, enables the natural born subject, to make his title by descent or pedigree from the intestate, through any medius ancestor, though he was or is 113 or shall *be an alien; using the past, present and future tenses. I cannot find, that any case ever arose upon this statute in England.

The statute of G. 2, plainly supposes, that the words of the other statute, authorised a natural born subject to claim title by descent through an alien parent living at the time of the descent cast; for it provides for the case. Our statute, partially adopting the language of the statute of W. 3, in this respect, provides, that the citizen may trace his descent through a medius ancestor who is or hath been an alien, without adopting the explanation or restriction of the statute of G. 2. If, under our statute, which admits males and females and their descendants to the inheritance in parcenary, the citizen co-heirs may claim the inheritance through a medius alien ancestor yet living, much confusion must follow, and difficulties hardly to be surmounted. In the case now before the court, suppose Mrs. Walton shall hereafter have other children, or that her alien sons and daughters shall have many more children, born citizens, during her life; must the descent open to let in these afterborn children for their share of the inheritance? Or, if some of her citizen children and grand-children should die before her, must the descent close and exclude them? Or must partition be suspended till her death? How are the heirs to be ascertained till her death? If only those who are in being and capable to take at the death of the intestate, are to share the inheritance, by what rule shall it be divided between them? It will be found, on examination, that there is no provision in the act of descents, which gives a rule for such a case, and ascertains which of them shall take, her citizen children only, or her citizen grand-children also, or whether they shall take per stirpes or per capita. I cannot think, therefore, notwithstanding those words "is or hath been an alien," that the legislature intended, that citizens might make title by descent through a medius alien ancestor living at the time of the descent cast.

*See 1 Bac. Abr. Allens, C. p. 133; 2 Cay's Abr. Naturalization, III. XXVII. XXVIII. pp. 87, 90.

The words of the statute of W. III. are, "That all and every person or persons, being the king's natural born subject or subjects, within any of the king's realms or dominions, shall and may hereafter lawfully inherit and be inheritable, as heir or heirs to any honours, manours, lands, tenements or hereditaments, and make their pedigrees and titles by descent from any of their ancestors, lineal or collateral, although the father and mother, or fathers or mothers, or other ancestor of such person or persons, by, from, through or under whom he, she or they shall or may make or derive their title or pedigree, were or was, or is or are, or shall be born out of the king's allegiance, and out of his majesty's realms and dominions, as freely, fully and effectually to all intents and purposes, as if such father or mother, or fathers or mothers, or other ancestor or ancestors, by, from, through, or under whom he, she or they shall or may make or derive their title or pedigree had been naturalized, or natural born subjects."

The statute of G. 2, (§ 1.) confines the benefit of the statute of W. 3, to such persons as shall be living and capable to take as heirs at the death of the person last dying seized: "provided (§ 2.) that in case the person who shall be in being, and capable to take at the death of the ancestor so dying seized, and upon whom the descent shall be cast by virtue of this, or of the said act, shall be daughter of an alien: and the alien father or mother, through whom such descent shall be derived, shall afterwards have a son born within any of his majesty's dominions, the descent so cast upon such daughter shall be divested in favour of such son; and such son shall inherit and take the estate as is allowed by the common law of this realm. In cases of the birth of a nearer heir: or in case such father or mother shall have no son, but shall have one or more daughters afterwards born within any of his majesty's dominions, the daughters so born afterwards, shall inherit and take in coparceny with the daughter, upon whom the descent shall be cast at the death of the ancestor last seized."—Note in Original Edition.

114 *Johnson, for the appellees. The criticism by which it is endeavoured to confine the provision of the statute in question, to cases of lineal descents, cannot be maintained. When the statute says, that in making title by descent, it shall be no bar to the party, that any ancestor through whom he derives his descent from the intestate, is or hath been alien, the word descent, where last used, means the title by descent, which the party is to make from the intestate. Neither does the word descent mean pedigree, blood, lineage: it means title by descent. "Descent, or hereditary succession, is the title whereby a man on the death of his ancestor acquires his estate by right of representation, as his heir at law." 2 Black. Com. 201; Jac. Law Dict. word Descent; Co. Litt. 237, a. The statute of W. 3, is very verbose; and the framers of our statute of descents intended not to depart from the sense of its provisions, but only to condense them into fewer words. We shall look in vain, in the policy of the state, or in the temper of the legislature which enacted the statute of descents, much more of the committee of revisors who framed it, for any reason, that should induce our law givers to be less liberal than the english parliament, in relaxing the unreasonable rigour of the common law.

That the statute of W. 3, enables a natural born subject to claim descent from an intestate, through a medius alien ancestor, living the alien ancestor, is apparent from its words. It is admitted, that the statute of G. 2, proceeded on that interpretation of them. The supreme court of Massachusetts seems to have entertained no doubt on the point; Palmer v. Downer, 2 Mass. Rep. 179, in note. And it seems impossible to put any other construction on the statute of Virginia.

The descendants of Mrs. Walton coming to the inheritance in unequal degree, the rule of partition is provided by the 16th section of the statute; 1 Rev. Code, p. 357.

CARR, J. The question depends mainly upon the 18th section of the statute of descents: but before I discuss the 115 *meaning of that provision, I will take a brief view of the doctrines of the common law with respect to alienage, and the changes wrought in them by british statutes, so that we may see distinctly the state of the subject, at the passage of our law.

By the common law, an alien is defined to be, "one born out of the ligeance of the king." Upon such a person many disabilities were imposed. He could take real estate by contract, but he could not hold it against the king; neither could he transmit it by hereditary descent. He was disabled to take by any act in law; for the law, as lord Hale says, quæ nihil frustra facit, will not give him an inheritance or freehold by act in law, for he cannot keep it. The law, therefore, will not give an alien the benefit of either descent, curtesy, dower, or guardianship. His incapacity resembles "that of a person attaint, yet with this difference: the law looks upon a person attaint, as one it takes notice of; and therefore the eldest son attaint over-living his father, though he shall not take by decent, yet he shall hinder the descent to the younger son. But if the eldest son be an alien, the law takes no notice of him; and therefore, as he shall not take by descent, so he shall not impede the descent to the younger brother." There is also what lord Hale calls a consequential, consecutive disability, which reflects to an alien from one, that must derive by or through him, though such one be perchance a natural born subject. Thus, if there be a grand-father a natural born subject, father an alien, and son a subject, and the father dies, and then the grand-father dies intestate, seized of an inheritance; the son cannot inherit his grand-father; because he must derive his descent through his father, the medius ancestor, whose alienage opposes an insurmountable obstacle. So, in collateral descents, if there be three brothers, the eldest an alien, and the two younger natural born subjects; one of the younger brothers dies seized of lands, living the other native born, and also a native born son of the alien brother: this son cannot inherit, 116 though he is capable to *hold and to transmit inheritance, and though he would be heir of his uncle who died seized; but he must derive his descent through his father, and he, as lord Hale expresses it, stands as "a block in the way." In Collingwood v. Pace, where this whole doctrine is so ably treated, the case was, a father alien, and two sons naturalized, one of whom died leaving a son natural born; and the question was, whether this son should inherit his uncle? He was considered as standing exactly in the shoes of his father, and presenting the question, as between the two brothers, whether they could inherit each other, or were impeded by the alienage of their father? It was adjudged in the exchequer, by seven judges against three, that they could: and the reason given was, that the descent between them was immediate, so that there was no necessity of deriving it through their father.

Whether these doctrines had their root in the feudal tenures, or, as Blackstone thinks, were founded "rather upon a principle of national or civil policy, than upon reasons strictly feudal," it would be useless to inquire. With a change of times and manners, the rigour of them, and the hardships and injustice produced by them, were felt, and the statute of 11 and 12 W. 3, ch. 6, was enacted to correct them. That statute cured the mischief, by removing the bar of alienage both in lineal and collateral descents. I think it clear too, that it contemplated the case of a party claiming through a living ancestor. Those words, "though the father or mother &c. from whom he may derive his title or pedigree, was, is, or shall be born out of the king's allegiance," mean nothing more than though the father &c. through whom &c. was, or is, or shall be an alien. This is clearly the meaning put upon it by the statute of 25 G. 2, ch. 39.

Such was the state of the law, when our committee of revisors came to act upon the subject: the harsh features of the common law had been softened down, and parties permitted to make descent, both lineal committee was to transfuse into our code whatever of sound and wise legislation they found in the english system. With these laws on the subject of alienage before them, they said, that "in making title by descent, it shall be no bar to a party, that any ancestor, through whom he derives his descent from the intestate, is or hath been an alien." It was contended, that this clause was applied to lineal descent only, leaving collateral descents as they stood at common law. It would seem strange, that with the mischief of the common law, and the remedy of the english statutes before them, these law-makers should stop half way, and leave unredressed so material and obvious a part of the evil. The position was rested on two grounds, 1. That having the statute of W. 3, before them, which so carefully provided for collateral descents, they have departed from the language of that statute; 2. that the terms they have used are peculiarly applicable to lineal descents, and inapplicable to collateral. With respect to the first, it is clear, that they have not followed the language of the english statute; but I do not think that evidence that they meant to depart from the substantial effect of it. The english statute is singularly verbose; employing a vast number of words to express a few ideas. It is no wonder that this example should have been avoided in a law, which seems to have been studiously condensed into the smallest possible compass, compatible with clearness. Let us examine the terms of this clause, and see if they are such as would be naturally used to embrace lineal and exclude collateral descents. "In making title by descent:" does this mean pedigree, blood, extraction, lineage? not at all, in my judgment. Title by descent, is a phrase of the largest and most comprehensive sense; purchase and descent are the only modes of acquiring land. In Co. Litt. 237, a., lord Coke says, "this word (Descents) cometh of the latin word descendere, id est ex loco superiore ad inferiorem movere; and in legal understanding it is taken when land &c. after the death of an ancestor, is cast by 118 "course of law, upon the heir, which the law calleth a descent." Blackstone, and all the elementary books use the term in the same sense. The title of our law is, "an act to reduce into one the several acts directing the course of descents;" which I understand to mean, the course in which lands shall descend from one to another: the first section of the act says, "that when a person having title to real estate of inheritance, shall die intestate, it shall descend and pass in parcenary, to his kindred, male and female, in the following course." All going to shew, that wherever in the act the word descent is used, it means the passage of the inheritance, and not the blood, the pedigree. Let us return to the law. "In making title by descent, it shall be no bar to a party, that any ancestor, through whom he derives his descent from the intestate, is or hath been an alien." "It shall be no bar that any ancestor:" could words be more extensive than these? Where the law says it shall be no bar, that any ancestor is an alien, how can we suppose that it means lineal ancestor only?

Any ancestor includes both lineal and collateral. It removes the bar as to both; and how can we restrain it? "Through whom he derives his descent from the intestate:" that is, through whom he derives his title by descent; his claim to the estate; the land; not the blood, the genealogy. "Is or hath been an alien:" is, in the present tense, shews that the law contemplated a claim through a living, as well as a dead alien ancestor. This section then, in my apprehension, is full and complete to remove out of the way the bar of alienage in both lineal and collateral descents, and also to remove any impediment from the life of the ancestor, through whom the descent may be derived.

The objections of the alienage and life of the mother being removed, the case is the common one of a brother of the intestate, and nephews and nieces concurring. He takes per caput; they, per stirpes, the share which their mother would have taken, had she been capable.

The other judges concurred, and the decree was affirmed.

*Burfoot v. Burfoots.

March, 1880.

Wills—Construction—Executory Limitation—Case at Bar.—Testator devises and bequeaths to his two grandsons D. and T. B. children of his deceased daughter M. B. sundry real and personal estate, and adds, "all the estate given to my grandsons is to be equally divided between them, each holding his part in fee simple, upon condition that each shall have issue of his body; but if either should die leaving no such issue, then his share shall pass to the surviving grandson; and such survivor shall hold and enjoy in fee simple the whole estate given to both, upon condition that such surviving grandson shall, at the time of his death leave issue of his body; but if both my grandsons shall die, neither of them leaving such issue as aforesaid, and any of the children or grand children of my daughter E. M'T. should be then living, the whole estate given to my two grandsons shall be considered as given for life only, and the same shall, after their death without such issue as aforesaid, be equally divided in fee simple among the issue of my daughter E. M'T. then living, and the children of such of them as may then be dead."

HELD, each of the grandsons took a fee simple in the moiety devised to him, with an executory devise limited and well limited thereon to the other, on the contingency of either dying without leaving issue living at his death.

Daniel Trabue late of Chesterfield, died in 1818, having first made his last will and testament, whereby, 1st, he devised and bequeathed sundry real and personal estate to his wife for life.

2dly. He devised sundry other real and personal estate, and a moiety of the remainder of that which he had given to his wife for life, to his executors, in trust, that they should apply the profits thereof to the support of his daughter Elizabeth M'Tyre and her children, and to her and their exclusive use and benefit, so that her husband Robert M'Tyre, should never have any control over the subject; and then he added: "But it is my will and desire, that, immediately after the death of my said daughter Elizabeth M'Tyre all the trust estate aforesaid be equally divided, in fee simple, among all the issue of her body lawfully begotten and legal representatives of such of them as may then be dead; but if my said daughter Elizabeth should leave no such issue of her body, then it is my will and desire, that the said trust estate be equally divided, in fee simple, between my grandson Daniel Trabue Burfoot and Thomas Burfoot, children *of my late daughter Mary" (the deceased wife of Matthew Burfoot) "and their legal representatives in the event of the death of either or both of my said grandsons at the decease of my said daughter Elizabeth without issue as aforesaid; but, if one only of my said last mentioned grandsons should then be living, and the other having died without issue, then it is my will and desire that the whole of the trust estate aforesaid should pass to and be held in fee simple by my grandson so surviving.

3dly. He devised and bequeathed sundry other real and personal estate, and the other moiety of the remainder of that given to his wife for life, to his two grandsons Daniel Trabue Burfoot and Thomas Burfoot equally to be divided between them (without any words of inheritance) and then he added: "all the estate, real and personal, given to my two said grandsons, is intended to be equally divided between them, each holding his equal part thereof in fee simple, upon condition that each shall have issue of his body lawfully begotten; but if either of my said grandsons should die leaving no such issue, then that moiety of the estate allotted to him, shall pass to the surviving grandson; in which case, such survivor shall hold and enjoy, in fee simple the whole estate given as aforesaid to my two said grandsons, upon condition, nevertheless, that such surviving grandson shall, at the time of his death, leave issue of his body lawfully begotten: but it is to be distinctly understood, as my will and desire, that if both of my grandsons should depart this life, neither of them leaving such issue as aforesaid, and any of the children or grandchildren of my said daughter Elizabeth should then be living, then and in that case, it is my will and desire, that the whole of the estate given as aforesaid to my two said grandsons, be considered as given to them for life only, and that the same shall, at their death without such issue as aforesaid, be equally divided in fee simple among all the issue of my said daughter Elizabeth M'Tyre, then living, and the children of such of them as may then be dead."

121 *4thly. By a codicil, "in the event of the death of all his said grandchildren before they should arrive at the age of twenty-one years, or without lawful issue," he devised over a large portion of his real estate to his son-in-law Matthew Burfoot in fee, and all the residue of his estate in equal portions to four of his nephews and nieces.

Both the testator's grandsons Daniel Trabue and Thomas Burfoot, survived him; and Daniel Trabue Burfoot died in early infancy, and of course intestate and without issue, his brother Thomas, and his father Matthew Burfoot, him surviving. And then the father Matthew Burfoot died intestate, leaving his son Thomas, and his second wife Julia Lavinia, and Rosabella Burfoot, an infant daughter of his second marriage, him surviving.

In a suit brought in the superior court of chancery of Richmond, by Julia Lavinia Burfoot and Rosabella Burfoot, against Thomas Burfoot, Lawson Burfoot executor of Matthew Burfoot, and William Fendley, administrator de bonis non with the will annexed of the testator Daniel Trabue, for a partition of Matthew Burfoot's real estate and other purposes, the plaintiffs insisted, that the testator's two grandsons Daniel Trabue Burfoot and Thomas Burfoot took by his will, each respectively an estate tail in his moiety of the real property thereby devised to those grandsons, which estate tail was converted into a pure and absolute fee simple, by the statute abolishing entails; that, therefore, on the death of Daniel Trabue Burfoot, his moiety descended to his father Matthew Burfoot, his heir at law by the statute of descents; and that this moiety, upon the death of Matthew Burfoot, descended to his son Thomas and daughter Rosabella, subject to his widow's right of dower. And so the chancellor held and declared, and made an interlocutory decree directing a partition accordingly; from which decree an appeal was prayed on behalf of Thomas Burfoot, and allowed by this court.

122 *The Attorney General and Johnson, for the appellant, contended, 1. That according to the intent the testator, and the true construction and effect of the will, the two grandsons, took, in the first instance, only life estates in the moieties of the lands devised to them, with a series of contingent remainders limited on those life estates, to and between them for life and in fee, and ultimately to the issue to Mrs. M'Tyre; contingent remainders, depending on the contingency of one or both of them leaving issue, or not leaving issue, at his or their death. For, they said, the testator had taken much pains to manifest, and had very clearly expressed, his intent, that neither was to have the fee simple, or any estate of inheritance, in his moiety, but upon the condition of his having issue; and that, if either or both should die without leaving issue, either or both so dying should have only a life estate.

The effect of the devise, as applied to the moiety of the deceased grandson Daniel, according to their construction, was thus: Devise of the moiety to Daniel for life; remainder to himself in fee, in case he should have lawful issue; remainder in case Daniel should not leave such issue, to his surviving brother, Thomas, for life; remainder to Thomas in fee, in case he should leave issue; remainder, in case he also should die without leaving issue at his death, and there should be children or grandchildren of Mrs. M'Tyre then living, to the issue of Mrs. M'Tyre &c.

And Thomas now held the whole, one moiety under the immediate devise to him, and the other under the contingent limitation thereof to him in the event that had actually occurred of his brother dying without leaving issue; but he held only a life estate in the whole, with contingent remainders limited thereon, to himself in fee in the event of his leaving issue, and if he should not leave issue at his death, and any of Mrs. M'Tyre's children or grandchildren should be living at the time, then to her issue &c.

123 *Such were the dispositions intended by the testator; and there was no principle of law that controlled or interfered with them, to prevent them from having full effect.

But, 2. If they were mistaken in their first view of the devise; if each of the grandsons took an immediate estate of inheritance in the moiety devised to him; they maintained, that that estate was clearly a fee simple. On this point, they argued, the express devise that each should hold in fee simple, was conclusive. This was not like the common case of a devise to one and his heirs, with executory limitations over on a failure of heirs of the first taker, where the context, and the general scheme of the disposition, might evince, that the deviser meant by the word heirs, not heirs general, but heirs of the body, and therefore intended to give the first taker an estate tail. Here, the testator was explicit as to the nature and quantity of the estate he intended to devise: he left no room for construction or implication. He gave a moiety to each grandson in fee simple; and it was impossible to hold, that they took estates tail by implication in their respective moieties, without violence to the language, and an utter disregard of the plain intent of the devise.

Taking it, then, that each of the grandsons took an immediate estate in fee simple in his moiety, the limitations that followed were executory devises limited after a fee. And the question was, Whether, upon the just construction of the will, those executory devises were made to depend on the indefinite failure of issue of the first takers respectively, or on a failure of issue living at their death? If the former contingency was intended, it was too remote. And the executory devises were void in their creation; if the latter, those devises were good and valid limitations, within the well settled principle of Pells v. Brown, Cro. Jac. 590; Butler's Fearn, 418.

And, they said, the testator had in his mind, the event of the failure of issue of these two grandsons, respectively, living at their death, as the contingency on which the moiety given to each was limited to the survivor: that his language

124 *indicated its meaning, as plainly and distinctly, as the most apt and technical words could have expressed it. The first alternative contingency of either devisee having issue, and of his leaving no issue, naturally imported having issue at his death, and leaving no issue at his death. The limitation over, upon the death of one leaving no issue, to the surviving grandson, evinced, that the survivor was to take at the death of the one first dying; that is, in the event of the failure of his issue at his death. The limitation of the whole estate to the survivor in fee, if he should at the time of his death leave issue, and if both should die leaving no issue as aforesaid, then over, expressly restrained the contingency of the survivor dying without leaving issue, to a failure of his issue living at his death, and evinced, that, in framing the previous contingency of the first devisee dying leaving no issue, he meant the same thing; a failure, namely, of his issue living at his death. Then, the provision that if both should die leaving no issue, the estate should be considered as given to them for life only, shewed, that the contingency of their leaving no issue, was an event to be ascertained at the termination of their respective lives; in other words, it was the contingency of their leaving no issue living at their death. And the ulterior limitation of the estate, at their death leaving no issue as aforesaid, to Mrs. M'Tyre's issue then living, undoubtedly referred to the time of the death of the two grandsons. Lastly, they averted to the executory limitations of the estate vested in trustees for Mrs. M'Tyre and her family, and to the ultimate limitations contained in the codicil (which were likewise made to depend on a failure of issue) for the purpose of shewing that the testator, in every instance, had never an idea in his mind of a general indefinite failure of issue, but always intended a failure of issue of the previous takers living at their death.

S. Taylor and Leigh for the appellees, said, that the position first taken by the appellant's counsel, namely, that the devisees took, in the first instance, no 125 estate of inheritance *whatever, but only a life estate, in the moieties devised to them respectively, was altogether untenable. That view of the devise rested on the supposition, that the provision, that each should hold his moiety in fee simple, upon condition that each should have issue of his body, but if either should die leaving no such issue, his moiety should pass to the survivor, made the having and leaving issue, a condition precedent to the vesting of the fee in either. Yet, if it was a condition precedent at all, it was a condition precedent to the vesting any estate whatever; of an estate for life as much as of the fee simple. The supposed words of condition applied to the holding of the moiety, as well as to the holding thereof in fee. It was necessary, therefore, in order to give any immediate estate to either devisee, to take the words in question, as words of limitation not of condition. And such words, when used in dispositions of property like the present, had always been taken as words of limitation; for instances of which they referred to Page v. Hayward, 2 Salk. 570, and 2 Preston on Estates, 507-8.* However, the argument was, that, in this case, the immediate estates given to the two devisees respectively, were restricted or reduced to estates for life, by an express provision of the will to that purpose. But that argument, they shewed, consisted in applying a provision made by the testator for another and future event that had not yet happened, to the case and event that had happened, for which the testator made no such provision: the will did not provide, that if either devisee should die without leaving issue, he should be considered as taking only a life estate; but, that if both devisees should die, neither leaving issue, they should be considered as taking only life estates.

*American Edition of 1828. two volumes bound in one.

There was no doubt that each devisee took an immediate estate of inheritance in the moiety devised to him. What estate of inheritance? An estate tail? if it was, the executory limitations were contingent 126 remainders, and were defeated by the statute, which converted the estate tail into a pure and absolute fee. Was it a fee simple? if so, the limitations were executory devises limited after a fee: and the question would still remain, whether they were well limited or not?

And considering the case in this view also, they insisted, that the just decision of it depended on those provisions of the devise exclusively, which related to and provided for the event that has actually occurred, out of which the case had arisen without regard to subsequent limitations of the same estate, made in respect of another and future event that might or might not happen? much more without regard to the limitations contained in those other clauses of the will making provisions for Mrs. M'Tyre and her family (which were framed upon a different scheme of disposition, and related to a different subject) or to the ulterior limitations contained in the codicil: That the language of a preceding limitation could not be controlled or explained by different language used in ulterior limitations of the same estate; on the contrary, diversity of language evinced diversity of meaning: That the only words of the will applicable to the event that had occurred, and the only words, therefore, material to the case before the court, were these: "All the estate given to my said two grandsons is intended to be equally divided between them, each holding his equal part thereof in fee simple, upon condition that each shall have issue of his body, but if either should die leaving no such issue, then his moiety shall pass to the surviving grandson." For, that it was under this limitation only, that the surviving grandson now claimed his deceased brother's moiety. The remaining words were intended to prescribe the contingency, on which the estate was to pass over to Mrs. M'Tyre's issue; the contingency, namely, of the surviving grandson, (after having acquired his brothers moiety by force of the previous limitation) dying himself without leaving issue at his death; a limitation, which, in the view of the testator, were equally reasonable, whether 127 the surviving grandson "took his deceased brother's moiety, by way of contingent remainder limited on a previous estate tail, or by way of executory devise limited on a preceding fee simple, devised to the deceased brother.

Then, they said, the only peculiarity of the case was, that the testator instead of devising a moiety to each grandson and his heirs, in the first instance, had devised a moiety to each in fee simple. But the first were the appropriate words of inheritance to pass a fee simple, to which the phrase used by the testator, was merely equivalent; indeed, it was only a substitute for the other and the proper words, which was allowed to supply the place of them only in wills. Co. Litt. 9, b.; 8 Vin. Abr. Devise, L. a. 205. There could be no difference in the intent, and consequently none in the effect, of a devise to each grandson in fee simple, and a devise (in the more apt technical words to pass a fee) to each and his heirs.

In the common case of a devise to A. and his heirs, and if he dies without issue or heirs of his body or the like, then over to B. "the devise to A. and his heirs, taken separately, would give him an estate in fee simple; but the subsequent words shew, that he intended to give an estate to B. also, and that that estate was made to depend on A.'s dying without issue. The question naturally arises, why was the interest of B. made to depend on A.'s dying without issue? Was it, that the testator intended it as a mere contingency, on which the estate of A. was to be intirely defeated? or was it, that he intended that if A. died leaving issue, that issue should have the estate, so long as there should be any issue? The courts, whose province it is to expound wills, have, from the beginning, uniformly and invariably, considered that it proceeded from an intention in the testator, to provide for the issue of the first taker, which intention could not be effected without holding that he took an estate tail, and not a fee simple. Therefore, the words if A. die without issue were held to control the previous words A. and his heirs, so as to give him a fee tail, and not a fee simple."

128 Per Cabell, J., in Jiggetts v. Davis, 1 Leigh, 419. Then, in the present case, where the devise was to each grandson in fee simple, and if he should die leaving no issue of his body, then to the survivor, was not the testator's intention to provide for the issue of the first takers, respectively, equally apparent? Was there any imaginable difference, as to the manifestation of intention to provide for the issue of the first taker, between the present and the more common forms of such devises? If the intent was to provide for the issue of the first takers, that intent could only be accomplished by giving them estates tail; and to that, the main intent, all particular and subordinate intents must give way.

Each of the devisees, therefore, took an estate tail in his moiety, with a contingent remainder thereon limited to the other, on the failure of issue of the first taker, unless the contingency be restrained to a failure of issue of the first taker living at his death; and distinctly, clearly, indisputably so restrained; for this rule is settled and inflexible, that no limitation shall be construed an executory devise, if it may be construed to be a remainder. See opinion of Green, J., in Jiggetts v. Davis, 1 Leigh, 402, 3. Now, the devise here was, in effect, thus: Devise of one moiety to each grandson to hold in fee simple, if each should have issue of his body, but if either should die leaving no such issue, then his moiety should pass to the surviving grandson. The phrase "if each should have issue of his body," was clearly explained by the words immediately following, to mean "if each should have and leave issue;" and the phrase would have imported the same sense, had it stood alone. Tate v. Tally,

3 Call, 354; Tidball v. Lupton, 1 Rand. 194; Romilly v. James, 6 Taunt. 263; 1 Com. Law Rep. 379. The limitation over, then, is made to depend, simply, on the contingency of the first taker dying without leaving issue of his body; and, in limitations of real estate, that phrase has always been held to import a general indefinite failure of issue. Forth v. Chapman, 1 P. Wms. 667, approved by this court in Hill v. Burrow, 3 Call, 349; Butler's Fearn, 129 476, 7. Nor *can the limitation over to the surviving grandson, restrain the generality of the contingency; for the phrase surviving grandson as here used, means only the other grandson. See opinion of Carr, J., in Bells v. Gillespie, 5 Rand. 278, 284.

Lastly, supposing that each of the devisees took a fee simple, in the first instance, and that the limitation over was an executory devise limited after the estate in fee, upon the failure of issue of the first taker, still it would be necessary to find some expressions in the will, precisely applicable to the limitation in question, and clearly restraining the contingency on which the executory devise was limited, to a failure of issue at the death of the first taker, or within twenty-one years after, the period indulged to executory devises; otherwise, the contingency was too remote, and the executory devise therefore void.

GREEN, J. The clause in Daniel Trabue's will, upon which the questions in this cause mainly depend, is (dropping the inoperative words) to this effect: after giving to his grandsons, the children of his deceased daughter, Mrs. Burfoot, real and personal property, in general terms, to be equally divided between them, the testator proceeds: "All the estate given to my grandsons is to be equally divided between them; each holding his part in fee simple, upon condition that each shall have issue of his body lawfully begotten; but if either of my grandsons should die leaving no such issue, then his share shall pass to the surviving grandson; and such survivor shall hold and enjoy in fee simple, the whole estate given to both, upon condition that such surviving grandson shall at the time of his death leave issue of his body lawfully begotten: but if both my grandsons shall depart this life, neither of them leaving such issue as aforesaid, and any of the children or grandchildren of my daughter Elizabeth should be then living, the whole estate given to my two grandsons, shall be considered as given for life only, and the same shall, after their death without such issue as aforesaid, be equally divided 130 in fee *simple amongst the issue of my daughter Elizabeth then living, and the children to such of them as may then be dead."

Neither party insists, that the terms upon condition used in this clause, make a common law condition, either precedent or subsequent. If it did, the main objects of the will would be defeated, whether it was considered as a condition precedent or subsequent; in the first case, it would leave the estates given, in express terms, immediately to the grandsons, to descend to the testator's heirs at law until the condition was performed; and in the other, upon the failure of the condition, the estates would revert to the heirs at law, and the limitations over be defeated, even if they were in all other respects good. They operate only as words of limitation, and are to be construed like any other words of limitation, according to the intent of the testator, to be gathered from his whole will.

The counsel for the appellant admitting this, insists, that the grandsons took, respectively, either estates in fee simple, with limitations over operating as valid executory devises, or estates for life with contingent remainders; and that, whether the words surviving grandson and such survivor, be taken according to their literal import, or as meaning other grandson; such other: while the counsel for the appellees insist, that they took estates tail.

One of the constructions relied upon on the part of the appellant, is, that the grandsons took, in their respective moieties, only estates for their lives, with a series of contingent remainders limited upon them, for life and in fee, to and between them, and to the issue of Mrs. M'Tyre, depending upon the event of one or both of them leaving or not leaving issue living at the time of the death. I do not think there is any foundation for this construction. The estates originally given to each, were declared, in express terms, to be in fee simple, to go over to the other in certain events, and finally, if both should die without leaving issue, to the issue of Mrs. M'Tyre, in which event only did the testator declare, that the whole estate given 131 to both should *be considered as given for life only. That event has not happened; and the estates, whether of fee simple or fee tail, originally given, remain unaffected by that declaration, even if they can be hereafter affected thereby, in the event of the death of both the grandsons without leaving issue. That declaration, however, although inefficient to reduce the estates originally given to estates for life, has some influence in determining the real question in the cause; which is, Whether the limitations over were intended by the testator, to take effect after an indefinite failure of the issue of the grandsons respectively, or only in the event of the failure of issue living at the time of their deaths respectively?

If he meant an indefinite failure of issue, the limitations over would be defeated, whether the original estate in fee simple was or was not converted, by the subsequent provisions of the will, into an estate tail; in the one case, by the limits imposed upon executory devises; in the other, by the operation of our statute converting estates tail into fees simple, and defeating all remainders limited thereon. If he meant a definite failure of issue, then the limitations over would be valid as executory devises, unless it be necessary, in order to effectuate the intention of the testator, according to the law as it was before the statute abolishing entails, by converting the estates in fee simple given in express terms, into estates tail.

Before examining these questions, it may be proper to remark, that whatever was the intention of the testator, in respect to the period when the limitations over should take effect, or whether the estates given to the grandsons were estates in fee simple or fee tail, it is necessary, in order to effect his obvious intention in respect to the disposition of the property given to his grandsons, to consider the words surviving grandson and such survivor as meaning other grandson and such other. For, taking those expressions of the will in their literal signification, the consequence would be, that if the grandson first dying left issue surviving him, and the other afterwards died without issue

132 surviving him, *the issue of the one first dying could not take the share of the one dying last, either as an executory devise, or as a contingent remainder limited upon an estate tail. If it was an estate in fee simple, it would descend to the heirs at law of the grandson last dying; his father, if living: if an estate tail, it would revert to the heirs at law of the testator. I speak of the law as it was before our statute converting estates tail into fees simple. But, under the operation of that statute, whether an estate in fee simple or fee tail, it would in such a case have descended to the heirs at law of the grandson. Such an event would have been contrary to the manifest intention of the testator; which was to give his whole estate (after providing for the support of his wife and living daughter for their lives, in equal or nearly equal proportions to the respective families of his living and deceased daughter) under such limitations, as to continue the proportion assigned to the family of his deceased daughter in her family, if either of her children had issue, but if not, then to transfer it to the family of his living daughter; and vice versa, to continue the proportion assigned to the family of the living daughter in her family, if she left any issue, and if not, to transfer it to the issue of his deceased daughter. These words, therefore, surviving grandson and such survivor, found in the clause of the will under consideration, give no aid in determining the intention of the testator, as to the period at which the limitations over were to take effect.

The settled construction of the expressions of this will: "upon condition that each shall have issue of his body lawfully begotten;" "but if either should die leaving no such issue;" "if both should depart this life, neither of them leaving such issue;" and "after their death without such issue," is, that they refer to an indefinite failure of issue, unless limited and controlled by some other provision or expression in the will. To justify the construction contended for by the appellant, it is necessary to find in it something shewing satisfactorily, that the testator, in all these expressions, intended to confine them to a failure of 133 the issue of the *grandsons, not at an indefinite period, but at the time of their respective deaths. And, I think, there is enough in the will for that purpose.

The testator repeatedly, and as it seems emphatically, declares, that his grandsons shall, if they have or leave issue, take and hold in fee simple, as contradistinguished from the life estates only, which in an after clause he declares they shall be considered as taking, if both should depart this life neither of them leaving such issue; a declaration totally inconsistent with the idea of the indefinite failure of issue, and absurd if applied to the case of one of them dying and leaving issue, and that issue inheriting until it failed; but perfectly apt and sensible, if applied to the case of both dying without leaving issue, living at the time of their respective deaths. Again, in providing for the case, in which one of the grandsons dying without issue, the other was to take his share, the testator says: "and such survivor shall hold and enjoy in fee simple the whole estate given to both, upon condition that such surviving grandson shall at the time of his death leave issue of his body lawfully begotten:" thus explicitly providing, in that particular instance, for the case of a failure of issue at the death of the devisee. And there is no imaginable motive, which could induce him to make any discrimination between the limitation in that particular case, and all others contained in this clause of the will.

The effect of the will, therefore, is to give to each of the grandsons an estate in fee, and if either of them died without issue living at the time of his death, to the other in fee, and if both died without issue living at their respective deaths, to the issue of Mrs. M'Tyre then living, in fee.

The other judges concurred, and the decree was reversed.

134 *Smoot v. Doe on Demise of Marshall.

Landlord and Tenant—Ejectment by Landlord—Evidence in Defence to Action.—Ejectment by M. against S. it appeared, that M. claimed under F. and that M. and S. had stood in relation of landlord and tenant for many years, but S. the tenant before the suit brought had disclaimed to hold under M. Tenant offers evidence, that F. by deed recorded in 1778 let the premises to L. for three lives, that L. in writing, but not by deed, had assigned term to H. and H. had in like manner assigned term to S. the tenant, with proof that S. had paid rent to M. but without any proof that any of the three lives on which the term depended were yet in existence. HELD, such evidence is admissible and proper evidence in defence to the action.

Ejectment for one hundred and fifty acres of land, brought by Marshall against Smoot in the circuit court of Fauquier. Smoot filed two bills of exceptions to opinions of the court given at the trial. There was a verdict and judgment for Marshall, from which Smoot appealed to this court.

I. The first bill of exceptions stated, that Marshall having proved that Smoot had occupied and possessed the premises as his tenant, and paid him an annual rent of forty shillings from the time he has so occupied the same until the 1st January 1819, Smoot's counsel thereupon moved the court to instruct the jury, that in order to maintain the action it was necessary Marshall should prove notice to Smoot to quit. And the court so held; and Marshall's counsel admitted it to be right, in the then state of the evidence; but he proceeded to state, that Smoot had before the institution of the suit disclaimed the tenancy he had theretofore held under Marshall, and held adversely to the title of his said lessor, and thus dispensed with notice to quit; and to prove this, he offered a witness to prove, that in a conversation with Smoot twelve months after the ejectment was brought, the witness asked Smoot what was his contention with Marshall? whether when he purchased his lease, he did not purchase for a term of lives? and whether he did not believe the lives had expired? To which Smoot 135 answered, *that he had purchased for a term of lives; that he did not know or care, whether the lives had expired or not; Marshall said so; but that was not his contention; he did not believe Marshall had sufficient title, and till he proved it to his satisfaction, he did not intend to give up the premises. Smoot's counsel objected to this evidence as improper and inadmissible: but the court overruled the objection, and admitted the evidence as proper to be left to the jury; as evidence from which the jury might infer (if it thought such inference just) that Smoot had, before the institution of the suit, disclaimed to hold as tenant of Marshall, and claimed to hold the premises adversely to him; and the court told the jury, that if the evidence proved this fact to its satisfaction, no notice to Smoot to quit was necessary. Smoot's counsel excepted.

II. The other bill of exceptions stated, that Smoot to sustain the issue on his part, offered in evidence, 1. a deed of lease of lord Fairfax, proprietor of the Northern Neck of Virginia under whom Marshall claimed, to Samuel Luttrell, dated the 1st November 1776, and duly recorded in Fauquier county court; whereby lord Fairfax leased the land in question to Luttrell for three lives, namely, for the lives of Luttrell himself, of his wife Dinah, and of his son Daniel, yielding and paying a yearly rent of thirty shillings sterling, with clauses of distress and re-entry for non-payment of rent or non-performance of covenants, and with divers special covenants, among which was a covenant that Luttrell should not procure or permit any person to occupy or cultivate the land as his sub-tenant for lives, for years or at will, and should not sell or assign his term without the license or consent of lord Fairfax, his heirs or assigns. 2. An instrument of writing, signed but not sealed by Luttrell, purporting to be an assignment by him to Christopher Hitch, of his term for lives in the premises: this instrument bore date the 14th September 1778, and was indorsed on the deed of lease. 3. The will of Christ. Hitch made and admitted to probat in Fauquier county court in the year 1805, 136 *whereby he devised his lease in the land in question, to his three sons, Levin, Elias, and Thomas Hitch. 4. Parol evidence, that Levin Hitch entered and held the premises from the death of his father till 1807. 5. An instrument of writing signed but not sealed by Levin Hitch, whereby he assigned all his interest in the lease to the defendant Smoot: this instrument was also indorsed on lord Fairfax's deed, and bore date the 11th March 1807. 6. Parol evidence that Smoot immediately entered into possession of the premises, and had thenceforth ever since held the same. And lastly, parol evidence to prove, that Smoot had paid the rent of forty shillings (Virginia currency) to Marshall, yearly, down to the 1st January 1819. To all of which evidence, except that last above mentioned, Marshall's counsel objected as being inadmissible: and the court was of that opinion, and exclude the evidence accordingly. And Smoot's counsel excepted.

I. Briggs for the appellant, argued, that the evidence of what Smoot had said twelve months after the institution of the ejectment, could afford no proof of a disclaimer by him of his tenancy under Marshall, before suit brought: the evidence only shewed the point of contention at that time; the ground on which he then relied as his defence against the action, not the point of contention which led to the institution of the action: therefore, the evidence was irrelevant and consequently inadmissible, since it could only tend to perplex and mislead, as it did in fact mislead the jury.

II. He contended, that the evidence of lord Fairfax's deed of lease to Luttrell for three lives, and the subsequent assignment of his estate by Luttrell to Hitch, and by Hitch's devisee to Smoot, and the parol evidence that Hitch, and his devisee, and Smoot, had successively entered and held under the deed of lease, and under the successive assignments thereof, were improperly excluded. Marshall could only recover by the strength of his own title.

He claimed title under lord Fairfax. 137 Here was a lease of lord *Fairfax for three lives, produced by Smoot, plainly evincing that lord Fairfax himself had title only to the reversion expectant on the three lives, and consequently, that Marshall claiming under him could be entitled to nothing else. And whatever Smoot's rights were, this evidence was sufficient proof, that Marshall had no right, unless he could shew on his part, that the lives had expired.

Leigh, for the appellee, said, I. That the objection taken to the evidence of Smoot's disclaimer of tenancy under Marshall before suit brought, and consequent waiver of notice to quit, was, in truth, an objection to the sufficiency of evidence, not to its competency: that the question as to its competency, depended on the single consideration, whether a party to a suit, in a conversation after suit brought, can disclose, not whether he in fact disclosed, the point of contention prior to the suit, out of which it originated. Smoot was asked, what was the contention between him and Marshall? that is, what was the point of controversy between them? He said, the contention on his part, was a denial of Marshall's title. Now, whether or no this related to the point of contention pre-existing the suit and out of which it grew, whether or no it was an avowal of a disclaimer of tenancy under Marshall before the suit was brought, was matter of inference from the evidence, and rightly left to the jury.

II. As to the other point, he said Smoot, clearly, did not shew any legal title in himself to Luttrell's lease for three lives. He exhibited a deed of lord Fairfax, and a parol assignment of the lease for lives, from Luttrell to Crist. Hitch, and another parol assignment from one of three devisees of Hitch, to himself; assignments, which if made by deed, had been contrary to the covenants of the deed of lease; parol assignments, which by law could not pass the title; for by express statutory provisions, such title could only be conveyed by deed. 1748, ch. 1, § 1, 5 Hen. stat. at large, 408; 1 Rev. Code, ch. 99, § 1, p. 361; 138 Smoot *then was setting up an outstanding estate in Luttrell for three lives, granted him half a century ago, without offering any proof, that either of the lives was in existence. He insisted, that if a defendant in ejectment may set up an outstanding title in a third person, in bar of the plaintiff's action, he must shew the title, and shew that it is outstanding and existing. Adams on eject. 285, 6.

He observed, that Marshall's title or claim of title was not stated in the bill of exceptions: we were only informed, generally, that he claimed under lord Fairfax, and that Smoot had paid him rent for several years down to the 1st January 1819; that is, that the parties stood in the relation of landlord and tenant. Now, that relation between the parties being established and admitted, it was not competent to the tenant to deny the landlord's title, and put him upon proof of it, though he might have proved, if he could, that the landlord's right had expired. Driver v. Laurence, 2 W. Black. 1259; England v. Slade, 4 T. R. 682. And the circumstance of the tenant having disclaimed tenancy under his landlord, ought not to vary the case; for if it were allowed to do so, the tenants would have it in their power, at all times, by simply disclaiming tenancy, to put their landlords on proof of title, and avail themselves of every flaw or defect in the title.

GREEN, J. The law in respect to notice to quit was correctly laid down by the court as stated in the first exception. But I strongly incline to think, that the evidence allowed to go to the jury, as tending to prove the fact of the defendant's disclaimer of his tenancy before the institution of the suit, had no such tendency, and ought therefore to have been rejected as irrelevant. But in this, I submit to the better judgment of my brethren.

The ground upon which the evidence offered by the defendant, mentioned in the second exception, was rejected, is not stated. If it was that a tenant cannot set up against his landlord in ejectment, 139 an adversary title in a stranger, *the principle of law, although true, was misapplied. The title set up here was a lease for lives, duly recorded, from lord Fairfax, under whom the lessor of the plaintiff claimed, to one under whom the tenant claimed, the validity of which the lessor of the plaintiff had admitted by the regular annual receipt of the rents stipulated by the lease, from the defendant, and those under whom he claimed, down to a period of 2 months before the institution of the suit. If the evidence was rejected, because the assignment of the lease under which the defendant claimed, not being by deed, did not pass the legal title to the freehold estate created by the lease, and so the defendant was setting up against his landlord a title in Luttrell, the lessee for lives, or his representatives, the answer is, that if the defendant had not the legal title, yet Luttrell was a stranger neither to the lessor of the plaintiff, nor the defendant. The latter being in possession with the assent of Luttrell, had the legal title under the lease, as his tenant at will or at sufferance, and so claimed under him, and that with the assent of the landlord, which was necessary according to the terms of the lease; and such a possession he had a right to maintain against the landlord, without violating any rule of law, as long as the lease continued. If the objection was, that the defendant was in possession, by the authority of one only of three tenants in common or joint tenant, neither was that a valid objection; for that permission gave him a right to hold in common or jointly with the others, and exclusively against all the world except those others. Upon this exception, I think the judgment should be reversed.

The other judges concurring on the last point, the judgment was reversed, and the cause remanded to the circuit court for a new trial.

(Absent COALTER, J.)

Suit for Freedom—Witness—Widow of Person from Whom Defendant Purchased Plaintiff.—In suit by persons held in slavery against their master to recover their freedom, defendant claimed plaintiffs as slaves by purchase of them as slaves from W. K. deceased; and plaintiffs offered K. K. widow of W. K. to prove that W. K. in his lifetime, before sale to defendant, repeatedly declared, in presence of his family, and without injunction of secrecy, that mother of plaintiffs then held by him in slavery, was an Indian woman: Held, widow not competent witness to prove such declarations of her deceased husband.

The appellants brought suit in forma pauperis, against the appellee by whom they were held in slavery, to recover their freedom, in the circuit court of Wythe. The proceedings and pleadings are in the usual form.

At the trial, the counsel for the appellants filed exceptions to an opinion of the court; which stated, that they introduced as a witness, Katharine King widow of William King deceased, to prove that she had heard him say, that Ester the mother of the Evidence—Witnesses—Husband or Wife.—It is a pervading principle of the law of evidence, that a husband or wife cannot be a witness in a cause, civil or criminal, in which the other is a party: not for that other, because the law considered them as one person, and their interests as identical: nor against that other, on grounds of public policy, because of the mutual confidence subsisting between them, and for fear of sowing distrust and dissensions and of giving occasion to perjury. William & Mary College v. Powell, 12 Gratt. 383; citing principal case. To the same effect, see principal case cited in Murphy v. Com., 23 Gratt. 960, 970; Kilgore v. Hanley, 27 W. Va. 453, 456. But see Acts of 1897-98, p. 753; Pol. Sup., § 3346a.

plaintiffs was an indian woman, she the witness being then the wife of King; that these declarations were made in the presence of the family, and they were not requested to keep them secret; and that they were repeatedly made by him. And it was admitted, that the defendant claimed the plaintiffs as slaves by purchase from William King. And the plaintiffs further offered to prove, that William King at the time he made the declarations above mentioned, held the said Esther and such of the plaintiffs as were then born, in his possession as slaves, that those declarations were made long before the sale of the plaintiffs to the defendant. But the court held, that the declarations of William King the husband, were not legal evidence, when disclosed by the wife as a witness. To this opinion the plaintiffs' counsel excepted: and verdict and judgment being rendered for the defendant, an appeal was taken for the paupers to this court.

141 *The case was argued here by Leigh, assigned by the court counsel for the appellants, and Johnson for the appellee.

CARR, J. The question is, whether or no the circuit court erred in rejecting the evidence of William King's widow, as to declarations of her husband in his lifetime? And I have seldom examined a question, about which my mind felt at first more doubt, not about the general doctrine, but as to its application to this particular case.

It is well settled, "that husband and wife cannot be witnesses for each other, because their interests are identical, nor against each other, on grounds of public policy, for fear of creating distrust, and sowing dissension between them, and occasioning perjury." It would also violate that confidence, which from the nature of the relation ought to be regarded as sacred, and would be arming each of the parties with the means of offence, which might be used for very dangerous purposes. So important is this rule, that the law will not suffer it to be broken even by agreement; for in Barker v. Dixie, Rep. Temp. Hardw. 264, lord Hardwicke would not suffer a wife to be examined against her husband, though he consented that she might. And this rule is adhered to, though the marriage tie be dissolved by the death of one of the parties, or by a divorce. Aveson v. Kinnaird, 6 East. 192; Monroe v. Twisleton, Peake's ev. app. lxxxvii. It is very clear from these and other cases, that where either is a party, the other is altogether incompetent.

The difficulty with me, arises from the fact, that in the case before us, neither the husband, nor his representative is a party; nor would the judgment in this case, as I apprehend, be evidence in a suit by the vendee of the slave against the representative of the husband, further than to shew the fact of the recovery. Still this case comes within the class treated of by Starkie in his law of evidence (part IV, p. 708,) under the second head, viz. "Where one of them (husband and wife) not being a party, is 142 interested in a proceeding *between others." For here, though a judgment for the plaintiffs would not charge the representative, it would lead inevitably to an action against him, while a verdict for the defendant would render him secure. The husband then if alive would feel an interest in this case. But I find several cases in the books, which say that it is not such an interest, as of itself will render the wife incompetent. Thus, in Williams v. Johnson, 1 Stra. 504, the action was against the daughter's husband for her wedding clothes: defence, that the goods were furnished on the credit of her father: and to prove this, the mother who was present at the choosing of the goods, was called to charge her husband, and allowed. And this case has not only never been overruled, but other cases are founded on it, and I see it referred to as good law in the latest books. It is this class of cases which has puzzled me. But upon reflection, I think I see a distinction between them and the case at bar, which becomes material, when we look at the reason of the rule, which disqualifies husband and wife from giving evidence against each other. It is not merely the interest, nor indeed, chiefly the interest of the parties, that thus disqualifies them; but the near relation in which they stand, and the unbounded confidence so essential to that relation, that the law will not suffer it to be violated. Thus, in Aveson v. Kinnaird, where the declarations of a wife (dead at the time of trial) were sought to be used against the husband, lord Ellenborough, among the reasons for admitting them, says, "No confidence has been violated, nothing extracted from the bosom of the wife, which was confided there by the husband." So, in Monroe v. Twisleton, when the wife, then divorced, and again married, was called to prove a contract against her former husband, lord Alvanley said, "to prove any fact arising after the divorce, this lady is a competent witness, but not to prove a contract or any thing else, which happened during the coverture. She was at that time bound to secrecy; what she did might be in consequence of the trust and confidence reposed in 143 her by her husband; and *miserable indeed would the condition of a husband be, if when a woman is divorced from him, perhaps for her own misconduct, all the occurrences of his life, intrusted to her while the most perfect and unbounded confidence existed between them, should be divulged in a court of justice." In the case of Le Texier v. Margravine of Anspach, 15 Ves. 165, the wife being made a party with her husband, and charged as his agent, and having documents in her possession, and made a party for discovery only as to her, and relief against the husband, lord Eldon said, "Before a married woman can be made a party, upon the same principle that an agent of a corporation is made a party, other principles must be broken through, long acknowledged by the law; arising out of the relation of husband and wife: a case in which it is almost impossible to represent the degree of inconvenience that will result, from the adoption of this principle; and the particular mischief must be met with the observation, that it must be endured, rather than that a general mischief should be introduced, which is against all policy, and would break in intirely upon the happiness of private life." These are cases in which the husband was a party, but the principle applies also where he is no party: for, in the one case or the other, it is equally a violation of the confidence reposed, to divulge in a court of justice, what was imparted in the sacred privacy of domestic intercourse. And of this opinion Starkie seems to be (part IV, p. 709,) when he says, "Where neither of them is either a party to the suit, or interested in the general result, the husband or wife is, it seems, competent to prove any fact, provided the evidence does not directly criminate the other, or, as it seems, involve the disclosure of some communication made by the other." Now, the case from Strange did not violate this rule: the wife disclosed no communication: but being present when the goods were bought, she was called to prove on whose credit the sale was made. But is not our case very different? I think so. The husband was at the time holding in slavery, the mother and her children: if she 144 was *an indian woman, they were all entitled to their freedom. Can we possibly suppose, that he meant to make such a declaration public? It is stated, that the party offered to prove that the declarations were made repeatedly in the presence of the family, and they were not requested to keep them secret. This could only (I presume) be proved by the wife; and I question the propriety of permitting her thus to qualify herself to disclose such communications. But suppose it proved, that the declarations were so made, and no secrecy enjoined; would it follow, that the husband wished or expected they should be divulged? Are we to say, that every word spoken, in the thoughtless, careless confidence of the domestic circle, is free for public disclosure, unless secrecy be expressly enjoined? Is not the converse of the proposition true? And would it not have a most mischievous effect, would it not seriously break in upon that confidence which is the charm of domestic life, if men should, from our decisions, have cause to fear, that after they were in their graves, their reputation might be injured, and their children ruined, by the declarations they had made in the bosoms of their families? This freedom from restraint or apprehension, in the intercourse of one's own fire-side, seems to me so necessary to the quiet and repose of society, that I am fearful of trenching upon it in the slightest degree.

The case of Baring v. Reeder, 1 Hen. & Munf. 154, mentioned at the bar, was not like this. Baring had lent Mrs. Claiborne some personal property; her husband made Reeder an absolute bill of sale for it, but the possession remained; Baring hearing of the bill of sale, took back into his own possession the property he had lent; Reeder brought trover against him for it; and Mrs. C. was offered as a witness to prove the loan, and that she had told Reeder of it: there was no confidence violated there, nor was her husband's interest involved; and I think with judge Roane, that he, as well as his wife, might have been examined.

The other judges concurring, the judgment was affirmed.

*M'Kays v. Hite and Others.

March, 1830.

(Absent GREEN and CARR. J.*)

Injunction—Death of Parties—Dissolution—Erroneous Order.—Four plaintiffs in equity unite in same bill, praying injunction to stay proceedings on four several judgments at law against them, respectively, on grounds of equity common to all; the bill is exhibited against five parties defendants: the injunction awarded; pending suit, two of plaintiffs and three of defendants die; and chancellor makes an order, that unless living plaintiffs, and representatives of deceased plaintiffs, revive the injunction, in name of representatives of deceased plaintiffs, against representatives of deceased defendants, on or before a given day, the injunction shall stand and be dissolved: this order is irregular and erroneous.

There was a bill exhibited in the superior court of chancery of Staunton in 1803, by Andrew M'Kay, Jeremiah M'Kay, Robert M'Kay and William Tyler, against Isaac Hite executor of Joist Hite, James Williams, Jonathan Clarke, and James, Samuel and Moses Green; one object of which was, to injoin further proceedings at law on four several judgments that had been recovered by Williams and Clarke (who are the agents of the other parties) against the four plaintiffs respectively, for large debts due by them on bonds given for the purchase money of lands, which Williams and Clarke had been authorised to make sale of by a private act of assembly. The injunction was awarded. The rights of the grantees and settlers under the grant of 100,000 acres of lands, made in 1731, to Joist Hite and Robert M'Kay (see 2 Rev. Code, app. II, § 15, p. 346,) were involved in the controversy: and the four plaintiffs, though the judgments at law against them were several, relied on the same grounds for relief in equity. The suit was transferred to the superior court of chancery of Winchester in 1812; and there, at the August rules 1812, the deaths of the plaintiff Andrew M'Kay and the defendant Jonathan Clarke were suggested on the record; whereupon 146 all proceeding *in the cause was suspended, for many years, and, in the interval, others of the parties died. At December term 1823, the chancellor made an order in these words:

"It being suggested to the court, that Andrew M'Kay and William Tyler, two of the plaintiffs, are dead, and also that James Williams, Jonathan Clarke and Samuel Green, three of the defendants, are dead; it is ordered, that unless the plaintiffs who are living, and the representatives of those who are dead, shall revive the injunction, against the representatives of the deceased defendants, in the names of the representatives of the deceased plaintiffs, on or before the 5th day of the next term, the injunction shall stand and be dissolved as an act of this day."

And at the next term in April 1824, the court made the following final order: "The injunction in this case having been dissolved at the last term, and no good cause having been shewn for continuing the same, it is therefore adjudged, ordered and decreed, that the bill of the plaintiffs be dismissed, with costs" &c.

From this decree, the surviving plaintiffs Jeremiah and Robert M'Kay afterwards prayed an appeal to this court.

Wyndham Robertson for the appellants. The orders were wholly irregular. The first of them was a rule nisi not only on the living plaintiffs who were before the court, but on the representatives of the deceased plaintiffs who were not before the court; a rule requiring the living and the representatives of the deceased plaintiffs, to revive the suit against the living and the representatives of the deceased defendants, on or before a given day, without information or inquiry, who were the representatives, or whether there were any representatives of the deceased parties, without any requisition that this rule should be served on the parties, or the representatives of the parties, whom it affected. The regular effect of the deaths of the parties plaintiffs, in case of their representatives failing to revive the suit at or before the second term after their deaths suggested on the 147 record, *was a discontinuance as to them; and the effect of the deaths of the parties defendants, was a revival by scire facias against their representatives, or by their voluntary appearance. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 38, pp. 497, 8. The court surely could not compel the representatives of the deceased plaintiffs, to revive and prosecute the suit, whether they thought it advisable or no: they had a right to abandon the controversy, if they saw fit: but here is an order, in effect, to compel the living plaintiffs, to compel the representatives of the deceased plaintiffs, to revive and prosecute the suit against the representatives of the deceased defendants, upon pain of having the injunction dissolved as to themselves, and their bill eventually dismissed; and this, when for aught that appeared to the court, there might be no representatives of the deceased plaintiffs, or of the deceased defendants, upon and against whom the living plaintiffs could act. As to the decree of dismissal, that was not a consequence of the previous rule nisi, which indicated not the dismissal of the bill, but only the dissolution of the injunction, in case the parties should fail to revive the suit; and even if the rule nisi were regular, the decree of dismissal is palpably wrong. It is a final decree for and against deceased parties, whose representatives were not before the court, and that because they were not before the court.

Green and Stanard for the appellees. The peculiarity of the case should be considered. Four plaintiffs uniting in the same bill, had obtained an injunction to stay proceedings at law on four several and distinct judgments against each of the plaintiffs respectively. The process of injunction was in effect several. The first order is to be read distributively; and then it will import, that unless each living plaintiff, and the respective representatives of each deceased plaintiff should take the proper steps to revive the suit against the representatives of the deceased defendant, the injunction should stand dissolved as to each living plaintiff and the representatives of each deceased plaintiff, respectively. The 148 *order was in truth an order to speed the cause; and properly understood, it imposed no other duty on the living plaintiffs but to revive the suit for themselves. If either of the living plaintiffs had sued a subpoena scire facias against the representatives of the deceased defendants, the order would have been discharged as to him. There was no other or more proper method to compel them to proceed. As the chancellor, before he interfered by way of injunction to a judgment at law, may hold parties asking such interference at his hands, to reasonable terms, so he may impose reasonable terms upon them, as the condition of continuing his interference; and no terms can be more reasonable, than to require the plaintiffs to use common diligence in prosecuting their suit. The decree of dismissal is doubtless wrong, and ought to be corrected. It ought to have been only an absolute order of dissolution of the injunction. But this was obviously a clerical mistake, not an error of judgment in the court.

Johnson in reply. Supposing that the order nisi may be read distributively, and that it is to be understood as the counsel for the appellees explain it, yet it is wholly irregular; for it is still an order upon the representatives of the deceased plaintiffs, not before the court, and even not known to be in existence. A discontinuance as to them would have answered every purpose. And the representatives of the deceased defendants might have voluntarily appeared and asked to be let in to defend the rights of their respective testators or intestates. But the order cannot be read distributively as proposed: the four plaintiffs had joined in the bill, asking relief against several judgments at law against them, indeed, but on the same grounds of equity common to them all; and whether or no it was originally proper for them to join in one bill, the process of injunction was one and entire, for all the plaintiffs against joint defendants in equity. The chancellor's order so regards it, and makes the complete revival of the injunction, by all the living and all the representatives of the deceased plain- 149 tiffs, against all the *living and all the representatives of the deceased defendants, the condition on which the injunction should be continued. The chancellor may impose reasonable terms as the condition of continuing his interference by way of injunction, as well as of his interference in the first instance; he may require the party to do what it is his duty to do: but here the objection is, that the terms were unreasonable, since the parties were required to do what it was not their duty to do.

The Court being of opinion, that the order of December 1823, as well as the decree of dismissal was clearly erroneous, reversed them both, and remanded the cause.

Chancery Practice—Avoidance of Contract—Inadequacy of Price.—Inadequacy of price, whether it be so gross as to be per se proof of fraud or not, if attended by circumstances evincing unconscientious advantage taken by vendee of improvidence and distress of vendor, will avoid the contract in equity, though it be a contract executed.

*He decided the cause in the court of chancery.

Same—Vendor of Expectant Interest—Quere.—Whether every vendor of an expectant interest is not to be regarded in equity as a young heir dealing for his expectancies:

Same—Same.—But clear, that very anxious protection is extended by equity to all persons selling expectant interests, whether they stand in relation of expectant heirs or not, and trivial circumstances, added to inadequacy of price, sufficient to set aside such sales.

The appellee's testator, Thomas Pinckard, being entitled to a share of the reversion or remainder of sundry slaves, expectant on the life of Judith Fauntleroy, conveyed the same, by bill of sale dated the 28th November 1809, to the appellant, Armstrong M'Kinney, for the consideration of 156 dollars cash. This expectant interest of Pinckard was worth, at the time of the sale 150 thereof to M'Kinney, *on a fair estimate, taking Mrs. Fauntleroy's expectation of life to be five years, at least 1300 dollars. Mrs. Fauntleroy was then 56 years old, in very bad health, seldom free from disease, and subject to frequent recurrence of acute diseases; but, contrary to the expectation of her acquaintances, she lived till the 30th January 1817. Pinckard was a young man about 23 years of age, of improvident, extravagant, dissipated disposition and habits, embarrassed in his affairs, and in great distress for money. M'Kinney was a deputy sheriff of the county of Westmoreland, where Pinckard lived; and shortly before the contract, he had had several executions against Pinckard in his hands, which had been satisfied by forced sales of his property; he held one execution against him, for a small amount, at the time of the contract; and other executions were, probably, anticipated by both parties; for early in 1810, two others, on judgments of Westmoreland county court, were issued against Pinckard, one of which was returned no effects: whence it was inferred, that M'Kinney must have been apprised of the embarrassed state of his affairs, at the time of the contract. Mrs. Fauntleroy, the tenant for life, however, did not reside in Westmoreland, but in the neighbouring county of Essex; and there was no direct proof, that M'Kinney was acquainted with her, her time of life or state of health, or with the number or description of the slaves held by her for life.

Pinckard died in the early part of the year 1814; having some short time before his death, offered to redeem the property, by repaying to M'Kinney the money he had received of him, alleging, that there was a secret agreement between them that he should have the right of redemption; upon which, M'Kinney, without denying the fact of any such agreement, refused to permit the redemption, unless Pinckard would pay him other monies which he said he owed him. Shortly after Pinckard's death, his executor tendered to M'Kinney, the purchase money he had paid Pinckard, with interest; and M'Kinney refusing to 151 receive *it, he deposited the amount in the hands of a third person, and gave notice to M'Kinney, that it would be paid to him whenever he should choose to receive it.

Pinckard's will was admitted to probat, and letters testamentary granted to his executor, on the 23d May 1814. After Mrs. Fauntleroy's death in January 1817, the executor took possession of his testator's share of the slaves in question. And, on the 21st May 1819, he exhibited his bill against M'Kinney, in the superiour court of chancery of Fredericksburg, detailing the facts of the transaction; impugning the contract between him and Pinckard, on the ground that it was a purchase of an expectant interest in property for a grossly inadequate price, from a young heir, with full knowledge of his thoughtless improvident character, his habits of dissipation and extravagance, the embarrassment of his affairs, and his distress for money; charging, that the purchase, under such circumstances, and for such a price, was oppressive and fraudulent; and praying, that M'Kinney on being reimbursed the purchase money with interest, might be compelled to release all claim under the bill of sale of November 1809.

M'Kinney, in his answer, controverted those allegations of the bill, which imputed to him actual fraud, overreaching, and taking advantage of the known improvidence and distress of Pinckard; and strenuously insisted, that the contract was fair in fact, and valid.

The material facts of the case, as above stated, were, in the opinion of the chancellor and of this court, proved by the parol and documentary evidence taken and filed in the cause. There was evidence also, tending to prove, what Pinckard had alleged in his lifetime, that the bill of sale in question, was not intended as an absolute deed, but was, in truth, conditional and defeasible; but that point was not put in issue by the pleadings.

The chancellor decreed, that upon the payment or tender, by Pinckard's executor to M'Kinney, of the sum of 156 dollars, with interest from the 28th November 152 1809 till paid *or tendered (subject to a deduction of the plaintiff's costs in this suit) M'Kinney should release and convey to Pinckard's executor, all his interest and claim under the bill of sale of the 28th November 1809. From which decree, M'Kinney appealed to this court.

Leigh, for the appellant. There never has been any case, in which mere inadequacy of price has been held sufficient ground for refusing specific execution of an executory contract, much more for annulling an executed contract. To set aside a conveyance, the inequality of the contract must be so glaring, as that the bare stating of it shall shock the conscience of any man of common sense; such as affords evidence of actual fraud. The true and only ground of relief, in such cases, is fraud. Gwynne v. Heaton, 1 Bro. C. C. 1; Osgood v. Franklin, 2 Johns. Ch. Rep. 1, 23, 14 Johns. Rep. 527; S. C., and 1 Fonb. eq. book I, ch. II, § 9, 10, pp. 127, 130,*

*Second American Edition. Philadelphia, 1820.

Sugd. Law Vend. ch. V, § 1, 2, 3, 4, pp. 189, 194,* where the cases are collected. The present is not the case of a young heir selling his expectancy; as to which there is a peculiar doctrine, grounded on peculiar principles; Sugd. Ibid. Pinckard was not a young heir. But this was a sale of a reversionary interest; and there, in my view, lies the stress of the case. A very anxious protection is extended by courts of equity to all persons selling reversionary or other interests in expectancy; and, in such cases, the burden has been imposed on the purchaser to shew the adequacy of the consideration paid; yet, even in these cases, the courts relieve on the ground of fraud or imposition, expressly proved, or implied from the inadequacy of the consideration. Sugd. ubi supra; Cole v. Gibbons, 3 P. Wms. 290; Gowland v. De Faria, 17 Ves. 20; Roche v. O'Brien, 1 Ball & Beat. 330. These doctrines are, we know, of easy application 153 in England. But it would be very difficult, if not impossible, to apply them here; and very harsh, indeed, to infer actual fraud from the inadequacy of the price given for a reversionary or expectant interest in slaves in Virginia. For, the market value of such property is very fluctuating, and it is liable to casualties that may impair and destroy its value; and, in the practice of the country, there is no method in general use, for estimating the present value of such expectancies. Accordingly, it is every day's experience, that expectant interest in slaves, even when fairly sold at public auction, are always sold at an immense sacrifice. And, in the case before the court, it seems hardly possible to charge the purchaser with fraud, seeing that he knew not, and had no means of knowing, and that the vendor did know, the circumstances on which the value of the subject depended; the number, namely, and quality of the slaves, and the state of Mrs. Fauntleroy's health, and her probable expectation of life. In the present case, too, there has been an acquiescence in the contract for such a length of time, as ought to preclude the executor of the vendor from the relief he is seeking. I do not count the time that elapsed between the date of the sale and the death of Pinckard, because he continued in the same situation in which he was when he made the contract, (Gowland v. De Faria, ubi supra) but, counting from the death of Pinckard early in 1814, to the bringing of this suit in May 1819, more than five years, the legal period of limitation to a claim for slave property, elapsed, during which the executor, who certainly lay under no embarrassments, and was suffering no distresses, that could prevent him from seeking relief, remained silent and inactive. Moth v. Atwood, 5 Ves. 845; Medlicott v. O'Donel, 1 Ball & Beat. 166. Lastly, the chancellor ought not to have decreed the plaintiff his costs; on the contrary, the case of Gowland v. De Faria (following numerous precedents in this respect) shews that the defendant was entitled to have his costs.

154 *Wyndham Robertson, for the appellee. When the court considers the facts; that the purchaser was deputy sheriff, with process frequently in his hands against the vendor for debt, and that the vendor's improvident and prodigal habits, by which he had wasted his substance, were notorious throughout the country, it is impossible to doubt that M'Kinney was as well and probably better apprised, than any body else, of Pinckard's character, and of his necessities and distress for money. Neither can it possibly be believed, that M'Kinney made the purchase, without inquiry as to the quantity and value of the property he bought, and the state of health of the tenant for life. And if he made any inquiry at all, he must have got such information as satisfied him, that Pinckard was making an utter sacrifice of his property for present relief. There is, indeed, no direct evidence that he made such inquiry or acquired such knowledge; but the inference from the circumstances is irresistible, that he must have had full knowledge, and that he wilfully took advantage of Pinckard's improvidence and distress. There was actual fraud. The consideration paid was not an eighth of the value of the subject upon the lowest estimate: and if this be not, it is hard to imagine what would be, so gross and glaring an inequality of itself to evince fraud, imposition, overreaching, and taking an iniquitous advantage of the situation of another, in a bargain. Add to this, Pinckard was a reversioner or a remainder-man, selling his expectancy, and selling it for relief from present distress: and as I understand the cases on the subject, equity regards him in the same light with an heir dealing away his expectancies, and protects him from the effects of his own improvidence, whether any actual fraud can be brought home to the purchaser or not. Peacock v. Evans, 16 Ves. 512; Gowland v. De Faria, cited by Mr. Leigh; Butler v. Haskell, 4 Desaus. Ch. Rep. 651, 687, 8. Then, as to the effect of the executor's acquiescence to preclude him from relief: 1. the executor did not qualify till the 23d May 1814, and the bill was filed the 21st May 1819, and 155 *the process probably issued before, so that full five years had not elapsed: 2. there was no acquiescence; for both Pinckard in his lifetime, and his executor shortly after his death, insisted that the contract was void, or at least defeasible, and offered to refund the purchase money to M'Kinney: and 3. the property had been in the executor's hands, ever since Mrs. Fauntleroy's death; and, surely, nothing in the nature of a limitation can run against a person in actual possession of the subject. It would even seem that M'Kinney had acquiesced in the claim of Pinckard's executor.

CABELL, J. The question is, Whether the contract between Pinckard and M'Kinney ought to be set aside by a court of equity?

The evidence proves, incontestibly, the improvidence and prodigality of Pinckard, the embarrassment of his affairs, and his pecuniary distress at the time he entered into this hard bargain; and that M'Kinney, of all men, had the best opportunity of knowing, and doubtless best knew, his disposition, his habits, and his wants. And the circumstances of the transaction leave no room to doubt, that, if M'Kinney was not aware of the exact extent of the advantage he gained, or had not calculated it with all the precision the subject admitted of, he could not but have known, that there was a very great and most unconscionable inequality between the value of the property he bought and the consideration he paid for it.

If the sale had been a sale of property in possession, and not of a reversionary interest, I will not say that the inadequacy of price, considered apart from all the other circumstances of the case, is or is not so gross as to be ipso facto proof of fraud: but I am clearly of opinion, that if it had been a sale of property in possession, the inadequacy of price taken in connexion with the attendant circumstances, would be proof of an unconscientious and iniquitous advantage, taken by cunning and rapacity over improvidence and distress, that must be reprobated by a court of equity. But the case is still stronger, when we consider it as the sale of an expectant interest. It is not necessary, in this case, to decide whether every seller of an expectant interest is to be treated as an expectant heir: on that point, therefore, I give no opinion. But it is very clear, that a very anxious protection is extended by equity, to persons selling expectant interest, although they do not stand in the relation of expectant heirs; and that trivial circumstances, added to the inadequacy of price, will be sufficient to set aside such sales. Wiseman v. Beake, 2 Vern. 121; Cole v. Gibbons, 3 P. Wms. 290; Bowes v. Heaps, 3 Ves. & Beam. 117.

W. also shall join in and execute the bond as co-surety; but O. W. never unites in the bond: HELD, that upon this state of facts, neither P. nor K. are liable for any part of the debt in equity, any more than they would be liable for any part of it at law, where the facts would amount to proof of non est factum.

forth, that in July 1823, John Seevers, the deputy marshal of that court, came to his house, with three several forthcoming bonds, taken upon three several executions, sued out by Donald & Ridgely, Smith, and Spalding & Macomb, respectively, against Harrison Waite, which bonds were then signed by Waite the principal, and by J. S. Porterfield as a surety; and Seevers importuned King, who was sick in bed at the time, to execute them also, as a surety; and King at length did agree to sign, and signed the bonds, and delivered them to Seevers, but upon the express condition, that Obed Waite, the father of the debtor, should also sign them as a surety, and if he refused to do so, that the bonds should not be obligatory on King. That the reason of his insisting on this condition, was, that he knew if Obed Waite joined in the bonds, he would not permit his co-sureties to suffer any loss. That Obed Waite never executed the bonds: yet they were returned by Seevers to the court. That the first had been discharged, and part of the second had been paid. That though King delivered the bonds as an escrow, to be binding on a condition which had never been performed, Smith and Spalding & Macomb had recently obtained award of execution on the two bonds taken to them respectively; 158 and, as Harrison Waite the principal, was insolvent, King and Porterfield were thus liable at law for the whole amount. That the reason why this matter was not relied on as a defence against the motion for award of execution on the bonds, was, that King never had any notice of the motion. The bill, therefore, made Smith, Spalding & Macomb, the administrators of Seevers the deputy marshal (who was now dead), Waite the principal, and Porterfield the co-surety, parties defendants; and prayed that Smith and Spalding & Macomb should be enjoined from further proceedings at law upon the forthcoming bonds. The injunction was awarded.

The defendants Smith the creditor in one of the bonds, the administrator of Seevers the deputy marshal, and Waite the principal debtor, filed their answers. Neither of them directly denied the allegations of the bill, as to the condition on which King joined in the bonds. But they all averred their belief, that those allegations were untrue; and they stated several circumstances that seemed inconsistent and irreconcilable with King's account of the transaction.

A son of the plaintiff (who was in his fifteenth year at the date of the bonds) deposed, that he was present when his father signed them; and he testified directly and positively, to the truth of the material allegations of the bill. On the other hand, there were depositions of several witnesses, proving expressions and conduct of King, which evinced, that he regarded the bonds as his deeds after he had been apprised what parties had in fact executed them.

Pending this suit, Porterfield, the other surety, also exhibited a bill in the same court; in which, referring to King's bill, he stated, that he had signed the bonds, upon the express condition that King should join in them as his co-surety, otherwise they should not be obligatory on him; and that, finding from King's bill, that he had never so executed them as to make them his deeds, if they were not obligatory on King, then neither were they obligatory on Porterfield. Therefore, the bill prayed an injunction to stay further proceedings 159 *at law on the bonds as against Porterfield also. And this injunction was awarded.

To this bill the creditor Smith and Waite the principal, put in their answers. Smith's answer did not respond to the material allegation of the bill. Waite, in his answer, expressly stated that it was exactly true.

On motions made to dissolve both injunctions, chancellor Tucker was of opinion, that whatever might be the fact as to the delivery of the bonds as escrows by King and Porterfield, they both executed them contemplating a liability by reason thereof; King contemplating a liability to the extent of one third at least, and Porterfield, of one half; for which proportions they ought, in equity, to be held liable in any event. Therefore, he dissolved the injunction that had been awarded to King, as to one third of the amount due upon the bonds, and that awarded to Porterfield, as to another third thereof. And he ordered issues to be made up and tried at the bar of the circuit court of Frederick, to ascertain, 1. Whether the forthcoming bonds were executed and delivered by Porterfield, upon the express condition that they should be also executed by King? and 2. Whether they were executed and delivered by King, with a like condition, that they should also be executed by Obed Waite?

King and Porterfield appealed to this court.

The causes were argued here by Leigh for the appellants, and Johnson for the appellees. There was some discussion of the questions of fact, upon the evidence: however, the only point was, Whether, supposing the allegations of the bill true, King, and by consequence Porterfield, ought, in equity, to be held partially bound by the bonds, upon the principle declared by the chancellor, or ought to be intirely discharged from the obligation thereof.

BROOKE, P. The chancellor considered, that King executed the bonds in question, contemplating a liability to pay 160 *one third of their amount at least; and Porterfield executed them contemplating a liability to pay one half their amount at least; therefore, however the facts might be, whether the bonds were delivered as escrows or not, they were liable in a court of equity, to the extent so contemplated by them, when they signed the bonds: in which I think he was intirely mistaken.

The appellants are bound, jointly or separately, for the whole amounts of the debts injoined, or they are not bound to any amount. A surety is not bound in equity, unless he is bound at law. There must be two parties to a contract: unless the understanding of the appellants as to the extent of the demand against them, according to the chancellor's view of their undertaking, was the understanding of the other party also, they are not bound by it, in law or equity. Had the allegations in the bill been proved in trials at law on special pleas of non est factum, the judgments must have been for the appellants, as to the whole amount of the bonds in question; and equity must follow the law.

The rest of the decree is also imperfect. The issue directed by the chancellor, is not as broad as it ought to have been: it ought to have been, to inquire whether the bonds in question were the deeds of the appellants, or not; as would have been the inquiry at law, on special pleas of non est factum. That I think the proper inquiry to be made, as I do not think the circumstances proved in evidence, though very strong, sufficient to justify a court of equity in decreeing against the positive testimony of one witness in support of the allegations of the bill, who is unimpeached.

The decrees are, therefore, reversed; the injunctions reinstated as to the whole amounts of the claims on the bonds; and the causes remanded, for further proceedings to be had in both cases according to the principles here declared.

*Leavell v. Robinson.

Bank Stock—Transfer of—Security or Conditional Sale—Quære—Question, whether a transfer of bank stock was, under all circumstances of transaction, a security or indemnity provided for the transferee, and therefore redeemable; or a conditional sale, which became absolute by non-performance of the condition?

This was a bill exhibited in the superiour court of chancery of Fredericksburg, by Robinson against Leavell, praying to redeem eight shares of stock of the Farmers' Bank of Virginia, which Robinson had previously transferred to Leavell.

The case was thus: Robinson, being possessed of the eight shares of stock, had obtained from the office of the bank at Fredericksburg, a loan of 560 dollars, on the credit of the stock, that is, on a pledge thereof, by way of security; he executed what is called a stock note for the debt, in the usual form. Stock having afterwards fallen in value, and Robinson's personal security not being good at the bank, he was required to give additional security, as a condition of the continuance of the accommodation; which he accomplished by transferring the stock to Johnson, who thereupon pledged the same stock, and gave his own stock note, for the debt, in lieu of that which had been before given by Robinson. This was done by Johnson for Robinson's accommodation. Some differences having subsequently arisen between Robinson and Johnson, it became materially desirable to them, that Johnson should be relieved from the responsibility he had thus incurred for Robinson. The bank, however, was still unwilling to take a pledge of the stock, and Robinson's own stock note, for the debt, without some farther security; and he was, therefore, compelled to find some other friend to take Johnson's place. He applied to Leavell. Leavell was very reluctant to involve himself in this responsibility: but he was at length persuaded to take 162 *a transfer of the stock to himself, and to pledge the same, and give his own stock note, to the bank, for the debt of 560 dollars, in lieu of that which had been given by Johnson, upon an express, clear and definite understanding, between him and Robinson, reduced to writing the day before the note was given, that if at the expiration of 60 days when the note was made payable, Robinson should fail to make arrangements for relieving Leavell from all responsibility on the note, the stock should then be the absolute property of Leavell. Of this agreement, there was also positive and distinct parol evidence.

Sometime before this note of Leavell came to maturity, he called at the bank, to know the terms on which the directors would agree to release him, and take Robinson's note instead of his; and was informed, that this would be done on the debt being reduced from 560 to 480 dollars. A few days before the note became due, Leavell again called at the bank, and left there a power of attorney for transferring the stock to Robinson, or any other person he might appoint; saying, he expected Robinson would be prepared to take up the note. But so far from making any arrangement for that purpose, Robinson did not even offer to pay the discount for the renewal of the accommodation; neither did he ever make an offer to pay either the principal or interest due on the note, or make any demand for the stock, till about twelve months afterwards, when the stock had risen above its par value of 100 dollars the share.

At the time Leavell received the transfer of the stock, it was worth only 64 or 65 dollars the share; that is, less by five or six dollars per share, than the sum he became bound for to the bank: there was, however, some expectation that it would rise. And although by the time the note came to maturity, stock had been sold at Richmond for 76 dollars the share, yet it did not appear, that any such rise had taken place, or was even known, at Fredericksburg: on the contrary, a witness for Robinson, speaking of the price of stock at Fredericksburg, a few days before the note became due,
 163 *as compared with what it had been at the date of the note, said, "Bank stock was a little better, or there was more confidence in the stock."

After the note given by Leavell for the debt came to maturity, it was renewed at bank, from time to time, on Leavell's own account and for his accommodation, he paying the discounts; and the principal was still due to the bank, at the time Robinson's bill was filed. And Leavell received all the dividends that accrued on the stock from the time of the transfer to him.

Chancellor Browne declared, that the transfer of the stock by Robinson to Leavell, was only a pledge or security to indemnify Leavell from loss, in case the former should fail to discharge the stock note executed by the latter to the bank for his accommodation, and that Robinson had a right to redeem, on payment of the debt of 560 dollars with such interest thereon as Leavell had paid to the bank, subject to a deduction of the dividends which Leavell had received on the stock: and he decreed redemption accordingly. From which decree Leavell appealed to this court.

The cause was argued here by Stanard for the appellant, and Briggs and Harrison for the appellee. There was some controversy as to the facts of the transaction: but, in the opinion of this court, the above was, without doubt, the true state of the case. And then, the question was, Whether the transfer of the stock by Robinson to Leavell was (as the chancellor held it to be) a pledge thereof, to indemnify Leavell from loss by reason of the responsibility he incurred to the bank for Robinson's accommodation, and therefore redeemable? or a conditional sale of the stock, defeasible by the performance, and absolute on the non-performance of the condition stipulated in the agreement between the parties?

CABELL, J. I cannot regard the transfer of the stock in this case, as a mere security for the payment of the note.

164 *The circumstances of the case, and the conduct of the parties, forbid such a construction. The understanding between them, before the execution of the note, as evinced by their written memorandum, and clearly proved by the evidence, compels me to regard the transfer of the stock, as a sale; subject, however, to the condition, that if Robinson should, at any time before the note became due, relieve Leavell from his responsibility to the bank, the stock should be returned to him. Considering the agreement, as at the time it was made, there certainly was nothing in this construction of it, that Robinson could complain of; for although there seems to have been a hope that stock would rise, yet nobody believed it would rise high enough to pay off the note. As to Leavell, he came into the arrangement with great reluctance, and was determined, from the beginning, to extricate himself from it at the end of the 60 days, even at the loss he might sustain by the probable deficient value of the stock.

The other judges concurred, and the decree was reversed, and the bill dismissed with costs.

Mandamus—Never Lies If There Is Another Remedy.—*
Mandamus does not lie for the undertaker of a public bridge, to compel the county court to levy the stipulated reward in the county levy, because

Mandamus—Function of the Writ.—The office of the writ of mandamus is to compel corporations, inferior courts and offices to perform some particular duty incumbent upon them, and which is imperative in its nature, and to the performance of which the relator has a clear legal right, without any other adequate specific legal remedy to enforce it; and even though he may have another specific legal remedy, if such remedy be obsolete or imperative, the mandamus will be granted. Page v. Clifton, 30 Gratt. 417, 418, citing principal case.*

In relation to courts and judicial officers, the writ of mandamus cannot be made to perform the functions of a writ of error or appeal, or other legal proceedings to review or correct errors or to anticipate and forestall judicial action. It may be apa specific remedy is given him by statute, to recover the same by action of debt against the justices refusing to levy it.

Same—Same.—Mandamus never lies if there is another specific legal remedy for the party complaining.

An order was made by the county court of King William, appointing three commissioners "to meet and confer with commissioner appointed by the county court of King & Queen, and agree on the manner and condition of executing a bridge, to be erected across the Mattaponi river from the land of J. K. in King & Queen to the land of J. H. in King William." But, when this order was made, there were only five justices on the bench, out of seventeen who were in the commission of the peace for the county; and no order had been made or entered of record, at a previous term, signifying the intention of making the above or any other order on the subject, and directing the sheriff to summon the justices of the county to attend at the next term for the purpose.

The commissioners reported to the county court of King William, that in conformity with the orders of the two county courts, they had let the building of a bridge across the Mattaponi, to be kept in repair for seven years, to B. H. Munday, for the sum of 50 dollars; and that the undertaker had built the bridge, according to the contract returned to the clerk of the county court of King & Queen, and had given bond with surety for keeping the same in repair for the term aforesaid.

Munday, the undertaker, applied to the county court of King William (then sitting to make the county levy, and fifteen of the justices being on the bench) to levy the proportion of the price of the bridge, properly chargeable on *that county, and to order the same to be paid to him: which the county court refused to do, by a vote of ten to five of the justices present.

Upon this, Munday applied to the circuit court of King William for a mandamus to the justices of the county court, which was allowed, commanding them to levy the money for him, or shew cause to the contrary.

The county court made return, in which, after reciting the provision of the statute, 2 Rev. Code, ch. 236, § 9, p. 237, that "no order for the erection of any bridge or bridges, shall be made by the court of any county, unless a majority of the acting justices of such county shall be present at the making of such order, or unless the court of such county shall have signified their intention of making such order, at least one month previous thereto, and shall have caused the same to be entered of record, with directions to the sheriff of the county to summon the justices thereof to attend at the next term for the purpose aforesaid;" the court shewed, that a majority of the justices of King William were not present at the time of making the order appointing commissioners on the part of that county, to meet and confer with those of King & Queen as to the building of the bridge in question, and that no previous order had been made signifying the intention of making such order, and directing the justices of the county to be summoned to attend for the purpose: and that the court refused to levy any portion of the money claimed by the undertaker on the county of King William, 1. because the order, and the whole proceedings, were irregular and contrary to law; and 2. because no evidence was adduced to convince the court, that the bridge was or would be of public utility and convenience.

Munday demurred generally to the return, and the justices joined in the demurrer.

The circuit court sustained the demurrer, and ordered a peremptory mandamus. And to that judgment, this court, at the instance of the justices of the county court, awarded a supersedeas.

167 *Claiborne and Leigh, for the plaintiffs in error, objected, 1. That the mandamus did not lie: that that remedy lies only where there is no other specific remedy; and where the writ lies from a superior to an inferior court, it only lies to compel the inferior court to exercise a jurisdiction, without the exercise of which the party would be deprived of remedy; it never lies where the party has a specific remedy, independent of any exercise of jurisdiction by the inferior court. 4 Bac. Abr. Mandamus C. D. pp. 506, 7. Here, they said, the same section of the statute, which authorises the county courts to build bridges, makes all contracts for the purpose, duly and regularly made, "binding on the justices and their successors so as to entitle the undertaker to his stipulated reward in the county levy, or to a recovery thereof, with costs, by action of debt against the justices refusing to levy the same." The following section gives a mandamus, indeed, but only to the justices of one county against the justices of another, when these being duly required by the others, fail to appoint commissioners to act on their behalf, or to do what on their part ought to be done, towards executing and paying for such works. 2 Rev. Code, ch. 236, § 9, 10. But, 2. Upon the merits they insisted, that the county court was plainly right. They had, in truth, no power to levy money upon the people, to discharge a debt contracted for them without any just authority; Id. ch. 191, § 6, p. 63. The provision of the statute set forth in the return of the justices, interdicted the court which appointed the commissioners who made the contract, from making any such order; in effect, it deprived them of jurisdiction to do the act. And it was remarkable, that the order itself did not authorise the com-properly used and is often used to compel courts to act where they refuse to act and ought to act, but not to direct and control the judicial discretion to be exercised in the performance of the act to be done: to compel courts to hear and decide whether they have jurisdiction, but not to pre-determine the decision to be made: to require them to proceed to judgment, but not to fix and prescribe the judgment to be rendered. Page v. Clopton, 30 Gratt. 418; Richardson v. Farrar, 88 Va. 778, 15 S. E. Rep. 117, both citing principal case.

To the point that mandamus is an extraordinary writ, and lies only in cases where the party has no other specific or adequate remedy, the principal case is cited in Lowther v. Davis, 38 W. Va. 134, 10 S. E. Rep. 21. See principal case also cited in Mitchell v. Witt, 98 Va. 464, 38 S. E. Rep. 528.

See further, Ex parte Goolsby, 2 Gratt. 575, and foot-note; foot-note to Morris, Ex parte, 11 Gratt. 292; foot-note to Cowan v. Fulton, 25 Gratt. 579.

Stanard contra, argued, that the 9th section of the statute, which required that the majority of the justices should be present at the making of orders for building 168 bridges, or "that the intention of making such orders should be signified by an entry made of record, and the justices summoned to attend for the purpose, would be found, on examination, to apply only to the county court which originated the proceeding, not to a case like the present, where one county court is required by another county court, to concur in a work of the kind. This case, he said, was provided for by the 10th section of the statute: the county court of King & Queen originated the proceeding: and the effect of the 10th section was to oblige the county court of King William to meet the requisition without delay, and either comply or refuse compliance with it. And as to the objection, that the order of the county court of King William did not in terms authorise the commissioners to let the building of the bridge to an undertaker; that objection was refuted by the words of the 10th section, for the order was precisely in the form therein prescribed, for cases in which the proceeding originates in one county court and is to be concurred in by another. Then, in respect to the remedy by mandamus; surely, if the contract was legally made, binding on the county court, and thus binding on the people of the county, this was the only method of compelling the county, which really owed the debt, to pay it. An action of debt, indeed, was given against the justices who fail to do their duty; but the creditor might not know, or have any means of knowing, which of the justices were chargeable for the omission; which of them to sue. The statute gives the action of debt against the delinquent justices. But the party wants a remedy against the county court and the county; and there is no remedy but mandamus.

CARR, J. The counsel for the appellants took two objections to the proceedings: 1. that a mandamus was not the proper remedy; 2. that there should have been a majority of the justices of King William on the bench, or proof that they had been summoned to attend, when the order was made appointing commissioners to meet 169 those of King & Queen. It will only be necessary to notice the first of these points, if it shall be found decisively settled, that where there is another specific legal remedy, the mandamus will not lie. A brief examination of some of the cases will abundantly shew this. In Rex v. Barker, 3 Burr. 1267, lord Mansfield said, "A mandamus is a prerogative writ.—It ought to be used upon all occasions, where the law has established no specific remedy, and where, in justice and good government, there ought to be one." "The value of the matter, or the degree of its importance to the public police, is not scrupulously weighed: if there be a right, and no other specific remedy, this should not be denied." And, in Rex v. The Bank of England, 2 Doug. 526, he said, "Where there is no specific remedy, the court will grant a mandamus, that justice may be done." In the case of The King v. Marquis of Stafford, 3 T. R. 651, on an application for a rule to shew cause why a mandamus should not issue to command the defendant, as lord of the manor, to present to the ordinary, one Moreton, nominated by the inhabitants of Willenhall, to be curate of that chapel, lord Kenyon said, "it seems as if the inhabitants have only an equitable right. If so, this court cannot interfere at all; or if they have a legal right, such right may be asserted in a quare impedit. Therefore, quacunqve via data, this rule must be discharged." The King v. Bishop of Chester, 1 T. R. 404; The King v. Archbishop of Canterbury, 8 East. 213; Rex v. Commissioners of Dean, 2 Mau. & Sel. 80. In 4 Bac. Abr. Mandamus, C. p. 506, it is laid down, that it is, in general, sufficient reason with the court to refuse a mandamus, that the party applying for it has another specific remedy; and many cases are quoted in support. It seems an exception to this general rule, that the remedy is obsolete, or inconvenient, or incomplete: in such cases, the court exercises sound discretion in granting or refusing the writ. In our legislation, I find nothing to change this settled course of the law. The statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 121, p. 471, merely regulates the mode of proceeding on writs of mandamus, 170 without prescribing when they shall be granted or refused. In Dew v. The Judges of the Sweet Springs &c., 3 Hen. & Munf. 1, the subject is touched upon, but only incidentally, the case there being evidently a proper one for the writ. The law being thus settled, we are only to inquire, whether the petitioner for this mandamus, had a specific legal remedy? And this is answered by the passage cited from the 9th section of the statute, 2 Rev. Code, ch. 236, "and all such contracts made by county courts, or others appointed by them, shall be available and binding upon the justices and their successors, so as to entitle the undertaker to his stipulated reward in the county levy, or to a recovery thereof with costs, by action of debt against the justices refusing to levy the same.

The other judges concurred, and the judgment was reversed, and the mandamus dismissed.

Branch v. Bowman.

May, 1830.

Debt—Plea of Feme Covert—Replication of Abjuration of Realm.—To debt on bond, defendant pleaded, that she was feme covert at time the bond was executed: plaintiff replied, that defendant's husband had abjured the commonwealth, and was not then or now a citizen thereof: on general demurrer to this replication, it was held naut.

Debt on bond, by Taylor Bowman against Elizabeth Branch, in the county court of Prince Edward. The defendant pleaded in bar, that she was, at the time of executing the bond, and yet remained, a feme covert, the wife of Matthew Branch. The plaintiff replied, that at the time of executing the bond, the said Matthew, of whom the said Elizabeth was alleged to be the wife, and abjured the commonwealth of Virginia, and that he was not then or now a citizen thereof. General demurrer to the replication, and joinder in demurrer. The county court held that the law was for the plaintiff, and gave him judgment for the 171 debt *and costs. The defendant appealed to the circuit court, which affirmed the judgment: and then, she applied to this court for a supersedeas, which was allowed.

Leigh, for the plaintiff in error. Anciently, by the common law, if a husband abjured the realm or was banished forever, he was considered as civilliter mortuus, and his wife was regarded as a feme sole. Co. Litt. 133, a. But this abjuration of the realm, was an incident to the right of sanctuary, which was abolished in England, by the statute 21 Jac. I. ch. 28, and certainly never at any time existed in Virginia, 1 Vin. Abr. Abjuring the Realm, p. 108; 4 Black. Comm. 332; 2 Hawk. P. C. ch. 9, § 44. In Virginia, abjuration of the commonwealth cannot be, and therefore cannot be pleaded. The modern cases founded on analogy to the old doctrine of abjuration by the husband, apply only where the husband who departs from the country leaving his wife behind, is an alien, and therefore is not presumed to have the intention of returning. De Gaillon v. L'Aigle, 1 Bos. & Pull. 8, 357; Marsh v. Hutchinson, 2 Id. 226; Farrer v. Countess Granard, 4 Id. 80; Walford v. Duchess de Pienne, 2 Esp. Rep. 554.

Spooner, contra, endeavoured to maintain, that the replication, justly understood, asserted, in avoidance of the plea, that the defendant's husband had relinquished the character of a citizen of Virginia, and departed from the state, and thereby expatriated himself, and ceased to be a citizen, in the manner prescribed by the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 23, § 5, p. 66. Such an expatriation was, he thought, a most solemn abjuration of the commonwealth; and if the husband had made himself an alien by his own solemn renunciation of citizenship, and abandonment of the state, his wife remaining here, ought to be treated as a feme sole.

Leigh replied, that the replication could hardly be tortured into such a meaning: and if it could, it only amounted to an assertion, that the husband had made him-172 self an alien: *it did not go the length of asserting, that he was not a resident of the state. The wife of an alien, resident with her husband in Virginia, could not contract debts, and be sued for them, as a feme sole.

GREEN, J., delivered the resolution of the court. The replication, however understood, is wholly defective. If it intended to rely upon the common law abjuration of the realm; that never existed here, or, if it did, it could only be proved by a record taken by a coroner, and by him certified to the proper court; and the plea should have been verified by the record, instead of concluding to the country. If it intended to rely upon the expatriation of the husband under our statute, it should have been shewn how he expatriated himself, by a recorded declaration by deed, or in open court, and that he had departed from the commonwealth: and even that would not have been sufficient, without the further allegation, that he resided abroad at the time of the execution of the bond by his wife. Both judgments should be reversed; the demurrer to the replication sustained, and final judgment given for the appellant.

Clarke's Adm'r v. Day.

May, 1830.

Judgment of Sister State—Debt on—Nil Debet.—To debt on judgments of courts of Kentucky, the plea of nil debet is not a good plea.

Same—Effect.—Under the provision of const. U. S. art. 4, § 1, judgments of another state of the union, are not to be regarded here as foreign judgments, but have the same effect as judgments of our own courts.

Debt by Fitzhugh administrator of Clarke against Day, in the circuit court of Spottsylvania, for the sums of 694 dollars, 83 dollars 84 cents, 49 dollars 87 cents, and 21 dollars 43 cents, amounting in the aggregate to 849 dollars 9 cents, upon judgments of the circuit court of Jefferson 173 *county in the state of Kentucky and of the court of appeals of that state, recovered by Clarke in his lifetime against Day. And in his declaration, he set forth that Clarke recovered against Day in the circuit court of Jefferson, Kentucky, judgment for the said sum of 694 dollars for damages by him sustained by reason of Day's non-performance of promises, and the said sum of 49 dollars 87 cents for costs; and that the proceedings in that suit, having been carried by writ of error, sued out by Day, to the court of appeals of Kentucky, the judgment was affirmed, and judgment

Judgments of Sister State—Debt on—Nil Debet.—In Kemp v. Mundell, 9 Leigh 12, it was held that the plea of nil debet is not a good plea to an action of debt on a judgment of another state of the Union. TUCKER, P., in delivering his opinion, said (p. 16): "The plea of nil debet was, in this case, an improper plea, according to the decision in Clarke's Adm'r v. Day, which we are not disposed to disturb, though I do not acquiesce in some of the reasoning of JUDGE COALTER in that case." And BROOKS, J., said (p. 17): "I entirely concur in the opinion of the president. I did not concur in all the reasoning of JUDGE COALTER in Clarke's Adm'r v. Day, though I did in the conclusion to which he came, and I said no more. I then entertained the opinion I do now,—that the judgments of our sister states, under the constitution of the U. States and the acts of congress in pursuance thereof, are to be treated as domestic judgments; and that the effect of such judgments in the state from which they came, is a question of law, not a question of fact as in the case of foreign judgments." See also, Draper v. Gorman, 8 Leigh 628, 640.

†Same—Effect.—It seems beyond controversy that the validity of the contract upon which a judgment rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction in a foreign state, is established by the judgment, and the judgment must be given the same credit and effect in this state, in which it is sought to be enforced, as it had in the state where rendered. Vaugh v. Meador, 99 Va. 573, 39 S. E. Rep. 225, citing principal case, to the same effect. See the principal case cited in De Ende v. Wilkinson, 2 Pat. & H. 667; Coleman v. Waters, 13 W. Va. 807; Black v. Smith, 18 W. Va. 793; Draper v. Gorman, 8 Leigh 630, 638, 639; foot-note to Kemp v. Mundell, 9 Leigh 12. See further, monographic note on "Judgments" appended to Smith v. Charlton, 7 Gratt. 425.

Judgments—Interest on.—In Virginia, interest is generally recoverable on a judgment, both at law and in equity. Tazewell v. Saunders, 13 Gratt. 368, citing Beall v. Silver, 3 Rand. 401; Roane v. Drummond, 6 Rand. 182; Clarke v. Day, 2 Leigh 172; Mercer v. Beale, 4 Leigh 189; Laidley v. Merrifield, 7 Leigh 346.

was moreover given for Clarke, for the said sum of 21 dollars 43 cents for costs, and ten per cent. damages amounting to the said sum of 83 dollars 84 cents; "whereof the said defendant is convicted as by the records and proceedings thereof now remaining in the said circuit court for the county of Jefferson, and the said court of appeals for the state of Kentucky, may more fully and at large appear, which said judgments still remain in full force and effect, not reversed, vacated, annulled, discharged or satisfied; whereby action accrued to the said plaintiff to demand and have of the said defendant the said several sums of money," &c.

Day demurred generally to the declaration, and Fitzhugh joined in the demurrer. And he pleaded, that he did not owe the debt demanded of him or any part thereof, concluding to the country; to which plea Fitzhugh demurred generally, and Day joined in the demurrer.

Neither the record of the proceedings in Kentucky, nor the laws of that state, ascertaining the court that rendered the judgment to be courts of record, and the legal effects of their judgment in that state, were in any wise made part of the record in this case.

The circuit court of Spottsylvania held, that the plea of nil debet was sufficient to bar the action, and that the law on the demurrer thereto was for the defendant; and gave judgments for Day accordingly: from which judgment Fitzhugh appealed to this court.

174 *Briggs for the appellant, said the plea of nil debet was clearly not a good plea to an action of debt in this state on a judgment of a court of another state in the union. He cited const. U. S. art. 4, § 1, Laws U. S. 1790; 1 cong. 2 sess. ch. 11; 2 Bior. 102; Mills v. Duryee, 7 Cranch, 481; Hampton v. M'Connel, 3 Wheat. 234.

Standard, contra. The constitution of the U. States provided, that "full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records and judicial proceedings of every other state;" and the authorities cited shew, that a judgment of a court of one state is to have the same credit and effect in the courts of every other state, that it has in the state in which it was rendered. This is not controverted. But, in the present case, it does not appear, that the courts of Kentucky which rendered these judgments were courts of record; nor are the laws of Kentucky in any wise made part of this record, so that our courts can judicially know either the character of the courts that rendered the judgments, whether they were courts of record or not, or the legal effect of these judgments, whether or no they are conclusive even in Kentucky, and whether the plea of nil debet would or would not have been a good plea in bar to an action on them there. If the federal courts may judicially take notice of the laws of all the states, their jurisdiction being co-extensive with the union, it does not follow that the state courts may do so too. Neither are the records of the proceedings in the courts of Kentucky made part of this record; and for aught that appears, the judgment of the circuit court of Jefferson, Kentucky, may have been rendered in the absence of Day, and without his knowing that any such proceeding had been instituted against him; a proceeding, which the laws of some of the states touching foreign attachments are understood to allow. It has never been held that judgments of that kind are conclusive against the absent defendant in his own state, or (it is hoped) even in the state where they are rendered.

175 *Briggs, in reply. The declaration avers, in effect, that the courts of Kentucky are courts of record: it avers that the proceedings are of record there. Day was certainly before the court of appeals of Kentucky, for he carried the case thither by writ of error: he was heard, and the judgment affirmed. For the rest, the state courts of Virginia is to ascertain the effect of a judgment of Kentucky, exactly as a federal court sitting in another state, or the supreme court of the U. States, would do it.

COALTER, J. It was admitted in the argument, that the cases of Mills v. Duryee and Hampton v. M'Connel have correctly decided, that the constitution of the U. States, and the act of congress of 1790, have placed the judgments of the courts of the other states of the union, when sued on in this state, on the same ground, and to have the same effect, as they would have if sued on in the domestic tribunals of the state where such judgments were obtained.

According to those decisions, a judgment of one state of the union is to be considered in the nature of a domestic judgment in every other state; the tribunals of which are to allow to it the same force and efficacy, which it has in the state where it is pronounced. Whether this broad proposition is subject to any exception, as where the party against whom the judgment has been obtained, has had no notice of the suit, though the judgment may be binding where it is pronounced, is a question, which I wish not at present to decide, or to intimate any opinion concerning, inasmuch as it does not arise in this case.

As the judgments sued on in this case are to have the same effect here as they would have if sued on in Kentucky, it follows, that this court must ascertain what would be the effect of them there. But then the question arises, how this matter of law and usage of another state, is to be ascertained by the courts of this state? It is said, that the federal courts, as well supreme as inferior, may adjudge the law in such a case, because, considering their rela-

176 tion *to the states, they may be supposed to have judicial knowledge of the laws and usages of all the states; but that in the state courts, notwithstanding the constitution of the U. States, and the act of congress of 1790 on this subject, the laws of the other states, in this respect, can only be ascertained as any other matter of fact, and in the way in which foreign laws and usages are usually ascertained. But if such a difference does exist between the two sets of tribunals, in deciding in cases of the lex loci (concerning which I give no opinion) it does not seem to me to have any important bearing on the question before us. It will be conceded, I presume, that but for the provision in the constitution and the act of congress, before referred to, a judgment in the state of Kentucky, when sued on in a federal court of this state, would no more be in the nature of a domestic judgment in that court, than it would be if sued on in a state court: in both, it would be equally a suit of foreign judgment. No question concerning the lex loci arises in the case: it is merely a question of evidence: and although the weight in which it may be entitled, depends on what weight or effect it has in the state where the judgment was pronounced, according to the laws and usages of that state, I cannot see why a different mode of deciding on such a question should prevail in the state and federal courts. The constitution and law having made the states, as it were, domestic to each other, in this respect, as to both tribunals, it would seem to follow, that both tribunals should take cognizance of the case as though founded on a domestic judgment. Indeed, I cannot see under what form of pleading, known to the common law, this matter of law, that is, the efficacy of this judgment as matter of evidence, can be tried as a matter of fact by a jury. The plea of nil debet will not try it. That assumes the matter in dispute, that the judgment is not conclusive; and if issue were taken on that plea, the plaintiff would waive the conclusive effect of his judgment; this he can only assert by a demurrer to the plea, which is an issue of law, and must be tried by that court.

177 If *the plea of nul tiel record would try it (of which I am not satisfied) still that tenders no issue to the country. And if the defendant should plead, that the court pronouncing the judgment was not a court of record, and that the judgment is not conclusive evidence, that would be no bar to the action; for debt lies on a judgment which is not conclusive evidence. Suffice it, however, to say, that in his case the plea is nil debet, which assumes that the judgment is not conclusive evidence; and the plaintiff, who contends that it is, had no course left for him but to demur. This he has done; and the law arising on this issue must be tried by the court, not by the jury; for it is an issue of law.

The constitution and act of congress, then, having made the states domestic to each other, in regard to this matter, the court of the state must try this issue in the usual way, by informing itself of the law of the state of Kentucky, as the federal courts must do, should there be any doubt about it. In this case, the judgment sued on was affirmed on an appeal to the supreme court of that state; and I presume we can safely say, as the federal court said in a similar case, that such judgment must be conclusive on the parties in that state. I am, therefore, of opinion, that the plea of nil debet was bad, and that the demurrer to it ought to have been sustained. The judgment of the circuit court should be reversed, and judgment entered for the appellant.

BROOKE, P. As it is unnecessary, I am not inclined, to say more in this case, than to concur in the opinion, that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and judgment entered for the appellant.

The other judges concurred. But after the opinion of the court was announced, Briggs suggested, that it would be necessary to have a writ of inquiry in the case, in order to get interest on the debt. Whereupon, this court entered judgment, that the law upon the plaintiff's demurrer to the defendant's plea was for the plaintiff; 178 therefore the judgment *of the circuit court was reversed with costs: and the appellant's counsel suggesting a wish to have a writ of inquiry awarded in the cause, the same was remanded to the circuit court for further proceedings to be had therein.

Bolling v. Stokes.

(Absent COALTER, J.)

Landlord and Tenant—Covenant to Pay Taxes*—Assessment for Paving Street—Liability.—Private act of assembly in 1813, authorises the paving of streets of Petersburg, and ascertains manner of levying expense on proprietors and tenants of lots in town: in 1815, B. lets a lot to S. for term of five years, S. yielding and paying therefor an annual ground rent of $60 dollars, besides all taxes and other public dues in any manner accruing, and besides taxes and public dues of every kind: in 1817, the street on which the lot lies, is paved according to act of assembly, and the expense of paving apportioned and charged to and paid by S. the tenant, in the first instance: HELD, this expense of paving, is not a tax or public due of any kind, within the meaning of the covenants in the lease, which the tenant is bound to bear, and therefore he has a right to demand and recover the same of the landlord.

In an action of assumpsit brought by Stokes against Bolling, in the circuit court of Petersburg, there was a verdict for Stokes, for 874 dollars with interest from the 15th August 1821 till paid, subject to the opinion of the court on a case stated; which was thus:

A private act of assembly was passed in January 1813, providing or paving the streets of Petersburg (see sessions acts 1812-13, ch. 74, p. 103), by which it was provided: § 1. That the common hall of the town, whenever it should think proper, or whenever a majority of the owners of lots or parts of lots, on any street or square in the town, should by memorial pray the common hall to pave such street or square, might cause the same to be properly paved; 179 provided the funds of the corporation should be liable to no greater *proportion of the expense of pavement, than what should be requisite for such parts of the street as adjoined the public improvements or lands belonging to the corporation; § 2. authorised the common hall to appoint persons to graduate and level the streets, and to superintend the pavement; § 3. made it the duty of the common hall, whenever it should direct the paving of any street or square, to appoint a committee of its body, to measure and ascertain the extent of each person's front thereon, and to apportion and charge the expense to the owners of the lots or parts of lots, according to the extent of their respective fronts,

*See generally, monographic note on "Landlord and Tenant" appended to Mason v. Moyers, 2 Rob. 606; monographic note on "Covenants" appended to Todd v. Summers, 2 Gratt. 167.

including the expense of paving the inter-sections of the streets, and all other expenses; which committee should make return of its proceedings to the clerk of the common hall; § 4. provided, that when such return should have been made and recorded, the clerk should furnish a copy thereof to the collector of the taxes of the corporation, or other person appointed by the common hall for the purpose; and such collector, after ten days notice published in the newspapers, should and might demand of each owner or occupier of a lot &c. upon the street or square to be paved, the part of the expense apportioned and charged to him, and if not paid on demand, might distrain the goods of the person so charged for the same, in the same manner that distress is made for public taxes; § 5. provided, that when the owner of any lot &c. on any street or square about to be paved, should not reside in the corporation, or should not be in the occupancy of such lot &c. the tenant in possession should be chargeable for the expenses, and should be allowed to deduct the same from the accruing rent payable to the owner, in all cases of the tenant's holding from year to year: that, in all cases of tenants holding lots &c. upon leases for a term over one and under ten years, the expense of the paving, in the first instance, should be borne by the lessee, and the lessor should not be bound to reimburse the same, till the last year of the lease, and then the principal sum only; but if the lessee should prove insolvent, or the premises unoccupied, the lessor

180 *should be chargeable with the expense: that, in all cases of tenants holding lots &c. for a term of ten years or more, or for life, the expense of paving should be borne by the lessee, or his under tenant: and that in case of non-residence of any owner of an unoccupied lot &c. and no property of the owner in the town whereof distress might be made, the part of the expense chargeable to him might be recovered by motion on ten days notice.

Afterwards, but before any proceeding under the act of Assembly, by deed of lease, dated the 1st May 1815, Bolling leased to Stokes a lot on old street in Petersburg, for a term of five years, commencing the 1st May 1815, and ending the 1st May 1820, Stokes yielding and paying therefor, an annual ground rent of 50 dollars, "besides all taxes and other public dues in any manner accruing" upon the premises; "besides said rent should be paid half yearly, "besides taxes and public dues of every kind."

In 1817, the common hall duly ordered the street in front of the lot so leased by Bolling to Stokes, to be paved, in pursuance of the act of assembly; and there was duly apportioned and charged to Stokes, on that account, as the lessee and occupier of the said lot, the sum of 874 dollars, which he was bound to pay in the first instance, and paid.

After the expiration of the lease, Stokes brought this action to recover the same sum of 874 dollars of Bolling. And the question referred to the court, was, Whether Bolling was bound to pay him the money?

The circuit court held that he was, and rendered judgment for Stokes upon the verdict of the jury. And Bolling appealed to this court.

The case was argued here by Nicholas and Leigh for the appellant, and by the Attorney General for the appellee. The argument turned intirely on the question, Whether the assessment and charge for the paving of the street, was a public due in any manner accruing on the leased premises, or a public due of any kind, within the meaning of the covenants 181 *in the lease, which the lessee Stokes thereby stipulated to pay, besides the annual ground rent of 50 dollars.

BROOKE, P. There can be no doubt upon the construction of the act of assembly: its obvious meaning gave to the tenant a demand on the landlord, at the expiration of the lease, for the expense paid by him, of paving the street opposite the lot.

Upon the terms of the lease, there is more question. The words in the covenant are very strong: yielding and paying an annual rent of 50 dollars, besides all taxes and other public dues in any manner accruing &c. But they may be satisfied by the application of them to the ordinary and usual taxes and public dues. To extend them to an expense unknown by the parties, incalculable as to amount, uncertain as to time, and in which the lessee could have no certain interest, would be to disregard all the circumstances under which the contract was made. It is impossible to suppose, that a sum so uncertain in amount, and which might be as large as the sum that was in fact paid, could have been taken into the calculation of the value of the lot, at the time the lease was made. There was nothing by which it could be estimated, like the usual and customary taxes and public dues; nor does it come intirely within any correct definition of the terms taxes or other public dues. It was an uncertain and extraordinary assessment. The act under which it was made, had been in force two years, and having never been acted on, it was doubtful, whether within the term of five years it would be put into operation. That depended on the proprietors of the lots and not on the lessees. It was not a charge on the lot, but on the person of the proprietor (the appellant), having no reference to the value of the lot, but to its front on the street, and it was limited to a particular object and occasion. If intended to be included in the lease, it is improbable, that it would have been left to the general construction of the terms, taxes or other public dues. When collected, it was not applicable to the ordinary pur-

182 poses *of revenue, of the state or corporation, but to individual objects and purposes, in which three fourths of the owners of lots on the same street might have no interest.

In the case of Southall v. Leadbetter, 3 T. R. 458, the tenant covenanted to pay a rent, and also from time to time and at all times during the lease, the land tax and all other taxes, rates, assessments, and impositions whatever, by act of parliament or otherwise whatsoever. During the lease, a party-wall became necessary, and the tenant, under an act of parliament, had to pay his proportion of the expense, which by the act he was empowered to deduct out of the rent. And the question was, whether the tenant was not bound by the terms of the lease, to pay this expense, it being, as was contended, an imposition by law. The court was clearly of opinion, that he was not: lord Kenyon said, "neither is the tenant concluded by his covenant to pay taxes, assessments, impositions &c. for that only extends to the land tax and all other taxes ejusdem generis: but this is not a tax." I think that a strong case: the party-wall was no more beyond the covenant there, than the paving here; the expense of it was more certain, and more calculable; and the tenant had a more immediate interest in it.

The other judges concurring, the judgment was affirmed.

183 *Vizonneau v. Pegram and Others.

Equitable Separate Estate—Power of Disposition.—A feme covert, quoad property settled to her separate use, is a feme sole, and has a right to dispose of all her separate personal estate, and the profits of her separate real, in same manner as if she were feme sole, unless her power of alienation be restrained by the instrument creating the separate estate.

John Stewart, late of Petersburg, by a nuncupative will duly made and proved, according to the statute of wills, in the hustings court of Petersburg, bequeathed to his natural daughter Mary Ann Vizonneau, the wife of Andri Thomas Vizonneau, "all the money he then had in the bank, to be held in trust by major Edward Pegram junior, for her benefit, so that her husband, A. T. Vizonneau, might have no manner of control over or right to the same."

Administration with the will annexed, was granted to Edward Pegram; and he finding about 19,000 dollars of his testator's money deposited in bank, received the same, and held it in trust for Mrs. Vizonneau, and applied it to her use, so long as he lived; but he died a few years after, and the money went into the hands of John Pegram, his administrator.

Hereupon, Mrs. Vizonneau, by her next friend, exhibited her bill in the superior court of chancery of Richmond against John Pegram, the administrator of Edward Pegram, the trustee named in her father's will, setting forth the facts, and praying the court to appoint another trustee for her, in place of Edward Pegram deceased, and that his administrator should be directed to pay over the trust fund, to such trustee as the court should substitute. The administrator of Edward Pegram promptly answered the bill, declaring his readiness to account for and pay over the trust money, as the chancellor should direct. The chancellor appointed John B. Bott trustee for Mrs. Vizonneau, requiring of him bond with approved surety for the faithful discharge of the trust; and decreed, that the administrator of the former trustee, should pay the trust money in 184 his hands belonging to Mrs. Vizonneau, to Bott the trustee so appointed by the court. And the money was paid over to him accordingly.

There were, afterwards, various proceedings in the cause, against the trustee Bott, the object of which was to have an account of his execution of the trust, and to substitute another trustee in his place, to receive and manage the fund for Mrs. Vizonneau. As no person could be found willing to accept the trust, upon the terms which the chancellor required, namely, that the trustee should give bond with approved surety for the faithful discharge of the trust; the chancellor, at length, substituted and appointed the marshal of his court to act as trustee, and ordered Bott to pay and deliver over to him, the fund and all the securities he held for the same.

The marshal in the course of his administration of the trust fund, paid over to the cestui que trust Mrs. Vizonneau, upon her demand thereof, a part of the principal of the trust fund, and reported the fact to the court. Mrs. Vizonneau insisted, that she had a right not only to have the profits of the fund, but to dispose as she pleased of the principal also. But the chancellor was of a different opinion; and, declaring that she was entitled only to the profits of the fund, he disapproved of the advances which the marshal had made her, over and above the profits, and ordered, that the future profits which should accrue, should be applied to reimburse so much of the principal, as had been, in his opinion, thus improperly paid her by the marshal.

Hereupon, Mrs. Vizonneau (who still remained a feme covert, though from the commencement of these proceedings she had been separated from her husband) presented a petition to the chancellor, in due form, claiming a right to dispose of the fund, principal as well as interest; and praying the court to direct the marshal, instead of applying the profits as they should accrue to reimburse the advances of principal previously made to her, to pay all the Equitable Separate Estate—Power of Disposition.—It is the established doctrine in Virginia, that a married woman, as to property settled to her separate use, is to be regarded as a feme sole, and has a right to dispose of all of her separate personal estate and the rents and profits of her separate real estate, in the same manner as if she were a feme sole, unless the power of alienation be restrained by the instrument creating the estate. Burnett v. Hawpe, 25 Gratt. 486, citing principal case; West v. West, 3 Rand. 373; Woodson v. Perkins, 5 Gratt. 346. To the same effect, the principal case is cited in Christian v. Keen, 80 Va. 572; Radford v. Carwile, 18 W. Va. 649, 650; Justis v. English, 30 Gratt. 571; Coatney v. Hopkins, 14 W. Va. 365; Dulin v. McCaw, 39 W. Va. 724, 20 S. E. Rep. 683. See also, foot-note to Lee v. Bank, 9 Leigh 200. The mere fact that the estate is put in the hands of a trustee to be used for the wife does not effect in any degree the ius disponendi; and the trustee's assent is not necessary to a valid alienation or charge by the wife, unless it is required expressly or by strong implication in the instrument under which the property is derived. Burnett v. Hawpe, 25 Gratt. 487; Patton v. Merchants' Bank, 13 W. Va. 608; Haymond v. Jones, 33 Gratt. 388; Coatney v. Hopkins, 14 W. Va. 365.

But, in Virginia, the right to restrain or interdict the power of the wife to dispose of her separate estate has been expressly recognized and affirmed in several cases. Nixon v. Rose, 12 Gratt. 481, citing principal case; West v. West, 3 Rand. 373; Williamson v. Beckham, 8 Leigh 20; Lee v. Bank of U. S., 9 Leigh 200. accruing profits to her, or at least so much thereof as was necessary for her immediate maintenance and support.

185 *The chancellor, adhering to his former opinion, rejected the application. And Mrs Vizonneau applied by petition to this court for an appeal; which was allowed.

Stanard and S. Taylor, for the appellant, insisted, that she took, under her father's will, a separate property in the money bequeathed, and was, in regard thereto, a feme sole to all purposes, with full power to dispose of the whole subject; and, they said, there could be no difference between her interest in the profits, and her interest in the principal, of the fund. [Brooke, president: Ought not the husband to be a party?] Stanard: We think not; he has no interest in the subject; but if he ought, the court can settle the principle of the case, and that done, it will be easy to supply this formal defect, if it be one.

CABELL, J., delivered the opinion of the court. It is established, in England, by a long course of uniform decision, that a married woman is, as to property settled to her separate use, a feme sole; and, as a consequence of this principle, and an incident to the right of enjoyment, that she has a right to dispose of all her separate personal property, and the profits of her separate real estate, in the same manner as if she were a feme sole, unless her power of alienation be restrained or restricted by the instrument creating the separate estate. The same principle has been sanctioned by this court, in the case of West v. West's ex'ors.

The will of John Stewart gave the appellant, an estate for her separate use and benefit, in the money thereby bequeathed, and imposed no restraint on her power of alienation. 186 *It follows, therefore, that so far from her being confined, in her own enjoyment of it, to the use of the interest of the fund during her life, she is to be regarded as the absolute owner of both principal and interest, and should be permitted to make any disposition thereof that she may desire to make.

The decree is reversed, and the cause remanded to be proceeded in according to the principles now declared.

deed of lands in Virginia made by a party residing in another state of the union, cannot be recorded here, upon acknowledgment thereof by the party before a court of such state where he resides, but only on such acknowledgment before two justices of the peace of such state.

This was a bill exhibited by Lockbridge against Carlisle, in the superior court of chancery of Greenbrier, the principal object of which was to injoin and suspend the proceedings of Carlisle, on a judgment he had recovered at law against Lockridge, for the purchase money of land in the county of Bath, sold by Carlisle to Lockridge, until the vendor should get in and convey to the vendee, a good and perfect title to the land. At the time of the sale, the legal title of the land was in Carlisle and his brothers and sisters, as devisees and tenants in common claiming under their father's will. These co-devisees of Carlisle resided in the state of Kentucky: they all, by several deeds, in due form, executed in 1824 and 1826, conveyed their rights and interests in the land, to Carlisle the vendor; but most of these deeds were acknowledged by 187 the grantors before the county courts of Campbell, Fayette &c. in Kentucky, and by those courts certified to the clerk of the county court of Bath in Virginia, where the land lay, to be there recorded. And one question that arose in the cause was, Whether these deeds were duly registered or not?

The statute of conveyances of 1792 (Rev. Code of 1794, ch. 90, § 5, Pleasants' ed. p. 157,) provided, that if the party executing a deed should not reside in Virginia, the acknowledgment by the party of the sealing and delivery thereof, before any court of law, or mayor, or other chief magistrate of any city, town or corporation of the country wherein the party should dwell, certified by such court &c. in the manner such acts are usually authenticated by them, and offered to the proper court in Virginia to be recorded, should be as effectual as if it had been in this last mentioned court. And the deeds in question were duly acknowledged and certified to be recorded, according to the provisions of that statute. But the revised statute of conveyances of 1819 (1 Rev. Code, ch. 99, § 5, 7, pp. 362, 3,) provides, that in case the party executing the deed, reside not in the U. States or any territory thereof, then the deed may be acknowledged and certified for registry, in the manner prescribed by the statute of 1792; and that deeds may be admitted to record, upon the certificate of the acknowledgment thereof, under the seals of any two justices of the peace for any county or corporation within the U. States, or any territory thereof, or the district of Columbia. So that the real question was, whether the latter statute superseded and repealed the former, in respect of the mode of acknowledging and certifying deeds of lands in Virginia, made by a party in another state of the union, for registry here?

The chancellor held, that the two statutes might well stand together, and that the provision of the statute of 1792 was not repealed by that of the revised statute of 1819; that, therefore, the deeds in this case were duly registered. And he made an interlocutory decree founded on that principle: from which Lockridge appealed to this court.

188 *Johnson for the appellant; Leigh for the appellee.

BROOKE, P. It is very probable, that the legislature, by the provisions of the statute made in 1819, on this subject, intended only to facilitate the acknowledgment of foreign deeds, by extending the authority to take acknowledgments of such deeds, to two justices of the peace, where the party executing the same resided in any of the U. States, or the territories thereof, and not to repeal the 5th section of the statute of 1792, which gave the authority to any court of law, mayor or chief magistrate &c. in every case in which the party executing such deeds did not reside in Virginia. But, as the authority, in such case, was by the statute of 1819 restricted to the case, in which the party executing the deed resided without the U. States, and the territories thereof; and as also all laws of a general nature, not published in the new code, were repealed by the 9th section of the statute providing for the re-publication of the laws (1 Rev. Code, ch. 1, p. 16,) the 5th section of the statute of 1792, and all the subsequent statutes on the subject, must be considered as repealed by the statute of 1819. The objection to the authentication and registry of the deeds in question, cannot be got over. So much of the decree, therefore, as declares them duly registered, and dissolves the injunction, is erroneous, and must be reversed.

189 *Walthall's Ex'or v. Robertson and Others.

(Absent COALTER and CABELL, J.)

Will—Construction—Emancipation of Slaves—Case at Bar—Testator, by will in 1819, bequeaths and provides—"If it be agreeable to the laws of this state Virginia, that after death of my wife, it is my will, that the following slaves owned by me, viz. Joan &c. shall, as soon as they attain the age 31 years, be freed; and I appoint my friends J. M. and E. H. H. trustees for the liberation of said slaves, and for them to make the necessary application to court, on said slaves' behalf, both as to their freedom and their remaining in the state. If the laws of the state be against such procedure, then my will is, that said slaves be equally divided among my children &c." HOLD, upon construction of this will, that it was not testator's intention to emancipate these slaves, unless by change of law they might be permitted to remain as free persons in Virginia; and as by the law at date of will and of testator's death, and at death of his widow, these slaves, if emancipated, could not be allowed to remain in Virginia, they are not entitled to their freedom, but pass to testator's children.

Francis Walthall, late of Buckingham, who died in 1819, by his last will and testament, duly made, published and recorded, devised and bequeathed his whole estate to his wife Mary for her life; and that after her death, the whole estate, excepting specific legacies afterwards bequeathed, should be sold by his executors, and the proceeds divided among six of his grandchildren named in the will. And after sundry specific legacies of slaves, he bequeathed and provided as follows: "Item, if it be agreeable to the laws of this state, Virginia, in which I live, that after the death of my said wife Mary, it is my will and desire, that the following slaves owned by me, viz. Joan senior, Gary, Jack, Tom and Peter, shall as soon as they attain the age of thirty-one years, shall be freed; and I appoint my friends J. Morris and E. H. Hendrick, trustees for the liberation of said slaves, and for them to make the necessary application to court on their the said slaves' behalf, both as to their freedom and their remaining in the state. If the laws of the state be against such procedure, then my will and desire is, that the said slaves shall be equally divided among my children *who shall be living at the time and the heirs of those that be dead."

It appeared that the testator himself was an illiterate man, perhaps unable to write; for instead of signing his name to his will, he made his mark.

The testator's widow being dead, and the slaves Joan, Gary, Jack, Tom and Peter, having all, before her death, attained to the age of thirty-one years; the testator's children and grandchildren exhibited their bill against Morris, the executor, in the county court of Buckingham in chancery, insisting, that under the testator's will, and according to the laws of Virginia at the time of his death and of the death of his widow, these slaves were not entitled to their freedom; and praying a decree that the executor should divide them among the testator's children and descendants. The executor in his answer, insisted, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to the slaves, and that they were entitled to their freedom; and submitted this question to the court.

The county court was of opinion, that the slaves were not entitled to their freedom; and decreed a division of them among the plaintiffs. The executor appealed to the superior court of chancery of Richmond, which affirmed the decree: and then he appealed to this court.

Leigh for the appellant. The law of Virginia, as it stood at the time of the testator's death, and as it continued and stood till and at the death of his widow, authorised any owner of slaves to emancipate them by will; providing, however, that if any emancipated slave, being of full age, should remain in the commonwealth, more than twelve months after his right to freedom accrued, such freedman should be sold into slavery again, by the overseers of the poor; unless the freedman had been emancipated for some act of extraordinary merit, in which case the county court, upon his application, and on satisfactory proof of the act of merit for which he was emancipated, and of his general good character and conduct, was empowered to grant 191 him *leave to remain in the state.

1 Rev. Code, ch. 111, § 53, 61, 62, pp. 433, 6, 7. The principal object of the testator here, was, to emancipate these persons, at his wife's death, if the laws should continue to allow of emancipation at that time: if it should be agreeable to the law of Virginia, his will and desire was, that, after his wife's death, and their attaining to the age of thirty-one, respectively, they should be freed. But he intended them another subordinate benefit; that leave should, if practicable, be obtained for them to remain in the state. The main design which was lawful, ought not to be sacrificed to the subordinate one, which turned out, in the event, to be unlawful, and therefore impracticable; for it must be admitted, that these slaves, not having been emancipated for any acts of merit, the county court had no power to give them leave to remain here. But the legislature had such power, and has often exercised it. It was only in case "the laws of the state should be against such procedure," that these persons were not to be emancipated, and were bequeathed to the testator's children and their descendants. If the laws should be against what procedure? Against the emancipation, which was the main procedure; not against their remaining in the state, which was a subordinate object; not against the asking leave for them to remain, of the county court, which was only the form and manner of procedure for obtaining that subordinate object.

Daniel for the appellees. As the laws of the state, at the time the testator made his will, authorising him to emancipate his slaves, gave them the benefit of the act of manumission on condition of their leaving the state, his reference to the state of the law on the subject, which should exist at the time of his wife's death and the slaves' attainment to thirty-one years of age, clearly evinces his knowledge that the law, as it stood in his own time, would not allow his object to be accomplished, and that he looked to a possible or probable change of the laws, which would give effect to his purpose. What object was it, which 192 required a change of *the law to give it effect? The manumission of these slaves, with the right of remaining and enjoying freedom in Virginia. Their freedom and their residence here, were purposes so blended in his mind as to make one intire purpose. The procedure of emancipating slaves upon condition of their leaving the state, was one which it required no change of the laws to allow: the procedure of emancipating slaves to remain here, could only be allowed by a change of the policy and the laws of the state, which might or might not take place, in the interval between his own death and that of his wife. This consideration explains the import of those words of condition, "if it be agreeable to the law of the state," and "if the laws of the state be against such procedure;" which are correlative and alternative conditions, both looking to such a change of the laws, as should allow of the accomplishment of the testator's whole purpose, namely, the emancipation of these slaves to reside in Virginia.

CARR, J. It is an observation as trite as it is true, that, in construing a will, we are to look to the whole and to every part, in order to ascertain what the testator meant by any clause, sentence or expression. We are to inquire, what this testator meant in that clause of his will, which relates to the freedom of these five slaves. Did he mean, that they should be free, provided the laws, at the period appointed by him, should allow them to be free, and if not, that they should pass to his children? Or did he mean, that they should remain slaves, and pass to his children, unless the laws would permit both their freedom and residence in the state? The chancellor thought he meant the latter. I cannot concur with him. It is evident to me, that these slaves did not enter into the arrangement of his property, which the testator was making among his descendants. It is fair to conclude too, that they were favourites, as they were selected from among his slaves. Reasoning a priori, we should hardly suppose, that the testator who wished to confer the boon of freedom on his slave,

193 would make that dependent *on his residence in this or that quarter of the globe. But all reasoning of this kind must yield to the actual expression of his will. Let us analyze the words to ascertain what that is. "If it be agreeable to the laws, it is my will, that after the death of my wife &c. my slaves Joan &c. shall, as soon as they attain the age of thirty-one, be freed." Here is a clear, definite, complete purpose expressed; the freedom of these slaves, after the death of his wife, as they attained to thirty-one, if the laws would permit. Is this purpose afterwards changed? "And I appoint my friends J. M. and E. H. H. trustees for the liberation of said slaves:" this, so far from changing, provides the means for effecting his purpose; he appoints trustees for the liberation of the slaves. "And for them to make the necessary application to court, both as to their freedom, and their remaining in the state." Do these words indicate any change of the purpose? Not to my mind. They prove still farther, the solicitude of the testator as to the object in view. They are means employed to insure the end, the freedom of the slaves. He was an ignorant, illiterate man: he had an idea, that some application to court was necessary as to their freedom: he directs his trustees to make this: and wishing still further to provide for their comfort, he directs his friends also to make the application to court necessary for their remaining in the state. It is clear to my mind, that this last application was never meant by the testator, in restraint of the freedom before given; that he had no idea of saying that their freedom should depend on obtaining permission for them to remain in the state. Both the words he has used, and the reason of the thing, forbid this. They are to make application, in behalf of the slaves, "both as to their freedom, and their remaining;" shewing that, in the testator's mind, they were two distinct and independent things; the freedom first, the residence afterwards. And this is true too, on the law of the case: no application for remaining in the state, could be made to the court, but for slaves already freed. The testator proceeds, "If the laws of the state be against this procedure:" what 194 *procedure? I answer, the freeing his slaves. He had just before said, if it be agreeable to the laws of the state, I wish these slaves to be freed, and had provided the means to secure their freedom; then he adds, if the laws of the state be against the procedure, then I give them to my children. Do we not see here, clearly, each alternative? If the laws will suffer it, I free these slaves; if they will not suffer it, I give them to my children.

GREEN, J. The only question in this case, is, Whether the testator intended, that the slaves in question should be freed (to use his own expression) upon his wife's death, at all events, unless the law in force when that happened, should prohibit emancipation upon any terms? or that they should be freed, only in the event, that the laws should then permit emancipation, and those emancipated to remain in the state, by leave of the courts or otherwise? This last was the construction adopted by both the courts below, and, I think, the correct one. The expression "if the laws of Virginia be against the said procedure," refers to all which the testator had directed to be done, both to the emancipation of the slaves, and procuring permission to them to remain in the state, for which purposes trustees were appointed.

The laws in force when the will was made, permitted emancipation, but imposed upon those emancipated, the condition of leaving the state within a twelve month after their right to freedom accrued, or if infants, after they attained their age, under the penalty of being sold as slaves by the overseers of the poor, unless they were permitted to remain by an order of a county or corporation court, in cases in which the emancipation was founded upon the extraordinary merit of the slave, and the court was satisfied by proofs of his general good conduct and character. In the exercise of this power, the courts had a considerable latitude of discretion, which was restrained by the act of 1819, which was passed a few months before, and which was to take effect a few months after, this will 195 was made, by the requisition that *the act of extraordinary merit, for which the slave was emancipated should be stated in the record. These laws, or at least those in force when he made his will, were obviously in the mind of the testator, and dictated the provision under consideration. He could hardly have doubted, but that, at his wife's death, the laws would allow emancipation upon some terms; but he might very reasonably have doubted, whether they would allow the courts to give leave to the slaves he wished to emancipate, to remain in the state, or not. If they should, he desired to emancipate them; if not, to distribute them amongst his children. Under these laws, no court has power to permit the slaves in question, if emancipated, to remain in the state, for they are not suggested to have done any act of extraordinary merit. I think the decree should be affirmed.

BROOKE, P., concurred with GREEN, J., and the decree was affirmed.

money of Virginia. Witness our hands this 11th September 1822.

"Wm. Boatwright [seal]

"Gabriel Peasley [seal]."

Upon which the defendant, by his counsel, moved the court to exclude the paper from going in evidence to the jury, which motion the court overruled. The plaintiff then proceeded to prove by two witnesses, who had seen Peasley write, that they believed the signature of his name to the paper, was in his handwriting. And this being all the evidence, the defendant's counsel moved the court to instruct the jury, that the law was for the defendant, and to instruct the jury, whether the law was for the plaintiff or defendant. The court refused to give the instruction that the law was for the defendant, and instructed the jury that the law was for the plaintiff. The defendant excepted.

2. He then moved the court to exclude the instrument above set forth, from the evidence, on the ground, that it was variant from that described in the declaration as a promissory note. The court overruled the motion: and the defendant excepted.

3. He moved the court to instruct the jury, that as the note itself did not import a valuable consideration, the production of it did not exempt the plaintiff from the duty of proving a consideration; and that, unless he proved a consideration *by other proof than the exhibition of the note alone, the law was for the defendant. This motion also the court overruled: and the defendant excepted.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff; upon which the county court entered a separate judgment against Peasley, judgment having been previously entered against Montague. Peasley appealed to the circuit court of Cumberland; which reversed the judgment, only because separate judgments were entered against the two defendants in this joint action, but proceeded itself to enter a joint judgment against them both. And then Peasley applied to this court for a supersedeas; which was allowed.

S. Taylor for the plaintiff in error; Forbes for the defendant.

CARR, J. It is not easy to perceive, in the first bill of exceptions, what was the exact point of law, on which the defendant's counsel wished to obtain the opinion of the court. As the attempt to exclude the note, and the motion for an instruction on the law of the case, are blended together, and form the matter of one exception, with the evidence going to prove the handwriting spread out; I conclude, that the defendant intended to ask the court to instruct the jury, whether (taking the evidence for true) the note ought, according to law, to go to the jury in support of the declaration? And understanding the motion thus, I think the court was right: for if the jury believed the evidence, the handwriting was clearly proved, and the note being properly described in the declaration, ought to have gone to the jury. The motion itself was not only awkwardly put, but improper, because it involved fact with law, and demanded the opinion of the court on the whole mass. Smith v. Carrington, 4 Cranch 71; Brooke v. Young, 3 Rand. 106. There would have been no error in overruling it for that reason alone. Nor did the court, as I understand it, err in the opinion it gave.

198 *Of the other exceptions, the third only need be noticed. We know that at common law, an action of debt could not be maintained on a promissory note, as of itself importing a debt; but the plaintiff must declare upon the contract, as an assumption, stating and proving the real consideration at large. The note, though it could not be declared on, might be given in evidence in support of the contract stated, as (for instance) on a count for money lent. As commerce advanced in its progress, it was found convenient to resort to a less complicated instrument than bills of exchange; and this brought promissory notes very much into use. It was attempted to place them on the footing of bills of exchange, and to bring debt upon them, as of themselves importing a consideration: this was opposed by lord Holt, totis viribus, who (as lord Kenyon observes in Brown v. Harraden, 4 T. R. 151,) most pertinaciously adhered to his opinion, that no action could be maintained on promissory notes as instruments, but that they were only to be considered as evidences of debt. He insisted, that actions upon notes as such, were innovations upon the rules of the common law; and that declarations upon them amounted to setting up a new sort of specialty unknown in Westminster. Clerke v. Martin, 2 Ld. Raym. 757; Story v. Atkins, Id. 1430; Trier v. Bridgman, 2 East. 359; Pearson v. Garrett, Comb. 227. To put an end to this controversy, the statute 3 & 4 Anne, ch. 9, § 1, enacted, that all notes signed by a person, promising to pay to another, his order or bearer, any sum of money, should be construed to be, by virtue thereof, due and payable to any person, to whom the same is made payable. One effect of this statute was, that an action of debt might be maintained on a promissory note without alleging a consideration, and of consequence, without proving any. Not very long after this change was effected by the statute of Anne, our assembly passed a law resembling that statute very strongly, as respects promissory notes; 4 Hen. Stat. at large, May 1730, ch. 5, p. 273-5. It enacts, that "to the end the recovery of money upon promissory notes, and other writings without seal, may *be rendered more easy &c. if any person shall sign any note, or by any other writing shall promise and oblige himself, to pay any sum of money, or quantity of tobacco, to any other person, such person to whom the money &c. is payable, shall and may commence and maintain an action of debt, and recover judgment for what shall appear to be due thereupon, with costs." By the same act such notes were made assignable, and the assignee enabled to sue in his own name, allowing all discounts against the assignor. These provisions, from that day to this, have continued to be law. It seems to me, that the object and effect of this legislation was to put promissory notes on the same footing here, which they occupied in England, except giving to them the character of bills of exchange, which was prevented by the clause allowing discounts.

There can be no doubt, that our act meant to enable the holder of such notes to bring debt on the note itself, without laying or proving any consideration; the defendant having it always in his power, from the nature of the instrument, to go into the consideration. If the act did not mean this, it is impossible to conceive what was its object. It expresses the intention of rendering the recovery on such notes more easy: how? not by giving debt on the contract, for that lay at common law; but by giving debt on the note itself, and thus dispensing with the necessity of laying a consideration. That such is the meaning of the law, is further proved by this, that in suits on such notes, no writ of inquiry is necessary, and unless the office judgment be set aside, the clerk is by law directed to issue execution for the full amount of principal and interest due on the note, just as on an instrument under seal. This, then, being the just interpretation of the law, strengthened by the universal practice of the country, the court was perfectly correct in overruling the motion. The judgment is correct throughout.

The other judges concurred, and the judgment was affirmed.

200 *Orndoff v. Turman and Others.

Estate Tail—Statute Abolishing—Effect on Estate Tail in Abeyance.—Tenant in fee tail general aliens in fee, by deed of lease and release with general warranty, in 1769; and tenant in tail lives till 1816, and then dies leaving issue: HELD, that the statutes of 1776 and 1785 abolishing entails, barred the issue, and converted the estate tail, even though it were in abeyance, into a pure and absolute fee, and confirmed the fee simple to the tenant in tail's alienee in fee.

This was a formedon in descender, brought in the circuit court of Jefferson, by Turman and others against Orndoff, for 306 acres of land with the appurtenances.

The demandants in their count, claimed as heirs of the body of Prudence Harbour, daughter and sole heir of the body of Magdalena Pusey, who was a daughter of John Vanmeter; and declared, that, the said Vanmeter being in his lifetime seized in his demesne as of fee of the land demanded, made and published his last will and testament, which was after his death, in the year 1745, duly proved and recorded; whereby he devised the land demanded to the said Prudence and the heirs of her body begotten; by virtue of which gift the said Prudence entered into and upon the land demanded, and was seized thereof, in her demesne as of fee and right, according to the form of the gift aforesaid, by taking the caples to the value of one dollar, till 1769, when she conveyed the said land to Jacob Vandever in fee simple, and bound herself and her heirs of warrant and defend the same to the said Vandever and his heirs forever; and the said Prudence died in the year 1816; and from her the right to the said land, according to the form of the gift aforesaid, descended to the demandants, as issue of the body and heirs of the said Prudence.

The tenant put in a general demurrer to the count, in which the demandants joined. And he also pleaded the general plea, defending his seizin, as of fee and right

&c. and putting himself on the grand assize, and praying recognition *to be made whether he had greater right to hold as he held, or the demandants to have &c. And the demandants in like manner put themselves on the grand assize, and prayed recognition to be made &c.

The parties agreed that the assize should be empaneled, and should find a special verdict, before the judgment of the court should be given on the demurrer. Whereupon the assize was empaneled, and found a special verdict, stating this case:

John Vanmeter was, in his lifetime, seized of the land in fee, and died so seized in August 1745, having first duly made and published his last will and testament, whereby (inter alia) he devised as follows: "I devise to my son Abraham Vanmeter and his heirs lawfully begotten, a certain tract of land &c. provided there be no heirs male or female of my said son or sons hereafter mentioned, live to arrive to the age of twenty-one years, that then after the decease of my said son or sons aforesaid, or their heirs, that then their part of land to be equally divided among my surviving devisees hereafter mentioned." And "I give and bequeath unto my daughter Magdalena the sum of twenty shillings as her full legacy &c. And I do devise unto her heirs lawfully begotten of her body a certain tract of land [which was the land demanded in this action] to be held and enjoyed by the heirs of my said daughter, under the limitations and restrictions, according to the devise to my son Abraham Vanmeter's heirs."

The testator's daughter Magdalena, the wife of one Pusey, had issue at the date of the will one daughter, named Prudence, and died leaving this and no other child. Prudence entered upon and held the land, under the above recited devise thereof to her in her grandfather's will. She married Elijah Harbour in 1763, who died in 1768. And she, then, a widow of full age, by deed of lease and release, dated the 1st and 2d September 1769, bargained and sold and conveyed the land to Jacob Vandever, with a covenant that she was seized of an estate of inheritance in fee simple, 202 *and general warranty against her and her heirs and all persons whatsoever.

The tenant claimed under Vandever.

Prudence Harbour died in 1816. The demandants were the issue of her body, and her heirs in parcenary according to the existing law of descents of Virginia.

And the question referred to the court was, Whether the law upon this case, was for the demandants or for the tenant?

The circuit court held, that the law on the demurrer, and on the special verdict, was for the demandants, and gave them judgment for the land demanded in the count, and ascertained by a previous survey. The tenant appealed to this court.

Wickham for the appellant, submitted the question to the court, Whether Prudence

*The principal case is cited in Watts v. Cole, 2 Leigh 668.

Pusey took an estate tail under the will of her grandfather? His argument proceeded on the supposition that she did.

Supposing the right stood unaffected by the statute abolishing entails and converting them into estates in fee simple, and the statute repealing all english statutes, and especially the statute de donis; and supposing the formdon to be the proper remedy; these demandants are not entitled either to the right or the remedy. They are the heirs of Prudence, the donee in tail, only by force of the statute of descents of 1785; and that statute makes them heirs only of that to which she had title at her death; of that which descended from her. Now, the very ground on which the demandants claim right, must be that she had no title in her at her death; that she had parted with all her estate and interest; and that her issue are entitled per formam doni. The statute of descents does not recognize descents in tail, which had long before been abolished, but only descents and heirs in fee simple. The heir in tail, if any such there can now be, must be the heir in tail at common law, or by the statute de donis; the eldest son, namely, of the donee in tail; he alone, if any body, has the right, and is entitled to this remedy of formdon in descender.

203 *But the right and the remedy were both given by the english statute de donis; and that statute was repealed along with the whole of the english statute law, by our statute of 1792. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 40, § 3, 4, 5, p. 137. The 4th section of this statute does indeed provide, that all rights arising under any english statute, at any time before the commencement of that act, shall remain in the same condition in all respects as if the act had never been made; but this proviso cannot save the right claimed here, as a right arising under the statute de donis before the commencement of the repealing act. In whom was the right now claimed in 1792? Not in the donee in tail (as the demandant's counsel will say) for she had parted with every scintilla of her right: not in Vandever her grantee, as they must also contend: and surely not in the heirs of the body of the donee in tail, for she was then living, and nemo est hares viventis. The right, it will be said, was in abeyance. If so, when did it commence or arise, within the meaning of the proviso of the general repealing statute? When it accrued; when the donee in tail died; that is, after the commencement of the repealing act, for she lived till 1816. Neither does the saving, in the 5th section of that general repealing act, of all writs remedial and judicial given by the english statutes, save this remedy by formdon to these parties; for the saving of the writs remedial and judicial, can only be co-extensive with the rights such writs were given to enforce. If the right was not saved, neither, of course, was the remedy. Suppose the demandants had died before their mother; one cannot imagine any right, which they could have died entitled to, in fact or in contemplation of law. Surely, therefore, neither the right nor the specific remedy given by the statute de donis, was saved to these demandants, as a right preexistent to the general repealing statute of 1792.

At any rate, formdon did not lie. It never lay where the party had a right of entry. The conveyance by the donee in tail, passed only what was her own to dispose of; what she had a right to convey.

This the demandants themselves
204 *are bound to maintain: they must maintain, that she had no right to convey away the interest of her issue in tail; in other words, that her conveyance enured to assure the estate to the vendee only during her life. Their rights, then, accrued at her death. If, therefore, they have any title, they had also a right of entry, at the time they brought the formdon. If it be supposed, that the conveyance of the donee in tail with general warranty, worked a discontinuance; yet the warranty could only work the discontinuance, when it descended upon the heirs. The warranty of the donee in tail descended on her heirs in tail, and their right accrued, at one and the same instant of time. Here is a supposed discontinuance, coeval with the supposed accruing, of a right. If a general warranty works a discontinuance, it is only because it descends on the heirs. The warranty here descended on heirs, made heirs, not by the statute de donis, or performam doni, but by the statute of descents of Virginia; heirs in fee simple: and descending on such heirs, and working a discontinuance of the estate tail, it bound those heirs: it estopped and barred them.

The demandants have no manner of right. The statute of 1776, abolishing entails, annihilated every right to which they could possibly pretend; and if that statute did not, the statute of 1785 did.

The statute of 1776 provides, that any person who now hath, or hereafter may have, any estate in fee tail in lands in possession, or who now is, or hereafter may be, entitled to any such estate tail, in reversion or remainder, expectant on any estate for life or lives, howsoever created, shall from henceforth, or from the commencement of such estate tail, stand seized in fee simple &c. Acts of October 1776, ch. 26. § 2; 9 Hen. stat. at large, p. 226. The argument, on which the appellees rest their hopes, I suppose, is this: that the statute uses only the present and future tenses, not the past; it speaks only of every person who now hath (that is, at the time of the enactment) or hereafter may have, an estate tail; the donee in tail, in the present

205 instance, had no *estate tail in her, at the time the act was passed, having conveyed in fee simple by deed with general warranty several years before; the estate tail was at that time in abeyance: therefore, the statute applies not to her, or any person in her situation, or any estate tail in the situation this was. The argument is a mere verbal criticism. That is not the way to expound such statutes as this. The object and policy of the statute was to abolish all estate tail; to prevent perpetuities of property, and to that end to cut off the issue in tail. Can it be reconciled with such an object and such a policy, to preserve an estate tail, which happened to be, as this is supposed to have been, in abeyance? The statute abolished all estates tail without exception, or it stopped short of its purpose.

Here the donee in tail conveyed the fee simple, when she had not the fee to convey; and, afterwards, during her life, the right she claimed to convey, she was empowered by the statute to convey. This is the true view of the case. If tenant for life convey in fee, and afterwards the reversioner convey the reversion to him, this enures to the benefit of the grantee of the tenant for life. So, if a mortgagor sells and conveys, and then obtains a defeazance of the mortgage, this enures to the benefit of the purchaser from the mortgagor. These cases, to be sure, are not the same with the present: they are only analogous; but the same principle of justice equally applies to both.

If the demandants have the right they claim, on the ground on which they claim it, on the only ground on which they can pretend to it, namely, that an estate tail in the particular circumstances in which this was placed at the time of the enactment of the statute of 1776, is not within the act; then the provisions of that statute never touched it, and never can reach it. They must recover it as an estate tail, hold it as an estate tail, and so continue to hold it forever. A like verbal criticism of the statute will preserve to them a perpetual estate tail: for, adhering to the letter, the words "hereafter may have any estate tail,"

206 import the having such "estate by conveyance or gift hereafter made; and the entails already created and then existing, which were to come to the tenants hereafter, are, in the literal meaning of the statute, such as come in the way of reversion or remainder, not such as come by descent. If we adhere to the letter, the statute affects not any estate tail that should come by descent; and it will leave these demandants an estate tail, to hold as such; and as to them the policy of the statute will be wholly defeated. Their counsel may say, that so soon as they get it, the statute will convert it into a fee simple in their hands. But why? not because the letter of the statute, but because the policy of it extends to the case. The policy of the statute extends to the whole case, as well as their part of it: the policy of the statute cuts them off. Why should their right, supposing it was in abeyance, be less an object of reprobation and destruction, that the rights of issue in tail that were not in abeyance?

The statute of 1785 removes all doubt. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 99, § 22, p. 368. This statute does not, like that of 1776, speak of the "persons who now have or hereafter may have estates tail:" it enacts in the broadest terms, that every estate which was, on the 7th October 1776, an estate in fee tail, shall be deemed from that time to have been, and from thenceforward to continue, an estate in fee simple." Now, was the estate tail here claimed, in existence in October 1776 or not? The demandants are obliged to maintain that it was in existence: but then they will say, it was in existence only in contemplation of law; it was in abeyance. Yet the statute of 1785 makes no distinction between estates tail existing in contemplation of law, and estates tail existing in fact; between estates tail in abeyance, and estates tail any otherwise existing or circumstanced. Its words are broad enough to embrace all; its policy condemns all estates tail alike; it converts all estates tail into fees simple; it annihilates the rights of all issue it tail, and unfetters the property.

It will be said, in respect to this statute likewise, that it did not operate immediately upon this estate, which was 207 *then in abeyance, but waited till it ceased to be in abeyance; and when the demandants, as heirs in tail, shall recover it, then and not till then the statute will convert it into a fee simple in their hands. But, clearly, the only future estates tail, which are provided for as such by this statute, are those limited since October 1776; so that this statute converted this estate tail into fee simple, as one existing in October 1776, or it never can so convert it at all.

When an estate tail is in abeyance, where and how does it exist? We are told, it lies in expectancy till the issue of the tenant in tail becomes by his death his heirs of the body; then it ceases to be in nubibus; then it becomes a material sensible object. Still the question recurs, what, where and in whom, is its present existence? I say, in the tenant in tail, who has in himself, during his life, all those his heirs, in expectancy of whom the estate tail is lying in abeyance. Therefore, in the present case, the estate tail was converted by the statutes, into a fee simple in the donee in tail: and then this statutory enlargement of her rights, enured to the benefit of her alienee in fee; and her warranty descended upon and barred her heirs claiming to the heirs under the statute of descents, that is, only as heirs of a fee simple inheritance.

The case of Nelson v. Harwood, 3 Call, 394, is not exactly like this; but I think it a stronger case for the issue in tail; and the reasoning of the court, certainly, is applicable to the present and all like cases. Cases of the same kind with that, and with this, cases without number, have occurred. My experience enables me to say, with intire confidence, that the effect of the statutes to cut off the issue in tail, never was doubted till now: the grantee of tenants in tail aliening in fee before 1776, have held the property without question: and to affirm this judgment, were to unsettle numerous titles hitherto regarded as indisputable.

P. C. Pendleton, Stanard and Leigh, for the appellees, said this court had decided, that Prudence Pusey took under 208 *the devise in her grandfather's will, but declined to decide, whether she took any or what estate of inheritance. Pendleton v. Vandever, 1 Wash. 381. They should assume, for it was perfectly clear, that she took an estate tail under the devise, and was tenant in tail, when in 1769 she aliened to Vandever, under whom the tenant claims.

The rights of the issue in tail were preserved by the laws then in force, against all alienations of the tenant in tail. In England, the issue might be barred, by fine or by common recovery, or by lineal warranty descending on the issue with assets, or collateral warranty without assets. 7 Wils. Bac. Abr. Warranty, F. G. H. pp. 232, 3, 4. But, in Virginia, by a statute of 1705, re-enacted in 1710 and 1748, the issue could only be barred by a special act of assembly, except as to estates tail not exceeding £200 sterling in value, for the barring of which a particular mode was provided, in the nature of a writ ad quod damnum. Acts of 1710, ch. 13, § 4; 3 Hen. stat. at large, p. 517; 1748, ch. 1, § 14, 15, 16; 5 Id. 414.

Different modes of alienation by tenant in tail, had different effects in regard to the rights, and, by consequence, the remedy, of the issue. A mere bargain and sale, or lease and release, did not take away the entry of the issue; and, as he might enter, when upon the death of his ancestor his right accrued, so he might maintain ejectment. But a feoffment with livery of seisin, or a deed of bargain and sale or lease and release with warranty, worked a discontinuance, took away the entry of the issue, turned his interest into a right, and put him to his formedon in descender, called his writ of right. Harg. Co. Litt. 330, a, note 1.

It is material to ascertain the precise effect of the conveyance of Prudence, the tenant in tail, to Vandever, by her deed of lease and release with warranty in 1769. The effect of the conveyance, by the common law, is so well settled by authority, that there can be no question about it. The conveyance divested the tenant in tail of all her interest in the land; worked a discontinuance of the estate tail, 209 *which thenceforth till the death of the tenant in tail, remained in abeyance; and passed to the alienee Vandever, not an estate for the life of his grantor, nor the fee tail, but a fee simple defeasible by the issue in tail. Harg. Co. Litt. § 649, 650, fo. 345, a. Id. 330, a, note 1; Gilb. Ten. 119; Pig. on Recov. 9, 10; Case of Fines, 84; Seymour's case, 10 Rep. 95; Stone v. Newman, Cro. Car. 429; Machell v. Clark, 2 Ld. Raym. 779; S. C. Com. Rep. 119, and 7 Mod. 18; Tyrrel v. Mead et al., 3 Burr. 1703; Neville v. Rivers, 7 T. R. 276; 1 Wms. Saund. 250, note 1. As to Walsingham's case, Plowd. 547, the case itself (if, indeed, it did not turn on a mere default in pleading) only establishes, that feoffment by tenant in tail of the gift of the crown, could not divest the estate tail as against the crown, or bar or divest the reversion of the crown; and the dictum there, "that there is no ancient book that warrants the opinion of Littleton, that the entail is in abeyance," seems to be the objection to Littleton's opinion referred to by Coke in his commentary on Littleton, § 649, and said to be of no weight; and the authority of this case of Walsingham, is denied in Sheffield v. Radcliff, Godb. 300; S. C. Hob. 334. The dictum, ascribed to lord Holt in Salkeld's report of Machell v. Clark, 2 Salk. 620, "that if tenant in tail convey in fee, the estate tail is not in abeyance, but in the alienees," is a mere verbal mistake: what lord Holt said was, that the inheritance was not in abeyance, as appears plainly from the other reports of the case, before cited. If it be supposed, that the common law was altered, in respect to the effect of alienations in fee by tenants in tail, by the statute of 1748, ch. 1, § 14, prohibiting fines and recoveries and all other acts of tenants in tail, whereby to cut off or defeat the entail; that statute will be found on the least examination, not to interfere at all with the effect of alienations by tenants in tail, except so far as to prevent them from cutting off the issue or defeating the entail; and the case of Gleeson's heirs v. Scott, 3 Hen. & Munf. 278, is directly in point and conclusive, that, notwithstanding that statute, 210 *alienations in fee by tenant in tail, divested all his estate, and passed a base fee to the alienee defeasible by the issue in tail.

Seeing, then, that Prudence, the donee in tail, had by her alienation in fee with warranty, divested herself of her estate tail and all manner of estate in the land, discontinued the estate tail, and vested in Vandever, the alienee, a fee simple defeasible by the issue in tail; and that the estate tail was in abeyance, awaiting the vesting thereof in the heir in tail at the death of the tenant in tail; the question remains, Whether either the statute of 1776 or that of 1785, for abolishing entails and converting them into fees simple, could have had any effect to enlarge the estate of the donee intail for the benefit of her alienee, when she had no estate whatever in herself, or to convert the estate of her alienee from a base defeasible fee simple into a pure and absolute fee?

The statute of 1776 provides, that "any person who now hath or hereafter may have an estate in fee tail in lands in possession &c. shall from henceforth, or from the commencement of such estate, stand ipso facto seized in fee simple." The expressions "any person who now hath an estate tail in possession," plainly import, in common acceptation, the having, at the present, an estate tail in possession, or what is the same thing, an unobstructed right to the estate and to the possession thereof; and the legal import of the words is the same. The phrases "have an estate," "has an estate," and the like, occur frequently in our own statute book, and, in every instance, import an actual, vested, subsisting interest. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 98, § 1, p. 359; ch. 113, § 29, p. 453. So the english statute of wills provides, "that every person having manors &c. shall have power to give &c." and it has been adjudged, that an estate which has been turned to a right is not devisable. 4 Wils. Bac. Legacies and Devises, B. p. 248; Brett v. Ridden, Plowd. 343. So, the statute of uses provides, "that all and every person and persons that have or shall have any 211 use in fee *simple &c. shall from henceforth stand and be seized, and be deemed and judged in lawful seizin estate and possession, of and in the same manors &c." And Bacon, in his reading on the statute, says, the word seized excludes chattels and rights; Law tracts, 335. Seizin, estate and possession, imply not a possession in law only but a seizin in fact, not a title to enter into the land but an actual estate; Id. 338. Uses suspended by disseisins, at the time of the passage of the statute, were not executed till a regress of the feoffees; Id. 332, 5. The words of our statute of 1776, are particularly clear and strong: any person who now hath an estate tail in possession, shall henceforth stand ipso facto seized in fee simple. How could any person who did not then have an estate in fee tail, who did not then stand seized in fee tail, thenceforth stand ipso facto seized in fee simple? A mere right is not an estate; the word estate implies right and seizin conjoined. If, therefore, we are to gather the meaning of this statute from its words, it is quite obvious, that it did not operate to enlarge the estate tail in Prudence, the former tenant in tail, for she had no estate tail and no estate of any kind in her at the time, and could never after have the same estate tail with which she had parted, re-vested in her; and that it did not directly affect the estate held by her alienee, Vandever, since the estate he held certainly was not an estate tail, but a base defeasible fee simple. And how the statute could operate through the tenant in tail, upon or in respect of an estate which she had not, to enlarge or convert the estate of her alienee from a fee tail to a fee simple, when he held no fee tail, and already held a fee simple, passes our comprehension. The words of this statute are not at all ambiguous; but if they were, they should receive a construction as near to the rule and reason of the common law as may be, and by the course which that observes in other cases. 6 Wils. Bac. Abr. Statute, I. 4, p. 383. Now, by the rule and reason and course of the common law, Prudence, the tenant in tail, after her conveyance in 1769, was incapable of taking a release of 212 the reversion *in fee which remained in the heir of the donor. Co. Litt. § 455, 6, 7, fo. 268, a. And, pari ratione, this statute of 1776, which may with great propriety be considered as a release of the reversion of the donor to the tenant in tail, could not give her the fee simple absolute: she had no estate which the statute could act upon: she could not thenceforth stand seized, possessed and entitled, as the act required.

It is said this argument consists in a mere verbal criticism. We own, that it rests on the supposition, that the language of the statute is the surest and best expositor of its meaning. But, is the present case within the statute, upon any fair or allowable equitable construction? or within its policy? "By an equitable construction a case not within the letter of a statute, is sometimes holden to be within its meaning, because it is within the mischief intended to be remedied: the reason for such construction is, that the lawmaker could not set down every case in express terms." The question ought to be, Did the lawmaker intend to comprehend the case? If he did, the court applies the statute to it; if he did not, it can never be a question, whether or no, the law ought to have provided for the case. 6 Wils. Bac. Abr. Statute, I. 6, p. 384. The judicial power of giving an equitable construction to a statute, especially an equitable construction enlarging the statute, is a very delicate one, and ought to be exercised with caution: it extends not to the length of justifying the judges, under colour of expounding the law, to make law, or even to provide for a casus omissus of the lawgiver. If the case now before the court, did occur (as most probably it did occur) to the framers of the statute of 1776, and they had really intended to comprehend it, they would have used words that would comprehend it; and the use of words that exclude it, shews that it was excluded by design: if such cases did not occur to them at all, the most that can be said, is, that here is casus omissus in the statute. But, is the present case within the policy of the statute? within the mischief intended to be remedied? In

213 other *words, was there the same reason for giving the fee simple to the alienee of tenant in tail, who had aliened in fee before the statute was passed, that there was for giving the fee simple to the tenant in tail in possession, in reversion or in remainder, at the time? and was the omission to do so only an oversight? The policy of the act of 1776, the mischiefs it was intended to remedy, are declared in the preamble; that the perpetuation of property in families by gifts in tail, tended to deceive fair traders, who gave credit on the visible possession of such estates, discouraged the holders thereof from taking care and improving the same, sometimes did injury to the morals of youth, by rendering them independent of and disobedient to their parents, and had employed very much of the time of the legislature in docking them. Now, none of the reasons for enacting the statute, have any more application to the case of persons to whom tenant in tail had previously aliened in fee, than to any other defeasible estate whatever; and the legislature could have had no motive to embrace the case within its enactment, which would not have induced it to make all manner of defeasible estates indefeasible in the hands of the holders. On the other hand, the motive for excluding such cases, is very obvious. In Virginia, alienation in fee by tenants in tail, not looking to the legislature for sanction or confirmation, were on the face of them very suspicious transactions. It was not so in England, because there the tenant in tail was master of the inheritance, in fee, by reason of his power to dock the entail at pleasure. But the case was different here: the tenant in tail could by no act of his own, make good his conveyance in fee: his issue could only be barred by special act of assembly; and that could only be obtained by settling other lands or estate on the issue. And such having been the law of the land from 1705, and being (we must presume) universally known to be the law; the parties to a conveyance in fee by tenant in tail, without authority of a special act of assembly, must have known, that the estate of the vendee was defeasible after the death of the

214 vendor; *and the inference was unavoidable, either that the consideration was regulated according to the imperfection of the title, or that the conveyance (especially if covenants for good title in fee and general warranty were superadded) was made to assume that shape by some unfair practice, or for some sinister purpose, or in contempt and disregard of the existing laws and policy. Here was reason enough, presenting itself at the first blush to the mind of the legislature, so to frame the statute of 1776, as to leave all such cases to the regular action of the laws under which they arose.

It is objected, that if the demandants be now entitled to recover this estate per formam doni, because the statute did not apply to an estate tail so circumstanced as this was at the time of the enactment, the statute will not apply to it in the hands of the demandants when they shall have recovered it, and it will remain an estate tail, unalterably, forever; for that the provision of the statute, that any person who hereafter may have any estate tail, shall stand seized in fee simple, relates to gifts in tail by future conveyance or devise. But the words embrace all estates tail that should be afterwards acquired, without reference to the manner of acquisition: and thus, in order to found this objection, it is endeavoured to restrict and narrow the meaning of these words, with the same violence, which is to be exerted in stretching other words beyond their fair import. Suppose Prudence, the tenant in tail, after having aliened in fee to Vandever, in 1769, and thus discontinued the estate tail, had died before the statute of 1776 was enacted: can it be doubted, that her heir in tail might have recovered the estate, after the statute was passed? that he could have so recovered it, only as heir in tail, per formam doni? as an estate tail, upon which the statute would operate to convert it into a fee simple in his hands, so soon as it was recovered?

The provisions of the statute of 1785 are supposed to go beyond those of the statute of 1776. Yet the president Pendleton, in Carter v. Tyler, 1 Call, 184, comparing the statute of 1776 with that of 1785
215 and the revised act of *1792, and in answer to an argument which rendered the comparison necessary, said, "I am of opinion, that these acts [of 1785 and 1792] make no alteration, but only express in other words, and those not so strong, what is in the former law [of 1776]."

The statute of 1785 provides, that "every estate in lands and slaves, which, on the 7th day of October 1776, was an estate in fee tail, shall be deemed from that time to have been, and from thenceforward to continue, an estate in fee simple." In whom? not in a person, who, though once tenant in tail, had parted with every scintilla of estate and right before 1776; not in a disseisor or discontinuee; not in a person, who, by the alienation in fee of the tenant in tail, held a fee simple, base and defeasible indeed, but still a fee; but, in the hands of such person as on the 7th October 1776, held the estate in fee tail an estate in possession, reversion or remainder. In our case, Prudence, the donee in tail, had no estate tail in her in 1776, and no estate of any kind; for she had divested herself of all estate and interest: Vandever had no estate tail in him, but a defeasible fee simple; the estate tail had been discontinued; it was in abeyance. The mere right which remained to the issue in tail, in expectancy till the death of the tenant in tail, was not an estate in 1776 or in 1785, on which the statutes could operate: neither can those statutes operate till the seizin shall be recovered to the right, by the issue in tail.

The statute of 1785 further provides, that "all estates, which before the 7th day of October 1776, by the law, if it had remained unaltered, would have been estates in fee tail, and which now, by virtue of this section, are and will continue estates in fee simple, shall from that time and henceforth be discharged of the conditions annexed thereto by the common law &c." Now, suppose the law had remained unaltered; then, no fee tail would have been in Prudence, the donee in tail in October 1776, and the same fee tail never could have been re-vested in her; no fee tail would ever have been vested in Vandever, her alienee; 216 and the *estate tail never could be vested in any one, till it was recovered by the heirs in tail.

The statute of 1785, then, in respect to the present case at least, if not (as president Pendleton thought) in respect to every possible case, was exactly tantamount to the statute of 1776.

The case of Nelson v. Harwood, 3 Call, 394, is not an authority to govern the decision of this case. (Here the counsel entered into a minute examination of that case.) There has been one case of the same kind with the present, adjudged in North Carolina, Wells v. Newbolt, Cam. & Norw. Rep. 375, and another in New Jersey, Denn v. d. Hinchman v. Clark & al., 1 Cox's Rep. 340, in both of which the decisions sustain the arguments for the demandants in our case, that the rights of the issue in tail are not affected by the statute abolishing entails.

If the heirs in tail of Prudence the donee in tail have right, the demandants, who are the issue of her body and her heirs according to the course of descents at the time of her death in 1816, and not the eldest son who would have been the heir in tail according to the course of descents at common law, are the persons entitled to the right. The precise idea of an estate in tail general, is "an estate that shall go, upon the death of the donee or tenant, to his heirs being at the same time the issue of his body;" arg. in Shelley's case, 1 Rep. 103, b. It is a mutilated or truncated inheritance from which the heirs general are cut off; 2 Black. Comm. 112, note m. Blackstone (Id. 201), says, "All the rules relating to purchases whereby the legal course of descents is broken or altered, perpetually refer to the settled law of inheritance, as a datum of first principle universally known, and upon which their subsequent limitations are to work. Thus, a gift in tail, or to a man and the heirs of his body, is a limitation that cannot be perfectly understood, without a previous knowledge of descents in fee simple. One may well perceive, that this is an estate confined in its descent, to such heirs alone of 217 the donee, as have *sprung or shall spring from his body; but who those heirs are, whether all his children, both male and female, or the male only, and among the males, whether the eldest, youngest or other son alone, or all the sons together, shall be his heirs; this is a point that we must result back to the standing law of descents in fee simple to be informed of." And as it is an inflexible rule, that nemo est hæres viventis, this settled law of inheritance, this standing law of descents in fee, necessarily refers to the law of descents in fee simple, at the time of the death of the tenant in tail, as ascertaining who are the issue of his body that are also his heirs. Thus we find, that if lands in Kent are entailed, they go to all the sons in parcenary; if lands held in borough-english are entailed, they go to the youngest son. 1 Wils. Bac. Abr. Borough-English, p. 532; 3 Id. Gavelkind, p. 364, 9. Again, if gavelkind lands be disgavelled, they afterwards descend to the heir by the common law, being the issue of the donee in tail. Burridge v. Earl of Sussex, 2 Ld. Raym. 1292. True, it does not appear in the report of that case, that the lands entailed had been disgraived subsequently to the entail; but the circumstance that nothing is said on that head, shews that it was regarded as immaterial. By statute 34 & 35 Hen. 8, c. 26, § 91, 127, it was provided, that "all lands &c. in Wales should be english tenure, and not partible among heirs male according to the custom of gavelkind," which it seems prevailed in North Wales. Gavelkind descent of lands in Ireland, existed as an incident to the custom of tanistry till the 5th year of James I. In the reign of Anne, there was an Irish statute making the lands of papists descendible according to the custom of gavelkind; but by another statute 17 & 18 Geo. II. the descent of the lands of papists was again reduced to the course, of the common law. Harg. Co. Litt. § 265, p. 175, b, note 4, 176, a, note 1. But we nowhere find even a suggestion, that entails created during one law, continued after the change of the law, to descend according to the course of the law at the time of their creation.

218 The absence of cases to *that effect seems conclusive; for it cannot be, that there are entailed estates in Wales or Ireland, that descend to all the sons, by reason of their having been created at a time when gavelkind was the course of descent. It would be too remarkable not to appear in the books of reports, or in the works of writers on the law.

It is said, the course of descent of this entail is no wise affected by the statute of descents of 1785, re-enacted in 1792 and 1819, which provides, that "where any person having title to any real estate of inheritance, shall die intestate as to such estate, it shall descend," &c. (1 Rev. Code, ch. 96, § 1, p. 355.) That Prudence, the donee in tail, had no title at the time of her death: that it is obvious, that the statute has no reference to descents in tail, but only to descents in fee simple: and, therefore, that the descent in tail in this case can only be governed by the common law, which makes the eldest son heir in tail. We answer; if it were important, it might well be denied, that the statute of descents provides exclusively for descents in fee simple: for, suppose Prudence had died before the statute of 1776 abolishing entails, it is clear her eldest son would have been entitled, and might have recovered the fee tail, as heir in tail, and then the statute would have converted the fee tail into a fee simple in his hands: but if the eldest son had died after the statute of descents took effect in 1787, without having recovered the land, we apprehend there can be no doubt, that all his children would have been entitled, and must have joined in a formedon to recover the estate tail. To put this idea in another light, let us suppose the statutes of 1776 and 1785 docking entails, had never been passed (and our argument supposes what is tantamount, that those statutes do not operate on his case); no one, we presume, would contend, that the statute of descents of 1785, did not alter the descent of the entailed estate; that the demandants here would not be the persons entitled to recover: no one would attempt to draw a distinction from the statute of descents, between a case where the ancestor had 219 discontinued and where he had *not.

But grant that the statute of descents provides solely for the descent of estates in fee simple; the conclusion would be a non sequitur. The effect of that statute is, to ascertain that the demandants here are the heirs at law of Prudence, the donee in tail; and being so, and being at the same time the issue of her body, they come within the clear legal operation of the words creating this estate; they are the heirs of her body entitled per formam doni. If the eldest son only had sued, it would have been objected, and the objection would have been insurmountable, that though he was the issue of the body of Prudence, he was not and never had been her heir.

Formedon was clearly the proper remedy. The estate tail had been discontinued; turned to a right; the right of entry taken away; and therefore, the issue was put to his formedon in descender, which is his writ of right. Harg. Co. Litt. 330, a, note 1, before cited.

It is objected, that the statute of 1792 repealing all english statutes, repeals the statute de donis, under which the demandants claim; and that this case is not within the proviso of that statute, which saves all rights arising under english statutes before its commencement. As to the first branch of this objection, so far from its being true that the statute de donis is repealed, the statutes for docking entails preserve it in force, for the purpose of ascertaining what is an estate tail, in order that it may be converted into a fee simple. Then, as to the time when the right here asserted commenced, nothing seems clearer, than that it commenced with the creation of the entail by Vanmeter's will in 1745; that the estate tail was discontinued by the alienation in fee by the donee in tail in 1769; that the fee tail was in abeyance, thenceforth till the death of the donee in tail in 1816; and that, therefore, though it accrued to these particular demandants, only upon the death of the donee, it had commenced long before the general repealing statute of 1792.

If the right was saved by the proviso contained in the 4th section of that act, it cannot be doubted, indeed it is not 220 denied, *that the remedy by for-medon is saved by the 5th section. And it is remarkable, that the revised statute of limitations of 1819, as well as that of 1792, recognizes the formedon as a subsisting remedy, and limits it to twenty years next after the title or cause of action accrued. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 1, p. 487.

CARR, J. This cause was argued with a research and an ability worthy of its importance and its novelty; for to us it is new, though to our forefathers, both the legal doctrines and the form of action, were of common and familiar use. I shall not attempt to discuss the whole subject; but shall consider those leading points
only, which seems to me, to govern the case.

Prudence, it is admitted, was tenant in tail. The demandants claim as her issue per formam doni. It is obvious then, to examine how that claim stands affected by the statutes which our legislature has passed on the subject. It may not be amiss, however, to premise a few remarks as to estates tail.

At the common law, when lands were given to a man and the heirs of his body, he was considered as having a fee simple conditional, which would revert to the donor, if the donee had no heirs of his body; but if he had, this was such a performance of the condition, is rendered his estate absolute; at least, he could alien; he might forfeit; he might charge the land with rents, or other incumbrances, which would bind the issue. But if he did none of these things, the course of descent was regulated by the form of the gift; the land would go to the heirs of his body, and in default of such, would revert to the donor. To prevent this, it was usual for such tenants, so soon as they had performed the condition by having issue, to alien the land, and afterwards re-purchase, taking an absolute estate which would descend to their heirs general. To put a stop to this practice, the nobles and great barons, anxious to perpetuate their possessions in their own families, procured the passage of 221 *the statute of Westminster 2nd, 13

Ed. 1, ch. 1, de donis conditionalibus; which gave birth to estates tail. That family law, as Pigot calls it, produced many and serious mischiefs, as we are told by writers on the subject, and also by some of the most eminent judges of the english bench. Thus Blackstone (2 Comm.
216,) says, "children grew disobedient, when they could not be set aside: farmers were ousted of their leases, made by tenant in tail: creditors were defrauded of their debts: innumerable latent entails were produced, to deprive purchasers of the lands they had fairly bought: treasons were encouraged: so that these estates were justly branded, as the source of new contentions, and mischiefs unknown to the common law, and almost universally considered, as the common grievance of the realm." Still the power of the nobles prevented the repeal of the statute; and after suffering under it long, common recoveries first, and then fines, were brought to bear upon it; and these, together with some other causes, have so weakened, its force, and narrowed its range, as almost to bring back the subject to the ground it occupied under conditional fees at the common law. In the case of Martin v. Strachan, Willes' Rep. 451, 2, lord C. J. Willes (in 1744) delivering the opinion of all the judges to the lords, and speaking of common recoveries, says, "a common recovery is a conveyance on record, invented to give tenant in tail an absolute power to dispose of his estate in fee simple

—I beg your lordships' patience a moment longer, to give you an account of the true origin and nature of these recoveries. As I said before, entailed estates, by the statute de donis, were made unalienable, and neither the issue, nor the remaindermen could be barred, and this was at first considered as a very wise provision, and great encomiums were made upon this statute.
But it was found by experience in a very little time, that this statute had produced very great inconveniences; inconveniences to the crown; inconveniences to the public; and to many private persons: to the crown, as it prevented forfeitures, and greatly in-222 creased the power of the *barons: to the public, as it was prejudicial to trade and commerce, to have estates always continue in the same families, without even a power of raising money upon them; and to private persons, to have their estates so fettered, that they could not make provision for younger children, nor raise money on their estates, though their necessities were never so great." He then goes to speak of the mode of bringing in recoveries in the time of Edward IV. In Atkyns v. Horde, 1 Burr. 60, 115, lord Mansfield, speaking on the same subject, says, "The sense of wise men, and the general bent of the people of this country, have ever been against making land perpetually unalienable. The utility of the end, was thought to justify any means to attain it. Nothing could be more agreeable to the law of tenures, than a male fee unalienable. But this bent, to set property free, allowed the donee, after a son was born, to destroy the limitation, and break the condition of his investiture. No sooner had the statute de donis repeated, what the law of tenures said before, that the tenor of the grant should be observed, than the same bent permitted tenant in tail of the freehold and inheritance, to make an alienation voidable only, under the name of a discontinuance. But this was a small relief. At last, the people having groaned for about 200 years, under the inconveniences of so much property being unalienable; and the great men, to raise the pride of their families, and (in those turbulent times) to prevent their estates from forfeitures, preventing any alteration by the legislature: the same bent threw out a fiction in Taltarum's case, by which tenant in tail of the freehold and inheritance, or with consent of the freeholder, might alien absolutely. Public utility, adopted and gave a sanction to the doctrine, for the real political reason, to break entails; but the ostensible reason, from the fictitious recompense, hampered succeeding times, how to distinguish cases, which were within the false reason given, but not within the real policy of the invention." I cite these authorities (and might adduce many more) to shew, that at an early period, the mischiefs of the 223 statute had been *felt, and remedies found to mitigate them, which had become settled rules of law, long before the establishment of this colony; so much so, that the right to suffer a recovery or levy a fine, was considered one of the inseparable incidents of an estate tail; and an attempt to create such estate, divested of that power, would have been as impotent, as the effort to divest tenant in fee of the power of alienation.

In Carter v. Tyler, 1 Call, 182, Mr. Pendleton says, the fine and recovery at an early period was sanctioned by the courts of England, "and so became as much a law of that country, as the statute itself. Our ancestors [he continues] brought hither with them, both laws as a rule of property; and the fine and recovery might have been used here, if the forms could be preserved, until the legislature should interpose to prohibit them." This it did by an act passed in October 1705, and again in 1710, reserving to the legislature the sole power of docking entails. This power was exercised by acts passed on each particular occasion: these acts gave a real recompense, instead of the fictitious one by fine and recovery; and were rather a change of the land on which the estate tail was to operate, than a destruction of that estate. There are several other acts of the colonial assembly shewing the spirit of that body for preserving entails; of these, Mr. Pendleton, in the case of Carter v. Tyler, gives a succinct but clear account. It may seem a little strange, at first sight, that our assembly should be inclined to cherish what had been found so mischievous in the mother country: but we must recollect, that we were then a recent people, forming a distant province of the empire; that the spirit of commerce had never visited our shores; nor was that loftier spirit yet awakened which afterwards gave birth to our revolution. In the case already referred to, Mr. Pendleton says, "In the revised law of 1748 the prohibition of fines and recoveries, and permission of writs of ad quod damnum, were continued till the revolution. That event having produced a new order of things, this great subject came before the legislature, in 224 October 1776, *under a view of all its legal circumstances, from the common law and the statute de donis, down to that period. The subject of discussion was, whether they should restore the fine and recovery, which was objected to on account of its fictitious nature, and the trouble and expense attending it; but the principal objection was, that it would permit the tenants to continue what was considered as a mischief; and that those who possessed the large estates, would have an inclination to continue them in their families. They, therefore, resolved to cut the gordian knot at once, and ipso facto to vest the fee simple in those who then had, or should in future have, an immediate beneficial interest; that is to say, an estate in fee tail in possession, or a remainder or reversion in tail, after estates for life or lesser estates, unfettering the estates of all future interests, depending in creation, upon these estates tail." Let it be recollected, that Mr. P. is speaking here of matters with which he was familiarly acquainted; that he was a prominent actor in the busy and eventful scenes of the revolution; a member of the assembly which passed the act of 1776 docking entails, and also one of the three revisors who drew the law of 1785 on the same subject.

We will look now more particularly at this act of 1776. It seems to my mind very difficult to read it, and resist the conviction, that it was meant to cut up estates tail, root and branch; to make them all ipso facto estates in fee; to destroy "all rights, title, interest and estate, claim and demand of the issue, remainderman and reversioner;" "unfettering the estates (as Mr. Pendleton strongly expresses it) of all future interests depending in creation upon those estates tail." And this conviction is much strengthened, when we look at the nature of the subject, and the state of things at the passage of the law. We had just cut ourselves loose from a monarchy, and established a republican form of government. This was the first assembly which met under the new constitution, and it became its duty, to remodel the laws, and adapt them to the genius of our infant re- 225 public. In this labour, it was natural that the law of entails should attract the earliest attention; a law, mischievous in its effects upon the general interests of society, and peculiarly hostile to the experiment we were then making.

*JUDGE CARR read the following extract from the memoir of Mr. Jefferson (Vol. I. p. 80, of the work lately published). It is, without doubt, a just account of the policy which induced the act of 1776, and of its history; and in that view is applicable to the question under consideration: but, besides, it is thought very fitting, that the striking character Mr. J. has drawn of the late president Pendleton of this court, should be preserved among the reports of its decisions.

"On 12th October 1776, I obtained leave to bring in a bill, declaring tenants in tail to hold their lands in fee simple. In the earlier times of the colony, when lands were to be obtained for little or nothing, some provident individuals obtained large grants; and desirous of founding great families for themselves, settled them on their descendants in fee tail. The transmission of this property, from generation to generation, in the same name, raised up a distinct set of families, who being privileged by law in the perpetuation of their wealth, were thus formed into a patrician order, distinguished by the splendour and luxury of their establishments. From this order too, the king habitually selected his councillors of state: the hope of which distinction devoted the whole corps to the interests and will of the crown. To annul this privilege, and instead of an aristocracy of wealth, or more harm and danger than benefit to society, to make an opening for the aristocracy of virtue and talent, which nature has wisely provided for the interests of society, and scattered with equal hand through all its conditions, was deemed essential to a well ordered republic. To effect it, no violence was necessary, no deprivation of natural right, but rather an enlargement of it by a repeal of the law. For this would authorise the present holder to divide the property among his children equally as his affections were divided; and would place them, by natural generation, on the level of their fellow citizens. But this repeal was strongly opposed by Mr. Pendleton, who was zealously attached to antient establishments; and who, taken all in all, was the ablest man in debate. I have ever met with. He had not, indeed, the poetical fancy of Mr. Henry, his sublime imagination, his lofty and overwhelming diction: but he was cool, smooth and persuasive: his language flowing, chaste and embellished; his conceptions quick, acute and full of resource:

226 *Look at the preamble, and note the object and policy of the statute, as there declared: Can we suppose, that wise and patriotic legislators would intentionally leave a single fragment existing, of a law, the evils of which they so strongly depict? In Willion v. Berkley, Plowd. 232, 11 Rep. 73, 6 Bac. Abr. 384, we are told, that "such construction ought to be put upon a statute, as may best answer the intention which the makers had in view, for qui hæret in litera, hæret in cortice." Again, under the same head in Bacon, and vouched by the highest authorities, it is said, "The intention of the makers of a statute, is sometimes to be collected from the cause or necessity of making a statute; at other times, from other circumstances. Whenever this can be discovered, it ought to be followed with reason and discretion in the construction of the statute, although such construction seem contrary to the letter of the statute." Again, in Stowel v. Zouch, Plowd. 366, 10 Rep. 101, "A thing which is within the intention of the makers of a statute, is as much within the statute, as if it were within the letter." Now, the statute in question makes tenant in tail, in possession, reversion or remainder, ipso facto, tenant in fee simple. In the act of 1785, which equally bears on this case, which was the work of the same hands, and which one of its makers says was not more extensive than the first law, the idea is thus expressed: "Every estate in lands or slaves, which on 7th October 1776, was an estate in fee tail, shall be deemed from that time to have been, and from thenceforward to continue an estate in fee simple." Much of the learning and ability of the argument were employed to prove, that Prudence, by her conveyance with warranty, had divested herself of the estate tail; that it was not vested in Vandever, because from the nature of the

227 estate it could not *be, and because also the deed to him purported to convey the fee; that it could not be in the issue, because they could have no right whatever during the life of their mother, for nemo est hæres viventis; but that, in truth and in law, the conveyance and warranty of Prudence operated a discontinuance, and put the estate tail in abeyance: and the conclusion from the whole was, that neither Prudence nor Vandever, nor the issue, having an estate tail in possession, reversion or remainder, the case was not reached by the statutes of 1776 and 1785, and must be considered as if they had never never vanquished: for if he lost the main battle, he returned upon you, and regained so much of it, as to make it a drawn one, by dexterous manoeuvres, skirmishes in detail, and the recovery of small advantages, which, little singly, were important all together. You never knew when you were clear of him, but were harassed by his perseverance, until the patience was worn down, of all who had less of it than himself. Add to this, that he was one of the most virtuous and benevolent of men, the kindest friend, the most amiable and pleasant of companions, which ensured a favourable reception to whatever came from him. Finding that the general principle of entails could not be maintained, he took his stand on an amendment, which he proposed, instead of an absolute abolition, to permit the tenant in tail to convey in fee simple. If he chose it: and he was within a few votes of saving so much of the old law. But the bill passed finally for its abolition."—Note in Original Edition.

passed. I have examined this whole doctrine with my best care; and though I feel the highest respect for the counsel who so ably and zealously laboured these points, I must say, that taking all the premises as established, it is clear to my mind, that the conclusion does not follow. I concede, therefore, that the conveyance of Prudence at once worked a discontinuance, and put the estate tail in abeyance; that is, there was no person who could claim title, but the estate still existed, "in the intelligence, remembrance and expectation of the law." If the laws destroying entails did not reach it, it must be either because an estate in abeyance cannot be barred, or because, the legislature did not mean to bar it, or because, meaning to do it, they have not used words, which will effect their meaning. As to the first; in Chudleigh's case, 1 Rep. 135, b, 135, a, Gawdy, justice, said, "That in divers cases, a thing in abeyance may be barred and destroyed; as if tenant in tail be disseised, and releases to the disseisor; now, Littleton says, the estate tail is in abeyance; yet it may be barred by common recovery, in which tenant in tail is vouched." In Mildmay's case, 6 Rep. 42, a, it is said, "So, Hil. 14 Eliz. it was resolved by all the justices of the common pleas in Copwood's case, that if there be tenant in tail, the remainder to the right heirs of J. S. and tenant in tail suffers a common recovery, J. S. being then alive, it shall bar the remainder which was in abeyance and consideration of law." 2 Roll's Rep. 217, 221, and Palm. 139. Thus it is clear, 228 that in England, an *estate tail, though in abeyance, might be barred and destroyed by a common recovery; a fictitious proceeding founded on no statute law, but growing out of public convenience, and the decisions of the courts; a proceeding to which the issue, the remainderman, or the reversioner, were no parties, and which gave them no recompense. Can it then be doubted, that such estates may with us be destroyed by a solemn law enacted by the sovereign authority? Assuredly not.

But, if the legislature had this power, did it intend by its laws to exercise it? With respect to estates tail in possession, reversion or remainder, it is admitted that it did. These were the prominent points, the great interest; and these are cut up by the roots; but it is contended, that here the law stops, and that the possibility of a future interest in the issue, on which the demandants, in the case before us, stand, was either not seen, or, if seen, permitted to remain undisturbed. On the same ground, in Carter v. Tyler, it was insisted, that a contingent remainder was not within the operation of these acts. What was the answer of the court? The president says, "And what is the general aspect of Mr. Washington's reasoning? The issue, who have the first and most important interest, are defeated; and a contingent remainder, which may never take effect, and which I call an estate in the clouds, is preserved. I believe it may be truly said, that no statute ever proceeded upon such a system." But passing by the absurdity, which such a construction would fix on the wise lawgivers and profound statesmen, who, laid the foundations of our government, it seems to me, that these laws themselves furnish the strongest evidence that was intended to destroy every possible interest of the issue. In the preamble, one of the mischiefs stated as the "injury to the morals of youth, by rendering them independent of, and disobedient to, their parents;" this has direct reference to the issue. Another part of the preamble states, that "the former method of docking estates tail by special laws, employed very much of the time of the legislature, and was burthensome to the public, and to individuals;" this shews, *that the intention was, to perform by one general law, the office of those special acts. And what was that office? to turn the estate tail into a fee simple, and bar the issue, remainderman, and reversioner; and in many of these special acts, we find that the estate tail was already in abeyance, the tenants having executed and recorded deeds of conveyance with warranty to the purchasers, which are recited in the preamble of the act. It is true, these acts gave the issue &c. a recompense: but that was a mere creature of the legislative will; they had just the same power to bar them without such recompense. Again, if we look into those special acts (of which I have examined some thirty or forty) we shall find in every one of them, a saving of the rights, interests, title &c. of all persons, other than those claiming under the will, or deed creating the estate tail. So, in this act of 1776, we find a saving to all persons &c. other than the issue, and those in reversion, and remainder, all such right, title, interest, and estate, claim and demand, as they might claim if this act had never been made. Now, I ask, why except the issue from this saving, if it had not been intended to bar their right, title, interest, claim and demand? words, which cover every possibility of interest. It is clear to me, then, that the intention of the law was utterly to destroy the interests of the issue.

But can we give this intention effect? I have already shewn from authority, that intention is the governing principle, the essence of the law. "Every estate [says the statute] which, on 7th October 1776, was an estate tail, shall be deemed from that time to have been, and from thenceforward to continue, an estate in fee simple." Now, I ask, was not the estate, in the case before us, an estate tail on 7th October 1776? You tell me it was in abeyance: admitted, but that did not extinguish it, nor change its nature; it still existed in contemplation of law, and was still an estate tail though in abeyance. Littleton, Coke, all the books, speak of estates tail in abeyance. In the extract from Chudleigh's case before cited, it is said "if tenant in tail be disseised, *Littleton saith, the estate tail is in abeyance."

This estate tail then was within the operation of the act; which destroyed it, extinguished the right of the issue, and thereby enured to the benefit of Vandever, the vendee of Prudence. Is this effect too much to claim for a law, which has been appropriately called a great general common recovery, when we see by the cases cited, that a special and individual common recovery will destroy an estate tail though in abeyance? and when we know, that these recoveries are mere inventions to convert estates tail into fees, which was the direct object of our laws?

But, suppose it were admitted, that an estate tail in abeyance, is not within the express letter of our laws; is it not within the equity? We are told, "By an equitable construction, a case not within the letter of a statute, is sometimes holden to be within the meaning, because it is within the mischief for which a remedy is provided. The reason of such construction is, that the lawmaker could not set down every case in express terms." Co. Litt. 24, b, 6 Bac. Abr. 386. Now, all will agree, that the great mischief which our law meant to remedy, was the fettering, the tying-up of property. We do not know, whether the cases were many or few, but every case like the one before us, would thwart the policy of the law, and continue the fetters on the land, at least one generation longer, when it was meant to cut them all loose at once. Look at the effects in the case before us. The law passed in 1776; the tenant died in 1816; and it is contended, that during all this time the land was tied up; nay, that it is so to this hour, for the demandants, if they recover, must recover an estate tail.

There are several other points, which were urged with great force against the claims of the demandants, as 1. that the repeal of the statute de donis in 1792, during the life of the tenant in tail, when the issue had no vested interest, swept from under them the foundation of their claim: 2. that they claim as issue in tail, and yet all the heirs of the body are joined; 3. that they claim under our statute 231 of descents, and *yet claim an estate unknown to and unprovided for by that statute. On these points I give no opinion, choosing to place the case solely upon the abolition of the right by the statutes.

I think the judgment should be reversed, and judgment entered for the tenant.

CABELL, J. The question is, Whether the entail of the lands in controversy was docked by the statute of 1776, so as to bar the issue of Prudence Harbour?

If the entail be not thus docked, it must be owing to the effect of her deed to Vandever, upon the estate tail which she held in the land before the execution of that deed; for, were it not for that deed, the case would come within the strictest letter of the statute, and the issue would, unquestionably, be barred. I shall endeavour, therefore, to ascertain the effect of the deed, before I inquire into that of the statute. And this will, necessarily, lead me into a brief view of the origin of estates tail.

Estates tail grew out of the operation of the act of Westminster the second upon fees conditional at the common law; which were estates given to a man and the heirs of his body, and so called, because of the condition expressed or implied in the gift, that the land should revert to the donor, if the donee had no heirs of his body, but if he had, that it should then remain to the donee. And, as in other cases, when a condition is once performed, the condition is thenceforth intirely gone, and the thing to which it was before annexed becomes absolute and unconditional, so in this case, as soon as the grantee had any issue born, his estate was supposed to become absolute by the performance of the condition; so far, at least, that he might alien it, and thereby bar not only his own issue, but the reversioner. 2 Black. Comm. 110, 111. And the birth of the issue was not held to be a condition which suspended the fee from vesting, immediately, by the gift; for if he aliened before the birth of issue, it was not only no forfeiture, but, if he afterwards had issue, it was a bar to them. Plow. 239; 2 Inst. 333; Harg. Co. Litt.

232 *326, b, note 1. The statute de donis was made for the purpose of taking away this power of alienation. It declared that the will of the donor should be observed, and that tenements given to a man and the heirs of his body, should, at all events, go to the issue, if there were any; or if none, should revert to the donor. 2 Black. Comm. 112. Blackstone remarks, that "upon the construction of this act of parliament, the judges determined that the donee had no longer a conditional fee simple, which became absolute and at his own disposal, the instant any issue was born; but they divided the estate into two parts, leaving in the donee a new kind of particular estate, which they denominated a fee tail; and investing in the donor, the ultimate fee simple of the land, expectant on the failure of issue; which expectant estate is what we now call a reversion. And hence it is that Littleton tells us, that tenant in fee tail is by virtue of the statute of Westminster the second."

This statute, however, was eluded by the effect which the courts, in the reign of Edward IV. gave to the fictitious proceedings in common recoveries, which, when suffered by tenants in tail, were held to be an effectual destruction of estates tail. "And these recoveries, however clandestinely reduced, are now," says Blackstone, (Ibid, 117,) "become a most common assurance of lands; and are looked upon as the legal means by which tenant in tail may dispose of his lands and tenements." And the effect of such conveyance is to bar, not only the issue, but the remaindermen and reversioner. And, in the reign of Henry VIII. it was enacted, that a fine, duly levied by tenant in tail, should bar the issue and all claiming under such entail. But there are other conveyances by tenants in tail, which do not bar the issue; and it is important to our present purposes, that their precise effect should be ascertained.

Conveyances by grant, by bargain and sale, lease and release, covenant to stand seized, and by release and confirmation in enlargement of an estate, only operate on the right of the party conveying. They, therefore, transfer only the 233 *right, that is, the estate which the party has a right to convey. Hence they are called rightful conveyances, (Harg. Co. Litt. note 1, § 1,) and sometimes innocent conveyances, because, in the language of Littleton, (§ 600,) "they do no hurt or damage to other persons who have right therein." It was formerly doubted, whether the alienation of tenant in tail, by any of these conveyances, passed any thing more than an estate during his life. But it is now definitively settled, by the authorities cited in the argument for the appellees, that such alienation by tenant in tail, passes to the grantee, bargainee &c. an estate of inheritance, a base fee simple, which is unimpeachable during the life of tenant in tail, and which will moreover last as long as the estate tail shall continue, unless it shall be avoided by those who have right to avoid the same; and that until it shall be so avoided, such estate has all the incidents of a fee simple. See also Thomas's Co. Litt. p. 92, note A. and p. 124, note G. 1. The estate of the grantee, although it be unimpeachable during the life of the tenant in tail, and may last as long as the estate tail shall continue, may, nevertheless, be avoided at any time after the death of tenant in tail, by the mere entry of the issue; and it determines absolutely and ipso facto, by the failure of the issue in tail, under the rule, cessante statu primitivo, cessat derivativus. 1 Prest. on estates 436, 7, 2 Id. 462, 3. But a conveyance by feoffment is attended with livery of seizin. It therefore operated on the possession, and effected a transmutation thereof; and as possession and freehold were synonymous terms, no person being considered to have the possession of lands but he who had himself, or held for another, at least an estate of freehold in them, a conveyance which transferred the possession, must necessarily be considered as transferring an estate of freehold, or, to speak more accurately, the whole fee. A feoffment, therefore, conveying the whole fee, and not merely the right or estate which a party had a right to convey, was called a tortious conveyance. Harg. Co. Litt. 271, b, note 1, § 1. But tenant in tail had an estate of inheritance 234 *(although a particular estate) even after the statute de donis. "Hence, [says Butler], if he made a feoffment, it did not, during his life, effect or prejudice the issue. Thus his alienation was, primarily, a lawful transfer; the alienee came in by right, and his estate could not be impeached during the life of the donee. In conformity to the established rule of the common law, that wherever any person acquired a presumptive right of possession, his possession was not to be defeated by entry, however slender or unlawful the title of the grantor himself might be, the statute de donis did not nullify the alienations of the donee in tail, but enabled the issue to defeat them by the formedon in the descender." Harg. Co. Litt. 326, b, note 1. The estate transferred by the feoffment of the tenant in tail, is therefore, something more than that which was transferred by his mere bargain and sale, lease and release &c. It is not a base fee that may be defeated, at any time after the death of the tenant in tail, by the mere entry of the issue, and must necessarily determine on the failure of issue; but it is a fee simple defeasible only by the action of the issue, or of those in remainder or reversion. For the estate of the tenant in tail, and of those in remainder and reversion, is turned, by the feoffment, into a right of action. And this effect of the feoffment of tenant in tail, upon the estate tail, turning it into a right of action, so that it cannot be regained by mere entry, is what is called a discontinuance; and while the discontinuance remains in force, the new estate, the fee simple which passed to the feoffee, will subsist until avoided by the action of the issue &c. or until the remitter of the issue in tail &c. or the determination of the discontinuance. (Preston on estates, ubi supra). Fines and recoveries, when they operate as mere assurances, without barring the entail, effect a discontinuance. And although the bargain and sale, or lease and release of tenant in tail, without warranty, does not affect the interest of the issue &c. and cannot, therefore, work a discontinuance, yet a warranty annexed to such a conveyance, will, in the general,
